I feel it would be an injustice to your readers to detail the full instructions given by God Himself to His servant Moses, concerning the offerings of gold, and silver, and purple for the tabernacle; and still more so to particularize the labors of the thirty thousand workmen that king Solomon sent to Lebanon—of the three score and ten thousand that bare burdens, and the eighty thousand hewers in the mountains, besides the three thousand and three hundred overseers of the work, for the temple at Jerusalem, which was not only inlaid within, but the floors were of pure gold. How does the contrast of the customs of the present day—the elegant cheap materials of lath, and plaster and cement, now so much in vogue, bear the test of comparison with such preparations, and the use of such materials? Does it not seem like a mockery? How cold a faith, how sickly a religion does such a spirit mark. But men and christian men say now-a-days that this dispensation is done away, and as a consequence its expensive service: though the first cannot be denied, who will accept the inference; for shall a covenant of greater privilege call forth a colder devotion; or shall the type receive more than the substance? Yea shall the devotion of the Jew outdo the service of the christian? Is such a thought aught else than the offspring of the antinomian spirit of the day? Such I ween was not the practice of "primitive days;" for if we refer to the times when a better service could be given—when buildings answerable to the condition of the converts were erected,—that is passing over the space of time from Herod Agrippa to that ending with the tyrant Maximinus, when temples were again reared and restored, in a splendor far exceeding those that had been destroyed,—at such a time we find some testimony of the liberality of those days in a panegyric addressed by the father of Ecclesiastical history to Paulinus Bishop of Tyre on the restoration of his church, who after describing the increased dimensions of the church, with its enclosures its "vestibulum magnum" extended towards the rays of the rising sun, the decorated and enclosed area, surrounded with porticoes, containing fountains for ablution, as symbols of purification, and describing the sculptured gates opening to the nave, goes on to say, "but the holy temple he has finished with more splendid and rich materials, applying a generous liberality in his expenses," and adds, "here it appears to me to be superfluous to describe the dimensions, the length and the breadth of the edifice, the splendid elegance, the grandeur that surpasses description, and the dazzling aspect of the work glittering in the face of the speaker;" and further says, "why should I now detail the skilful architectural arrangement, and the exceeding beauty of each of the parts, when the testimony of the eye precludes the instruction through the ear." The same authority speaks of the church erected by Constantine to the memory of the twelve Apostles as "vastly high, and yet had its walls covered with marble, its roof overlaid with gold, and without instead of tiles was covered with gilded brass." Going forward to the days of Justinian we have his exclamation on completing the rebuilding of St. Sophia, "I have outdone thee, Solomon."

With such authorities as these, there would seem no necessity of adding aught to draw us to the "old paths," for it might only induce a smile in these doubting days, to speak of churches being the courts of angels, although in the book of Psalms we find David saying, "the chariots of God are twenty thousand, even thousands of angels, and the Lord is among them as in Sinai, in His holy place." Well and most beautifully has it been asked by one of our mother's noblest sons, "were the rudiments of the law worthy of an attendance of angels, and are the memorials of the gospel destitute of so bright a retinue? and have angels purchased an exemption from their ministry since Christ became our brother?"—But to consider briefly our unreasonableness in tendering such structures to the service of God, 'twould seem sufficient to ask, whether a cheap offering is more acceptable to God, than a more costly sacrifice? Not that the latter is better in respect of God, to whom all things belong, but that the offering is respected as the best we have: does there appear consistency in those who have abundance and excess, in restraining their gifts by mere necessity? Is it not unreasonable to avail of outward things to promote our own advancement and esteem, and refuse them for the extension of God's glory. Yet examples present themselves on all sides, that such is our wont: and how sadly does the influence and effect of such structures show itself in the bearing of those who frequent them—not only is it seen by the unbended knee, but in the uncovered head, and the unguarded foot. Yet further, 'tis said God has studded the firmament with stars because He delights to have His house beautiful and highly representative of His glory; shall not we imitate the acts of love of the noble spirits of by-gone days who strove to make the Church "heaven dwelling among the sons of men?" I propose to say nothing of the unfitness of the style of heathen art for christian churches, nor even to attempt to remove the credulity of such of your readers (if such you have) who can believe that several hundred persons perched in a lofty gallery can be much impressed with the services, or in any way be devotionally disposed. But passing on so as not to weary your readers, I shall add but little on the score of economy, believing this at the present time so much the more unnecessary, as dear bought experience has proved to many that cheap structures in the end prove most expensive, for too many who have reared flimsy brick walls have only raised them to witness their decay and required renewal, and those who moreover have added gall to bitterness, by covering this unsightly material with the yet more unsightly plaster, however ingeniously squared to resemble stone, have experienced how very often the ugly counterfeit has to be repeated, and I believe that experience has gone much farther than this, some being able to testify that theirs has shown them even at the outset, to say nothing of the repetition, genuine materials would have cost less than the imitation; the advantages not only of propriety and appearance, but durability also might be easily shown in giving a proper strength and thickness to the walls; but hoping the time will shortly come when, as did the Britons of old in the days of Bishop Ninias, we shall be able to call the place Candida Casa, or white church, upon its containing a real stone building. I leave the subject, fully repaid if any engaged in so high a privilege as erecting a temple to the service of God, shall be induced hereby to adopt something more Evangelical and primitive in style, than we have been hitherto accustomed to behold.

OF CANDIDATES FOR ORDERS.

"We entreat our brethren of the Clergy to bestow pains, as opportunity may serve, in attention to the course of reading of Candidates for the Ministry, and in advising them concerning it, so as the more to secure their preparation."—In Gen. Conv. 1811.

"The party's being unimpeached as to his moral character and his being possessed of a reasonable stock of learning, are not sufficient. In addition to these qualifications, his habits should evidence a spirit of piety, a disposition to the exercises of devotion and zeal for the extending of the influence of religious truth and duty. The want of these properties of character, is radical unfitness; and therefore what we recommend to influential members of our communion, and especially to our clerical brethren, is, that they avail themselves of opportunities to discourse with Candidates for the Ministry on the qualifications of inward character suited to it; and particularly, as described in the promises exacted by the services of Ordination."—Ibidem.

"On the other hand, the effects of manifest literary deficiency in a Clergyman, are too obvious to be overlooked. It tends to drive some of the intelligent and well-informed members of our Church, to other societies who may be more attentive to the qualifications for the Ministry in this respect; and to detach others from all religious profession; which tends to the increase of irreligion and infidelity. Even persons who may be but imperfectly qualified to judge of the attainments of their Ministers become alienated from them by their reputation for insufficiency."—Ibid.

"We are more and more sensible of the inutility of an accession, unless it be of men with the qualification of theological and of other literature."—In General C. 1826.

"Being pledged by our Consecration vows to drive from the Church all false doctrine, that the pure faith of our fathers may be transmitted to our descendants as we received it, we cannot but feel deeply anxious concerning the ordination of candidates for the Ministry; for on these the character of our Protestant Church in future ages, entirely depends. We feel it our duty to declare that no person should be ordained who is not well acquainted with the landmarks which separate us from the Church of Rome; and being so, who will distinctly declare himself a Protestant, heartily abjuring her corruptions, as our reformers did."—In General C. 1844.

GENERAL THEOLOGICAL SEMINARY.—The next Session of the Seminary opens on Monday, the 2d day of October. We take from the Church Almanac the following statement relative to the Qualifications for admission:

Qualifications for Admission.—Either a Certificate of being a Candidate for Holy Orders, with full qualifications; or a Certificate of religious and moral character, of classical and scientific attainments, of attachment to the Protestant Episcopal Church, and of such dispositions and habits as may render the individual apt and meet to exercise the ministry; and then passing a satisfactory examination on the following subjects: (1.) the Primary Elements of the Hebrew tongue; (2.) the Greek Grammar, and the Gospels and Acts in the original; (3.) the rules and principles of English Composition, with a specimen of composition. These examinations are strictly enforced, in all cases.—Churchman.

CONNECTICUT.—CONVOCATION OF TRINITY COLLEGE, August 2d, 1848.—The House of Convocation met this morning in the College Cabinet at 10 o'clock. Prayer having been said by the Dean, the minutes of the last year were read and accepted.

On motion of Rev. Mr. Beardsley, the order of business was suspended, and after some feeling remarks by Rev. Mr. Everest, announcing the death of Rev. Cyrus Munson, resolutions were unanimously passed, which have already appeared in the Calendar, and a Committee was appointed to attend his funeral at Meriden.

The Standing Committee reported that there had died during the past year, Harleigh J. Buckland, of the class of 1831; Rev. S. S. Lewis, D.D., of the class of 1829; Rev. Cyrus Munson, of the class of 1838, and Wm. F. Pettit, of the class of 1846.

The Bursar read his report, which was accepted.

The House then proceeded to the choice of officers, and the following gentlemen were chosen, Mr. Clark having declined a re-election.

Prof. Duncan L. Stewart, A. M. Dean.

Rev. Wm. Watson, A. M. Sub. Dean.

Gurdon W. Russell, M. D. Scribe.

Benjamin G. Whitman, A. M. Bursar.

Rev. Prof. A. Jackson, A. M., Edward Goodman, A. M.,

John C. Comstock, A. M., Standing Committee.

The following gentlemen were then chosen: To deliver the Address, Right Rev. Alonzo Potter, D.D., of Pennsylvania.

As Substitute, Hon. J. R. Ingersoll, of Pennsylvania.

To deliver the Poem, R. H. Dana, Esq., of Boston.

As substitute, Rev. Ralph Hoyt.

Then were recommended to the ad eundem degrees in Trinity College.

Rev. Wm. White Bronson, M. A., University, Penn.

James Rankin, B. A., Union College.

Rev. Peter S. Chauncey, M. A., Columbia College.

Rev. Samuel Fuller, M. A., Union College.

Rev. Thomas C. Pitkin, M. A., Yale College.

Rev. Henry W. Adams, M. A., Wesleyan University.

On motion of Rev. Mr. Short,

Resolved, That hereafter the meetings of Convocation be opened by the use of the morning prayer of the Church, in the College Chapel.

Rev. Mr. McKay's resolutions, presented at the last meeting, were taken up, and on motion of Rev. Mr. Beardsley, a Committee of seven was raised, to take this subject into consideration, and report to the next meeting.

The Committee consists of Rev. Drs. Potter, Croswell, Rev. Mr. Beardsley, Rev. Dr. Williams, Rev. Mr. Corning, P. A. Jewett, M. D., and Prof. Stewart.

Isaac Hazlehurst, M. A. of Philadelphia, and Rev. Samuel Starr, M. A. of Trenton, were nominated to fill the vacancies in the Junior Fellows, who now stand as follows:

Isaac Hazlehurst, M. A.

Rev. Samuel Starr, M. A.

Rev. N. E. Cornwall, M. A.

Rev. E. E. Beardsley, M. A.

Rev. Wm. Payne, M. A.

Rev. John Williams, D. D. afterwards Bishop N.

On motion of Rev. Mr. Beardsley,

Resolved, That the officers of the House of Convocation be a Committee to present the thanks of the House to Hon. D. D. Barnard, for his address, and to Rev. Wm. Croswell, D. D., for his Poem, delivered before us this afternoon, and that we request copies of the same for publication.

August 3d.—Met in Cabinet pursuant to adjournment.

A communication having been received from the Corporation, announcing the resignation of Rev. Dr. Totten, as President, and the election of Rev. Dr. Williams as his successor, it was on motion of Rev. Mr. Short, unanimously Resolved, That we receive with profound satisfaction the announcement of the election of Rev. John Williams, D. D., as President of this Institution, and that we pledge ourselves to renewed exertions in behalf of the College under its new auspices.

On motion of Rev. Mr. Cornwall, unanimously

Resolved, That this House of Convocation sincerely express their testimony of respect, thanks, and best wishes, to the Rev. Dr. Totten, the retiring President, who has for many years discharged the duties of his office with exemplary fidelity.

It was announced that Mr. Barnard had placed his address at the disposal of Convocation, and that Dr. Croswell had not consented to the publication of his Poem.

And there being no further business, Convocation adjourned sine die.—Calendar.

South Carolina.—Extract of a letter, dated Glenn Springs, July 31: "Our little Church is progressing rapidly at the Spring. On Sunday next we will hold service in it for the first time. Although not quite done, we have fitted it up for the occasion, in order that we may have a suitable place for the celebration of the Holy Communion. We are enabled to enjoy this inestimable privilege, by the presence among us of the Rev. C. B. Walker, who officiated here yesterday, and will remain over another Sunday. I have written to Mr. Arthur, proposing an exchange with him, that the people at Spartanburg, C. H., may enjoy the same privilege soon. . . . We have cause to be truly grateful for what has been accomplished, but still the prospect is cheerless. I think, could the friends of Missions be made truly sensible of the awful degree of error and ignorance, they would at least stay their hands, until Missions to foreign lands might with truth be said, to go forth from a Christian country."—Charleston Gos. Mess.

TENNESSEE.—RAVENS CROFT SEMINARY.—We take pleasure in calling the particular attention of parents and guardians, and of all friends of Christian education and of the Church, to the brief advertisement of the Male Institute about to be established among us. We understand that a Prospectus will be very soon issued, giving a more minute exposition of the tuition system and general plans of this Seminary: and, in our next, we will be able to present some satisfactory notice of them. In the meantime we congratulate our fellow-citizens upon the prospect of another establishment of the highest order being added to further the progress of intellectual, moral, and religious improvement; and to sustain and extend the just character and fame of Columbia as a place of education.

The plans of those under whose auspices the new Seminary is about to be opened for furnishing the means of a thorough literary, philosophical, or business education, have been adopted after mature consideration, and comparison of the best schemes of instruction that have been pursued in this country and Europe. They seem to us to be founded upon a far more rational basis than that which characterizes the ordinary systems of our colleges and high schools. The great object appears to be, by combining elementary instruction with active habits on the part of the student, to supply the means of cultivation to all the powers of intellect and taste; to call them severally into action; to present appropriate subjects for their exercise; to watch over their movements, and direct their expanding energies, so as to maintain them in that just relation to each other, and to secure that reciprocal aid in their progressive improvement, which seems pointed out by the order of nature itself. For youth, destined to fill various and very different situations in life, the course of instruction, certainly, should be made to embrace the elements at least of all those branches of knowledge upon which the investigations of Science, the pursuit of the highest departments of Literature and Art, and the successful despatch of Business are found chiefly to depend.—Guardian.

CLERICAL CHANGES.—The Rev. E. A. Greenleaf, having taken charge of St. Matthew's church, Southport, Wisconsin, requests all letters and papers directed accordingly.

Rev. D. C. Millett having accepted a call to St. Thomas' church, Hamilton, Madison co., desires his letters and papers to be directed accordingly.

Miscellaneous.

"LET THY KINGDOM COME."—Thy kingdom is in two sorts to be considered, universally and particularly. Universally, according to thy power wherewith thou governest all things every where, in earth, heaven, hell, devils, angels, men, beasts, fowls, fishes, and all creatures, animate and inanimate, sensible and insensible. Of this kingdom spake David, when he said "Thy kingdom ruleth over all." Particularly thy kingdom is to be considered according to thy grace wherewith thou reignest only in thy church and elect people, ruling and governing all and every member of thy church to thy glory and their eternal comfort. Not that out of this church I exclude thy power; for as therewith thou defendest thy people, so thou punishest thine enemies; but because thy grace is specially considered, being, as it were, the very keeper that keepeth and guideth thy people. The time will be when this kingdom of grace and power, now being as distinct, shall be united and made one kingdom of glory; which will be when Christ shall give up his kingdom into thine hands; that is, in the resurrection when "death, the last enemy shall be subdued," and thou shalt be "all in all." In the mean season this kingdom of grace is miraculously and mightily propagated, enlarged, and governed by the true ministry of thy word and sacraments, through the working of thy Holy Spirit. And this is the mean and way whereby as thou didst first plant, so dost thou enlarge, amplify and preserve the same. This kingdom of grace begun, continued, and enlarged by the true preaching of thy gospel and ministration of thy sacraments, is the thing which Christ teacheth here thy children to pray for, that it might come; that is to say, that thy gospel might so mightily, purely, and plenteously be preached, maugre the head of all thine enemies, that the number of thine elect might be brought in, and so the kingdom of thy glory might appear. So that as I see thy children desire, pray, and labour, that thy gospel might be truly preached, heard, and lived in themselves, and in others; so they lament the not preaching and refusing, the not living and unbelieving thy gospel. Yea, they lament the lingering of the coming of thy Christ; for in his coming they know they shall be "like unto him," and "having this hope, they purify themselves as he is pure."—Bradford on the Lord's Prayer.

"HALLOWED BE THY NAME."—Thy name is that whereby thou art known; for names serve to discern and know one thing from another. Now, though thou art known by thy creatures, yet in this our corrupt estate they serve but to make us excuseless. Therefore properly, most lively, and comfortably, thou art known by thy holy word, and specially by thy promise of grace, and freely pardoning and receiving us into thy favour for Christ Jesus' sake: for the which goodness in Christ thou art praised and magnified according to thy name. That is, so much as men know thee in Christ, they magnify and praise thee; which here thou callest "hallowing" or sanctifying. Not that thou art more holy in respect of thyself, but in respect of men, who, the more they know thee, the more they cannot but sanctify thee; that is, they cannot but as in themselves, by true faith, love, fear, and spiritual service, honour thee; so also in their outward behaviour and words they cannot but live in such sort as others seeing them may in and by their holiness and godly conversation be occasioned, as to know thee, so to sanctify thy name accordingly. And therefore thou settest forth here unto me what is the chief and principal wish and desire of thy children and people, namely, that thou in Christ mightest be truly known and honoured, both of themselves and of others, inwardly and outwardly. By reason whereof easily a man may perceive by the contrary, that the greatest sorrow and grief thy people have is ignorance of thee, false service or religion, and wicked conversation; against the which they pray and labour diligently after their vocations, as they for the obtaining of the others both to others and themselves do take no small pains in prayer, study, and godly exercise.—Bradford on the Lord's Prayer.

CHURCH ARCHITECTURE.—As for churches I cannot do better than quote a beautiful passage from Wordsworth—beautiful because it has so good a moral in it. It is well known what a glorious building is King's College Chapel, at Oxford. It is there that the bard is ruminating, when this sublime sonnet is uttered. The roof of the Chapel is vaulted, and so wonderfully built, that even Sir Christopher Wren declared that nothing like it could be built by him, unless they would tell him where to lay the first stone. The cost must have been enormous—yet the poet says—

"Tax not the royal saint with vain expense;
With ill-matched aims the architect who planned—(Albeit labouring for a scanty band Of white-robed scholars only)—this immense
And glorious work of fine intelligence!"

And the principles on which he justifies it, will apply to all our Christian charities:

"Give all thou canst. High heaven rejects the lore Of nicely calculated less or more!"

When we try to cheat our heavenly Father of his own good gifts—we only cheat ourselves; and there is that withholdeth more than is meet, but it tendeth to poverty.

THE WORD "SELAH."—The translators of the Bible have left the Hebrew word Selah, which occurs so often in the Psalms, as they found it, and of course the English reader often asks his minister or some learned friend, what it means. And the minister, or learned friend, has most often been obliged to confess ignorance, because it is a matter in regard to which the most learned have by no means been of one mind. The Targums and most of the Jewish commentators give to the word the meaning eternally, for ever. Rabbi Kimchi regards it as a sign to elevate the voice. The authors of the Septuagint translation appear to have regarded it as a musical note, equivalent, perhaps, to the word repeat. According to Luther and others, it means silence. Gesenius explains it to mean, "Let the instruments play and the singers stop." Woeher regards it as equivalent to sursum corda—up, my soul! Sommer, after examining all the seventy-four passages in which the word occurs, recognises in every case "an actual appeal or summons to Jehovah. They are calls for aid and prayers to be heard, expressed either with entire directness, or if not in the imperative, 'Hear Jehovah! or awake Jehovah!' and the like, still earnest addresses to God that he would remember and hear," &c. The word itself he regards as indicating a blast of trumpets by the priests. Selah itself he thinks an abridged expression used for Higgaiion Selah; Higgaiion indicating the sound of the stringed instruments, and Selah a vigorous blast of trumpets.—Bibliotheca Sacra.

SOUND MIND.—A perfectly just and sound mind is a rare and invaluable gift. But it is still much more unusual to see such a mind unbiased in all its actings. God has given this soundness of mind but to few; and a very small number of those few escape the bias of some predilection, perhaps habitually operating; and none are at all times perfectly free. I once saw this subject forcibly illustrated.

A watch-maker told me that a gentleman had put an exquisite watch into his hands that went irregularly. It was as perfect a piece of work as was ever made. He took it to pieces and put it together again twenty times. No manner of defect was to be discovered, and yet the watch went intolerably. At last it struck him that, possibly, the balance-wheel might have been near a magnet. On applying a needle to it he found his suspicions true. Here was all the mischief. The steel work in the other parts of the watch had a perpetual influence on its motions, and the watch went as well as possible with a new wheel. If the soundest mind be magnetized by any predilection, it must act irregularly.—Cecil.

BE TRUE.—How stirring those words of George Herbert, "Lie not," neither to thyself, nor man, nor God. Let mouth and heart be one; beat and speak together; and make both felt in action. It is for cowards to lie. Lies are the offspring of fear, and slaves to it spit them forth amid the stormy workings of the soul in froth. How like a living thing this truth, as in a gem, shines out as George Herbert sang it two centuries ago.

"Lie not, but let thy heart be true to God;
Thy mouth to it, thy actions to them both.
Towards tell lies, and those that fear the rod,
The stormy working soul spits lies in froth.
Dare to be TRUE. Nothing can need a lie.
A fault, which needs it most, grows two thereby."

When we think of death, a thousand sins, which we have trodden as worms beneath our feet, rise up against us as flaming serpents.—Abbot.

REV. FREDERICK OGILBY, EDITOR.]

PHILADELPHIA, SATURDAY, SEPTEMBER 23, 1848.

[Vol. X.—No. 38.—Whole No. 508.]

For the Banner of the Cross.

The Penitent Mary.

Fast from her soft and lustrous eye,
There stream the limpid tears,
Repentance wrings the heaving sigh,
And wakes her anxious fears.

O'er that dark soul, the power of sin
Had held a sceptred sway,
Where now the heavenly light pours in Its warm reviving ray.

Here worldly thought, nor selfish aim,
Invents no cunning art;
The love of Jesus lights the flame
That kindles in her heart.

No tinsel splendor here is seen,
No blandishment she tries,
No gorgeous robe like Sheba's queen,
To captivate the eyes.

Her form in modest robe array'd,
She bends with pious fear;
Her cheek the pallid tints betray'd,
That sorrow painted there.

A simple box with unction pure,
Its grateful odour flings;
No treasure else had she in store,
'Tis all the gift she brings.

Now lively faith dispels the fear
That darken'd round her soul,
While deep the pious anthems there,
In silent numbers roll.

No sounding prayer her lip reveals,
No eloquence her tongue;
It is no vaunting claim she feels,
From weak presumption sprung.

In that silent, dewy tear,
That bathes the Saviour's feet,
There is a deeper, warmer prayer,
Than can the mortal tongue repeat.

Nor plastic language can so well
The inward soul portray,
As when her floating tresses fell,
And dried that limpid tear away.

The Pharisee in sullen pride,
Frown'd on the pious deed;
The rigid rule his only guide,
The outward show his creed.

But Jesus saw the fervid stream,
Her meek devotion pour'd,
Ascending to the radiant throne
Where cherubim adored.

The dew of pard'ning, flow'd
And washed her spirit pure,
When fell the mild benignant word,
"Go thou and sin no more."

Selections.

Our readers will perhaps remember an article in the Banner, communicated by a correspondent when this expedition was setting out on its interesting mission. The following account of the successful completion of its object we take from an article in the "Southern Literary Messenger," published in Richmond, Virginia. We may here remark that this is an excellent Periodical and we often meet in its articles of high literary merit. We always welcome this journal among our exchanges, and sincerely hope that it meets with the encouragement it richly deserves.

The Dead Sea Expedition.

BY LIEUT. M. F. MAURY.

Lieutenant Lynch has redeemed his pledge: he has surveyed the Dead Sea, returned in safety, he and his party, to their ship, and may ere long be expected to arrive in the United States with the rich fruits of their labor.

Lynch, who planned this expedition, is a Virginian; Mason, who authorised it, is a Virginian, and could we envy the patriot any of the fruits of his labor, we should most of all covet the honors which Mason deserves for the "Dead Sea expedition."

We have some notes which we have treasured up for the benefit of our readers, and of all who look with longing eyes and eager minds for the results of this interesting and honorable service. We offer a few of them now, perhaps we will give more of them at another time.

In the spring of 1847, Lieut. Lynch first addressed the Secretary upon the subject. "In the hopes," said that officer, "that it may receive your sanction, I respectfully submit a proposition to circumnavigate and explore lake Asphaltites or Dead Sea, and its entire coast."

"The expense will be trifling, and the object easy of attainment."

"Our ships frequently touch at Acre in Syria."

"That place is forty miles distant from the foot of Lake Tiberias, or Sea of Galilee. Through and from the last, the river Jordan runs and debouches into the first named sea."

"The frame of a boat with its crew and their provisions, can be transported on camels from Acre to Tiberias. At the latter place the boat can be put together, and the crew embark and accomplish the desired work in fifteen days."

"Arms and a tent, a few mathematical instruments, provisions and water are all that will be required. The tent can be made on board ship, temporarily used, and the canvas afterwards applied to other purposes on board ship. The arms from the ship, and the ordinary rations will suffice; and the boat itself can be safely returned."

"The Dead Sea has been circumnavigated but by one traveller Mr. Costigan. He very nearly accomplished it in eight days. Unfortunately he undertook it at a most insalubrious season of the year and died at the termination of the voyage, without leaving a journal or notes behind."

"This proposition pertains to a subject maritime in its nature, and therefore peculiarly appropriate to your office; and it is involved in mystery, the solution of which will advance the cause of science and gratify the whole Christian world."

The proposition came at a time when the Secretary was collecting all the available forces of the Navy for the combined attack upon Vera Cruz. He promised to consider the matter as soon as a favorable opportunity should occur. And an opportunity did occur which made the expedition most apropos: The Spanish government had withdrawn the privilege hitherto allowed us of having at Port Mahon, a depot of stores for our squadron in the Mediterranean. It was therefore found necessary to send out a store-ship to that sea, and to keep her there with provisions, &c. on board, to supply the wants of the squadron as they arose.

The store ship "Supply" was fitted out at New York for this purpose. After delivering to the squadron enough to satisfy for the time, a large portion of her stores would still be left on board, and she would have to remain in port for several months, waiting for the first delivery to be consumed. If she continued in port her officers and crew would continue with her of course, dragging out a profitless and tedious time, if not contracting idle habits from the mere want of occupation.

Lieut. Lynch was a most accomplished seaman. Officers were scarce, for most of them had been sent down to the Gulf, and the cargo of the "Supply" was a valuable one. It therefore occurred to the practical and business mind of the Secretary, to send Lieut. Lynch in command of the "Supply," with his party as a part of her crew to the Mediterranean—to let her report to the Commodore, meet the wants of the squadron, and then, instead of lying idle in port, doing nothing but wait for the men-of-war to eat up what she had given them, to allow her to proceed with Lieut. Lynch up the Levant, and land him and his party, taking care that after landing them, men enough should be left on board to manage the ship.

Instead therefore of idleness, here was active, useful, and creditable occupation for a part of her crew, while the remainder could, as well as a thousand men, take care of the ship in port, or in her short and pleasant trips of a few days from place to place. The arrangement was admirable. Lynch was in the very nick of time with his proposition, and the opportunity presented was a glorious one.

While therefore the preliminary arrangements are in progress here, let us take a glance at what was transpiring in another quarter of the globe, with regard to the same subject.

At the very time that Lieut. Lynch was engaged with his preparations in New York, Lieut. Molyneux, a gallant officer of the British Navy, was actually engaged in transporting on the backs of camels and from the very point suggested by Lieut. Lynch, a boat for the survey of the Dead Sea.

The plans of these two officers for approaching and exploring that sheet of water were remarkably similar. Neither knew that the thoughts of the other were in that direction at all. But, that two Navy officers of different services, and in parts of the world far remote, should each without the knowledge of the other, be engaged with the same original idea, is one of those curious coincidences of mental sympathy which is sometimes observed to take place among men of science. The coincidence is as striking as the case of Le Verrier and Adams with the new planet.

On the 20th of August 1847, Lieut. Molyneux of H. M. S. Spartan, was landed at Acre with a few seamen. Hiring guides, camels and horses, he started early the next morning with the ship's dingey—a very small boat—for the sea of Galilee, and on the 23d he was embarked on its blue waters.

The natives manifested great reluctance to his descending the Jordan. But by a show of arms with threats to shoot the Sheiks who annoyed him on the way, he made good his descent, though it was in part accomplished by land.

The 3d of September found him fairly embarked on the Dead Sea. The greatest depth which he found is said to be 1350 feet. At noon on the 5th the party returned to their tent, on the shore, completely done up. Every thing and body in the tent was covered with an offensive, shiny substance from the water. The iron was corroded and looked as if covered with coal tar.

Having disembarked, the dingey was again mounted on the backs of camels, and the party proceeded with it to Jerusalem. Lieut. Molyneux returned to his ship by way of Jaffa, and died soon after getting on board.

The news of his melancholy fate cou'd not, when it reached them, fail to excite painful emotions in the minds of Lieut. Lynch and his party. But in happy ignorance of the event, he and they were in America, busy with their preparations. The "Supply" was fitting at New York as a store-ship for the Mediterranean squadron. Lieut. Lynch was designated to command her, and she was to be provided with two metallic boats instead of the usual boats of wood, one of which was made of iron and painted the other of copper.

The stores being on board and the ship reported ready for sea, the necessary orders were issued. "The object with which I have yielded to your request," said the Secretary of the Navy in his admirably drawn letter of instructions, "is to promote the cause of science and advance the character of the Naval service."

All things being considered—we can scarcely imagine a more legitimate subject, an object more praiseworthy, or a more glorious opportunity for elevating the character of the Navy through its officers. The question was, should the sojourn of these officers in the Mediterranean be one of idleness on board a store-ship at her anchors, or should it be with them a labor of love and of usefulness in the cause of science? The Navy glories in useful occupation.

Provided with their simple outfits and the two boats aforesaid—the copper one, named "Fanny Mason," the iron, "Fanny Skinner," the party all in high spirits, set sail from New York about the middle of November, 1847.

It was, however, by no means certain that the object which these officers and men had so much at heart, could be accomplished, for the permission given was only conditional. It all now depended upon the Grand Turk. Unless he would give a firman with leave for Lieut. Lynch and party to visit and explore the Dead Sea, the expedition was to be considered at an end.

Lieut. Lynch, with his companion, Lieut. Dale, had therefore to proceed to Constantinople for the purpose of obtaining the requisite authority from the Turkish government. Business of a public nature called the Supply there. The Sultan treated them with marked consideration. He gave Lieut. Lynch a private audience, readily granted the firman addressed to the Governors of Jerusalem and Saidia, requiring the functionaries to give that officer all needful aid and friendly assistance.

The Sultan was so much pleased with the interview, that the next day he sent for the Grand Vizier and expressed a wish to make the American officer a present "such as became a sovereign." This of course was declined, and the party were permitted to depart in peace. Every thing now bid fair, and "with a will to spare no exertion," wrote Lieut. Lynch to Judge Mason, "I trust in God for ability to deserve your good opinion."

On the last of March, the Supply landed the party at Kaiffa under Mount Carmel, and proceeded to execute her orders in the Mediterranean. Two American travellers, viz: Henry Bellow and Dr. H. J. Anderson, joined the party about this time.

All hands were now set to work in making the necessary arrangements for their departure into the interior. They met difficulties at every turn; at last they found out that they all proceeded from the rapacious and unprincipled Seid Bey, the Governor, who was endeavoring, by creating difficulties, to extort money. As soon as this discovery was made, Lieut. Lynch refused to have any thing more to do with him, and proceeded in his own way.

Seemingly insurmountable difficulties presented themselves. The boats had to be transported to the sea of Galilee over mountain gorges and heights which nothing larger than the sure footed horses of the country had ever passed before. But the sailor resources of the party, supported by zeal in the noble enterprise, were sufficient to overcome them all. About noon of the third day, the party halted nine miles from Tiberias. Their tent was pitched on a mountain side, with Nazareth on the right, Cana to the north, Mount Tabor to the south-east; spread beneath them was the plain, on which the bloody battle between the French and the English was fought, and three hours in advance was the sea of Galilee with its beautiful blue waters dancing in the sunbeams. Emblematic of its Master, it alone of all things around them, remained the same. Just as the Apostles saw it when our Saviour said to it, "Peace, be still," this little band of rovers now beheld it.

So far not an accident had occurred, nor a mishap of any kind, save that "Fanny Skinner" had got her paint rubbed a little.

After having surmounted incredible difficulties, still greater ones awaited them in this nine miles of distance. The boats had to be left in the mountains, while the exhausted party struggled forward to get water and to refresh themselves. The next day all hands returned to the boats. They had to be lowered down precipices with ropes. But at this work Jack Tar was perfectly au fait. Finally at 2 P. M., Saturday, of April the 8th, Lieut. Lynch had the satisfaction of re-opening his despatch to announce the pleasing intelligence: "The 'Two Fannies,' each with the American ensign flying, are now afloat upon the sea of Galilee."

We can now, in imagination, hear reverberating among the mountains, the soul-stirring cheers with which that flag was greeted, as the gallant leader of that gallant little band flung the star-spangled banner to the breeze for the first time upon the waters of that ancient and venerable sea.

The natives took the bright copper of the "Fanny Mason" to be gold, and looked upon her as an exponent of the greatness and wealth of the United States. They were friendly and offered the party no interruption in their progress.

Here Lieut. Lynch purchased for twenty-one dollars and a quarter the only boat on the lake, to assist in the transportation down the Jordan. That lake abounds now, as it did of old, with excellent fish and wild fowl. But that at this day there should be only one boat on that sea, and that used not for fishing, but for bringing wood across, and valued no higher than at $214, may be taken as a sign that no "fishers of men" are to be found there now.

With this little wooden boat, the "Two Fannies" and the river Jordan for the rest of the way, it was thought the difficulties of the route were at an end. But to the consternation of the party it was found the difficulties were but just commencing. The course of the Jordan was found to be interrupted by frequent and most fearful rapids. But the party to a man felt now that their own honor, the reputation of the Navy, and the credit of their country were all at stake upon their efforts. To a man they gave their energetic leader the most hearty co-operation. "Sometimes placing our sole trust in Providence, we had," says he, "to plunge with headlong velocity down appalling descents." So great were the difficulties, that in two days they accomplished but twelve miles.

On the third day they were compelled from her shattered condition to abandon the Galilee boat, and to trust entirely to the "two Fannies."

May the 18th the party arrived at Masaraa, a place on the river consecrated by tradition for the passage of the Israelites and the baptism of the Redeemer; it is nine miles from Jericho where the pilgrims cross. The passage is dangerous, and Lieut. Lynch tarried here for the purpose of lending them assistance should accident befall and assistance be required. The two graceful little "Fannies," with colors flying, were anchored on the other side, ready to succor and to help. Early in the morning the pilgrims began to arrive, and by 5 o'clock there were several thousand already on the bank.

The great secret of the depression between Lake Tiberias and the Dead Sea, is solved, in the opinion of Lieut. Lynch, by the tortuous course of the Jordan. In a distance of about sixty miles that river winds along through a course of about two hundred miles. Within that distance he and his party plunged down no less than twenty-seven threatening rapids, besides many others of less descent.

The difference of level between the sea of Galilee and the Dead Sea has been stated at over a thousand feet. But it has been urged by some that this could not be so, else the Jordan in its run of 60 miles would be a continuous cataract. The Mohawk, it was thought, was among the rivers of the greatest fall in the world, and it averages only four or five feet to the mile. But it is now known that the Sacramento of California has a fall of 2000 feet in 20 miles, or an average of 100 feet to the mile. With Lieut. Lynch's discovery and explanation as to the length of the Jordan, it is necessary to give it an average fall of only about 6 feet in each mile to account for the difference of level between its source and mouth.

"A few weeks earlier or later," says he, "and the passage would have been impracticable. We are the first who have accomplished the entire descent. The small English boat last year (Lieut. Molyneux's dingley), was taken partly on a camel, and the officer made the journey by land. His notes were unfortunately taken in cipher, and by his death, I am told, lost to the world."

Leaving Masaraa, Lieut. Lynch took the lead in the "Fanny Mason," followed by passed midshipman Aulick in the "Fanny Skinner," while Lieut. Dale with his friendly Bedouins, and a few others, accompanied the baggage and stores by land, for it was necessary to carry provisions along. After separating in the morning, the two parties saw no more of each other until they met at night.

With an hour's pull the two boats stopped to fill their gum elastic water breakers. This accomplished, the party resumed their oars, and were soon led to expect the close proximity of the Dead Sea, from a fetid odor—but this was traced to two streamlets strongly impregnated with sulphur. The Dead Sea, however, soon burst upon their view, into which the little boats bounded with a northwest gale.

The water of the river was sweet to within a few hundred yards of its mouth. The waters of the sea were devoid of smell, but they were bitter, salt, and nauseous.

"As we rounded to the westward," writes Lieut. Lynch, "the agitated sea presented a sheet of foaming brine. The spray, separating as it fell, left incrustations of salt upon our faces and clothes, and while it caused a pricking sensation wherever it touched the skin, was above all exceedingly painful to the eyes.

"The boats heavily laden, struggled sluggishly at first, but when the wind freshened to a gale, it seemed as if the bows, so dense was the water, were encountering the sledge-hammer of the Titans, instead of the opposing waves of an angry sea.

"At the expiration of an hour and a half, we were driven far to leeward, and I was compelled to bear away for the shore. When we were near to it and while I was weighing the practicability of landing the boats through the surf, the wind suddenly ceased and with it the sea rapidly fell—the ponderous quality of the water causing it to settle as the agitating power had ceased to act. Within five minutes there was a perfect calm, and the sea was unmoved even by undulation. At 8 P. M., weary and exhausted, we reached a place of rendezvous upon the northwest shore."

The three succeeding days were devoted to sounding.

Resting over Easter Sunday, the party resumed operations the next day, making topographical sketches as they went, and touching at a copious stream issuing from hot springs, and the mouth of the river Amon of antiquity. They proceeded thence by degrees to the southern extremity of the sea, where the most wonderful sight that they had yet seen awaited them.

"In passing the mountain of Uzdum, (Sodom,) we unexpectedly and much to our astonishment," continues our adventurous explorer, "saw a large, rounded, turret-shaped column facing towards S. E. which proved to be of solid rock salt, capped with carbonate of lime; one mass of crystallization. Mr. Dale took a sketch of it, and Dr. Anderson and I with great difficulty landed and procured specimens from it."

The sea soon proved so shallow that they could proceed no further. Half a mile from the southern shore they found but six inches water, and beyond, an extensive marsh too yielding for a foothold.

Near the eastern shore they encountered a sirocco, which came sweeping from the southeast across the desert of Arabia with a stifling heat. At 8 P. M. their thermometer, which before had ranged from 88° to 97°, stood at 106°. "We could not take our tents with us," says the interesting letter from which we are quoting, "nor did we need them, as we found it more agreeable sleeping in the open air upon the beach."

Having circumnavigated the Lake and returning to their place of departure, they found the sad intelligence of Mr. Adams' death awaiting their arrival. Their colors were lowered at half mast, and there out upon the dark waters of this mysterious sea, this little band of true-hearted Americans paid a tribute to the memory of the patriot and statesman, with 21 minute guns fired from their frail vessels. The echoes from the cavernous recesses of the lofty and barren mountains which surrounded them, startled the Arabs, and reverberated loudly and strangely upon the ears of the mourners.

The letters of Lieut. Lynch giving an account, currente calamo, of his proceedings, are of great value and exceeding interest. We hope soon to have the pleasure of announcing his return to the United States and of welcoming him and his companions back to country, home and friends.

"We have," says he, "elicited several facts of interest to the man of science and the Christian.

"The bottom of the northern half of this sea is almost an entire plain. Its meridional lines at a short distance from the shore scarce vary in depth. The deepest soundings thus far 188 fathoms, (1128 feet.) Near the shore, the bottom is generally an incrustation of salt, but the intermediate one is soft mud, with many rectangular crystals—mostly cubes—of pure salt. At one time Stellwagen's lead brought up nothing but crystals.

"The southern half of the sea is as shallow as the northern one is deep, and for about one-fourth of its entire length the depth does not exceed three fathoms—(18 feet.) Its southern bed has presented no crystals, but the shores are lined with incrustations of salt, and when we landed at Uzdum, in the space of an hour, our footprints were coated with crystallization.

"The opposite shores of the peninsula and the west coast present evident marks of disruption.

"There are unquestionably birds and insects upon the shores, and ducks are sometimes upon the sea, for we have seen them—but cannot detect any living thing within it; although the salt streams flowing into it, contain small fish. My hopes have been strengthened into conviction, and I feel sure that the results of this survey will fully sustain the scriptural account of the cities of the plain.

"With one exception we are all well, save to that one, not a dose of medicine has been administered—and his disease is neither caused nor affected by the climate. Although we are up early and out long, living on two meals a day, save when we are restricted to one, there is no complaining,—all seem to be actuated by a high sense of duty. The preserved meats have proved almost worthless, few being able to eat them, and sometimes our only food is rice. Oranges and lemons, luxuries in our happy country, are here, from the want of vegetables, absolute necessities. Still, as there are cavillers at home, I have once sent to Jerusalem and purchased them for the men at my own expense.

"The expense of guards to our baggage while we are absent I am obliged to incur, as also for their transportation from place to place, for the boats can carry no more than the officers and men; the arms, instruments, food and water. The whole cost from Beirut to this place, including purchases, transportation of boats, camels, horses, guards and guides amounted to about $700. I strive to be economical.

"With the Arabs we are on the most friendly terms. In accordance with the tenor of my orders, I have agreed to pay them fairly for all the services they may render and provisions they may bring—but for nothing more. Thus far, two false alarms excepted, we have been undisturbed in our progress and operations. I scarce know what we should have done without the Arabs. They bring us food when nearly famished, and water when parched with thirst. They act as guides and messengers, and in our absence faithfully guard our tents, bedding and clothes. A decided course tempered with courtesy, wins at once their respect and good will. Although they are an impetuous race, not an angry word has thus far passed between us. With the blessing of God, I hope to preserve the existence of harmony to the last.

"The Jordan, although rapid and impetuous, is graceful in its windings and fringed with luxuriance, while its waters are sweet, clear, cool and refreshing.

"Even if my letter were more brief, this is not a proper place to dwell upon the wonders of this sea, for wondrous it is, in every sense of the word, so sudden are the changes of the weather and so different the aspects it presents, as at times to seem as if we were in a world of enchantments. We are alternately beside and upon the brink and the surface of a huge and sometimes seething cauldron."

The greatest depth obtained was 218 fathoms, (1308 feet.) Having completed the survey of the sea, the party proceeded to determine the height of mountains on its shores, and to run a level thence via Jerusalem to the Mediterranean. They found the summit of the precipitous ridge which forms the west bank of the Dead Sea, to be more than a thousand feet above its surface, and very nearly on a level with the Mediterranean.

It is a curious fact, that the distance from the top to the bottom of the Dead Sea, should measure the height of its banks, the elevation of the Mediterranean, and the difference of level between the bottom of the two seas, and that the depth of the Dead Sea should be also an exact multiple of the height of Jerusalem above it.

Another not less singular fact, in the opinion of Lieut. Lynch, "is that the bottom of the Dead Sea forms two submerged plains, an elevated and a depressed one. The first, its southern part, of slimy mud covered by a shallow bay; the last, its northern and largest portion, of mud and incrustations and rectangular crystals of salt—at a great depth with a narrow ravine running through it, corresponding with the bed of the river Jordan at one extremity and the Wady 'el Jeib,' or wady within a wady at the other."

The slimy ooze upon that plain at the bottom of the Dead Sea will not fail to remind the sacred historian of the "slime pits" in the vale, where were joined in battle "four kings with five."

June the 9th, the whole party after an absence of a little over two months, had returned to St. Jean d'Acre on the Mediterranean. They brought back their boats in as complete order as they received them on board at New York. The party were in fine health. Save a flesh wound to one man from the accidental discharge of his piece, not an accident or mishap had occurred to any one. The Arabs would point to them and say, "God is with them."

Lieut. Lynch has endeared himself to his countrymen: his Christian brethren look upon him with pride, and the whole Christian world with eager interest await his return and the forthcoming of his final report.

By this expedition problems, great and important in the eyes of Christendom, have been solved by the American government, and that too at a cost too trifling to be named in such connexion.

Seven hundred dollars for a scientific exploration of the Dead Sea! There is not a village church in the land, where if the matter had been proposed, such a sum could not have been raised at once for the work. Still, there be "cavillers at home," and as of old, so now, there be those who can "strain at a gnat and swallow a camel." But the enlightened and patriotic minds which planned, set on foot, and consummated this undertaking, have also their reward: the mens conscia, the sense of having so used their high privileges of place as to advance the honor of their country and the glory of God; the approving "well-done" of a Christian people, and the grateful acknowledgment of wise and good men every where, are only a part of the great rewards which they deserve, and which we hope they may long live to enjoy.

ANTI-CHRIST; OR THE SPIRIT OF SECT AND SCHISM.—We continue the extracts already made from this work. And we again ask our readers, patient consideration of the important conclusions arrived at by the learned and experienced German Reformed Minister. We were quoting from "the Marks of Antichrist with reference particularly to the Sect system." We must add a few brief notable extracts from these "Marks."

"Sects disown history. To them the past is no womb of the present in the life of the Church. Their Christianity is always ex nihilo, direct from the clouds. (Acts xix. 35.) Sects have no faith in organic grace; a power involved in the actual constitution of the Church, historically considered, for the accomplishment of its own ends; no faith in baptism or educational religion. Conversion, for them, is ever something abrupt. And the spiritual life that follows, carries always the same character. It is bound to particular seasons and occasions, and comes to no steady union with life as a whole. The religion which affects to storm the heavens in the social conference to-night, has no power, and, as it might seem, no disposition, even, to sanctify the counting-room or shop to-morrow. It is made up of two lives—one pertaining to this world, and one pertaining to the next, between which it moves dualistically, with scarce an effort to bring them together. Sect piety is ever like the legs of the lame—unequal, unsteady, and full of contradiction.

Christianity, in its own nature, is world-embracing, and seeks to sanctify to its own use every sphere of the world's true and proper life. It is universally characteristic of Sects, on the contrary, that they admit no such catholic view of its nature, but are disposed rather to look with dark, malignant glance on the whole natural constitution of the world as something intrinsically bad. Science, art, politics and social life, are, for the genuine Sectarian, always more or less profane. His Gnostic Christ dooms him to perpetual imprisonment, gloomy and sad, in the labyrinth of a Manichaean World."

Ninth Mark.—"Sectarianism is always fanatical; either in the way of wild excitement, or quiet bigotry and prejudice; which are different stages only of the same moral disease. It affects to be strong, and yet has no strength in fact. Its earnestness runs into passion; in which form it becomes necessarily more or less unnatural and excessive; with the certainty of ending, sooner or later, in self-exhaustion and collapse. It is only the catholic Christianity, resting in the faith of divine powers objectively present, through Jesus Christ in the Church, that can be at once profoundly earnest and profoundly calm. The religion of Sect can never have the same character. It is unquiet, irregular, spasmodic; substitutes feeling for faith; moves always by impulse and effort; runs into excesses; alternates between extremes. Its image, at best, is the whirlwind or mountain torrent, the very violence of whose action is a symptom of their own transient nature, and an argument that their strength itself is something hollow and unreal.

Tenth Mark.—Antichrist is known still farther as a spirit of endless division. Christianity, as the deepest life of the world, is necessarily universal and catholic. In Christ Jesus there is neither circumcision nor uncircumcision, but a new creation, in which all other distinctions are abolished or reconciled. The Christian consciousness, as such, cannot allow itself to be subordinated to any other consciousness; for this would imply that Christ is not the last fundamental fact in the world's life. Any consciousness, on the other hand, that stops short of this fact, that does not move truly and really in the sense of what is comprehended in the person of Christ, as the Word made flesh, must necessarily be particular and incomplete; and if, with this character, it still affect, notwithstanding, to be the Christian consciousness itself, it must show itself, of course, to the same extent, uncatholic, also, and schismatic. Where the sense of a real Christ is wanting, there can be, as we have seen, no sense of a real Church; the new creation resolves itself into a world of phantasms and dreams, or, at best, into a system of spiritual verities, which men are to appropriate only in the way of thought and feeling; all is subjective, and for this very reason dependent finally on the mind of the subject for its particular form. A spiritualistic, subjective Christianity, may be said to carry the idea of schism in its very constitution.

Our modern Sect system, therefore, is but a fair revelation of the true character of this spirit, as it has prevailed from the beginning. It divides Christ on principle; in full correspondence thus with its own theoretical counterpart, rationalism; to which, in like manner, Christ is no original, universal fact, with which all Christian thinking is required to begin, but a mere theorem or problem, rather, for the exercise of thought in a different way.

Sectarianism goes throughout on the assumption, that there is no holy catholic Church in this world, one and universal, by its very conception, as the person of the Saviour himself; but that the Church is simply what men may choose to make it, for their own accommodation, in conformity with the general law of their social nature. Men have a right, it is pretended, if they are not satisfied with the Church as they find it, to secede, and form a new organization more to their own taste, or the Church may rend itself into two bodies, with more or less violence, and each continue to be as much a Church as before. The principle in this way becomes one of unlimited division; if it be proper to have fifty Sects, we may as easily allow five hundred or five thousand; it follows, at least, that any congregation, is competent at any time to erect a separate standard in the name of the Church, and carry away with it all the powers that this divine constitution may be supposed to comprehend.* But is not this palpably to overthrow the idea of the Church entirely—transferring it to the clouds, or sinking it to the character of a mere abstraction?

The Sectarian consciousness can never be a true Church consciousness; as the particular can never truly stand in the place of the general; but necessarily becomes false by any such pretension. Ordinarily, indeed, Sects do not lay claim to the character of universalness. Their consciousness itself is such as excludes the idea of catholicity or church wholeness. They may be exclusive; are so at bottom always; but their exclusiveness is that of party, based on the sense of some subjective distinction, not the homage which faith renders to the objective fact of Christianity itself. Hence Sects commonly allow, that the Church is more comprehensive than their particular communions. They claim to be, each for itself, not the only way, but simply the best way, to heaven: not the Church, as though there were no other; but only a Church, or, as the thing more readily expresses itself, a society, connection, or religious persuasion rather, in which is collected the cream of true religion, with due allowance for something at least of the same life, to show itself also under other forms. In all this, however, there is vast contradiction. The Sect consciousness owns itself for something less than the whole, and still requires the whole to do it homage, as though it were universal and supreme. Christianity is allowed to be deeper and broader than itself, and yet it is treated, in fact, as a subordinate sphere of life. The Sect consciousness is not borne and carried into the Church consciousness, but by its very nature affects to be itself the bearer rather of this last; a clear, practical solecism, which of necessity upsets the conception of a real, objective, holy catholic Church altogether. Sects profess to honor the universal Church, but it is perfectly plain that they honor themselves a great deal more. They acknowledge and exclude one another at the same moment. They are not co-ordinate departments of the same one Christian life; the distinction which divides them, is stronger than the bond that should hold them together. So far as they may seem to come together at all, it is not by entering into the sense of the Church as a real whole, of which they are only parts, but by setting aside altogether the idea of any such Church. Sects may enter into an alliance or league as Sects; but such union is no Church, and the catholicity thus pretended is itself but wholesale schism in disguise. It belongs to this antichristian, no-church spirit to rend asunder and divide, while it has no power whatever to heal and make whole. It is constitutionally schismatic, and may be known and distinguished by this mark, all the world over.

We come now to the Fourth Head of the Discourse—"THE SECT PLAGUE AND ITS REMEDY."

It is one of the favorable indications of the time, that few are willing now to stand forward as the open and formal apologists of the Sect system. Not many years since, this was quite common. New Sects were publicly proclaimed a blessing to the Church. They served, it was said, to separate discordant elements in its constitution; to provoke to good works; to act as a system of mutual checks and balances, in its general organization; to increase its efficiency, by a proper division of labor. In this view, it was fashionable to speak of them as the legitimate form of Christianity itself, which as such might be expected to reach forward, with full force, into the period of the millennium; when the Church is to appear "fair as the moon, clear as the sun, and terrible as an army with banners."†

It is a wonder, indeed, that any could ever be carried so far out of the way, with the New Testament in their hands, as to plead for the Sect system on principle. It stands plainly in broad contradiction to the teaching of the Apostles, and the express will of Christ. The sense of the whole Gospel on the subject, may be said to be summarily comprehended in that memorable, and deeply-touching prayer: "Neither pray I for these alone, but for them also which shall believe in me through their word; that they all may be one; as thou, Father, art in me, and I in thee, that they also may be one in us; that the world may believe that thou hast sent me."

But it is not simply particular declarations of Christ and his Apostles, that are contradicted by the Sect system; it is opposed to the whole idea of Christianity and the Church. This we have endeavored to show in the present tract. Christ is the last and deepest principle of humanity, which as such is required to take up the whole, in the way of organic unity, into the new order of life, thus introduced into the world. The idea of a nation or state is not thus universal, because it is based on nature primarily, which as such always implies distinction and multiplicity; there may be many nations without any sort of violence to the conception of man. But the idea of the Church can bear no such rupture; it is universal necessarily, as being in truth the only proper expression of man's universal life itself. To such universality, as we have already seen, neither Paganism nor Judaism, in themselves considered, had any power to come. Christ is the true sense of the world, the absolute religion of man, in which all previous forms of consciousness are required to pass forever away. Christianity, as springing from him in the Church, may indeed still admit distinctions; but only in such a way, as the body may have parts, continuing itself to be, notwithstanding, the one true and only whole, in which all are carried and included as a single life. It can endure no such rupture as violates the organic oneness of its own nature. Christianity must be the deepest and most universal form of life, the trunk consciousness, if the word may be allowed, to which all spiritual distinctions besides, Greek, Jew, male, female, bond, free, &c., stand related simply as diverging branches that spring from the same tree. This indubitably is the true idea of Christianity; and it is this idea rather than any formal statements on the subject in the New Testament, which conducts us finally to the article of the "One, Holy, Catholic Church," as it has stood in the Creed of the whole Christian world, from the beginning. No one can enter far into the consciousness of what Christ was and is still, without feeling the authority of this article. To deny it, is virtually to fall back to the standpoint of the world as it exists on the outside of the Christian mystery. It is to be entangled again in the old Gentile consciousness or in that of the Jew.

After this review of the general misery comprehended in our reigning Sect system, we are prepared to notice in conclusion its proper Remedy.

It will be seen at once, of course, that we have no sympathy whatever with those who imagine that all which is wanted here, is the violent overthrow in any way of outward denominational distinctions, as they now stand. We wage no crusade against Sects, in this form. Of what avail would it be to strike all of them dead at a single blow, if the Sect life be left still in force, ready to sprout forth into new similar creations the next day? Such merely negative destructional opposition to Sects, is itself necessarily sectarian also in its very constitution, and can only issue at best accordingly in some new no-sect Sect, which is likely to be as narrow and rabid in its own way, as any of the rest.‡

Just as little can we make common cause, with those who make the idea of catholicity to consist in a certain liberality, which shows itself indifferent at least to all religious distinctions, and overcomes the Sect consciousness by bringing it to dissolve

* A very favorite way of representing the subject, at one time, was to compare the different denominations to the several different kinds of soldiers that go to make up a regular army. More beautiful is the illustration (the last we have seen of the sort), brought forward in connection with the late "Christian Alliance" movement by a distinguished orator from the Established Church of Scotland, making the several denominations to be so many chords, whose combined music constitutes the harmony of the one, holy, universal Church! Alas, that so pretty a fancy should have so little truth in fact.

† Witness the sect of the "Christians," as they call themselves, in the West, the "Campbellites," or "Disciples of Christ," the "Church of God," as founded a few years since by John Winebreuner, &c. All these agree in casting off creeds and tradition, and going back to the Bible. That is, they are absolutely unhistorical; and for this very reason their pretended catholicity has no contents or substance whatever.

simply in the sense of our life as a mere natural whole. Here, as before, the process of reconciliation is wholly negative and destructional; it surrenders, so far as it may prevail, the positive substance of Christianity, and lands us in a unity, which is the mere show of truth and faith, without their power. Against such spurious catholicity, often like an angel of light, we have need to stand constantly upon our guard. Caricature as the Sect life always is of the true life of the Church, it still involves at bottom some apprehension of a positive new creation in Christ Jesus, which as such must needs be exclusive in order to be really catholic; and this, in any case, is something better than the "liberal Christianity," that in giving up the caricature parts also with the idea of the Church itself, and becomes universal only by including nothing.

Equally plain is it, however, that no faith is to be reposed in the dream of any thing like a free construction of catholic unity, by counsel and compact, among the different Sects themselves. To think of their ever consenting to merge their existence in a new common church organization, would be, of course, perfectly extravagant. Every Sect has power to multiply its own bad life, like the polypus, by new sections and slips; but no single two of them, it seems, have power to come together again, in the way of full organic union. In this aspect, the system offers no hope for the future, but a prospect only of blank despair. The most to be expected from it, then, would be, an outward federal union of Sects, leaving each to its present independence, with some loose covenant and creed to represent the whole. But such a confederation, could it be made real, would be no Church; so far as this conception might continue to have force, it would remain bound only to the separate Sects as such. And who may not see, that in the very nature of any such transaction, the Sect consciousness is left to assert throughout its own supremacy over the sense of the Church, something more wide than itself? It is just like the French Convention of Jacobin memory, after the prostration of throne and altar, legislating into authority the existence of a "Supreme Being!" The Sects here, in solemn parliament assembled, each fully persuaded of its own indefeasible sovereignty and power, undertake to create a universal Church; not fully sure, indeed, whether there be any Holy Catholic Church, in the sense of the ancient creed; but honestly-minded, at all events, to bring something of the sort to pass, if God so please, and then see how it will work. But what is all this, less than an impudent affectation, of mastering the Church consciousness, into base subordination to the Sect consciousness, and making the whole thus to be the mere creature of its own parts? Every such pretension is systematic and uncatholic in its very nature; and so far as it may ever prevail, runs out necessarily into the same merely indifferentistic liberalism which we have already noticed. Nothing is more easy or common than the union of such false catholicity, in one aspect, with the full bigotry of Sect in another.* They belong to the same general sphere; different sides, only, of the antichristian life; the Gentile consciousness and that of the Jew, playing into each other for self-support, with equal wrong on both sides to the mystery of the one universal Church, as constituted and revealed in Jesus Christ.

We have no hesitation, then, in saying that all redemption from the power of the Sect plague, must begin with a revival of true and hearty faith, in the ancient article of One, Holy, Catholic Church.

The idea of the Church, in the first place, is the only effective measure of schism. It is to this, precisely, what the moral law is to the conception of sin. Where there is no law, we are told, there is no sin; the sense of the last springs only from the sense of the first. So, where there is no Church, there can be no schism; no proper apprehension of it, at least, where it may prevail in fact. As long as men are disposed to deny the existence of one catholic Church, or to place it in the clouds merely as an invisible abstraction, or to substitute for it the negation and shadow of a simply ethnic brotherhood, it must be in vain to preach to them the evils of division and schism. They can have, at best, only a partial conception of their nature, and will not be engaged, of course, to put forth any strenuous desire or effort after deliverance.

The only help here, it should be clear, is in the general resuscitation of a sound Church feeling, as something deeper and more comprehensive than the feeling of Sect. Let this wake into life, to some proper extent, and it would be of more force to stem the course of sectarian fanaticism in a short time, than long years of argument and testimony exhibited in our present state. No one would think, then, of vindicating our Sect system, as the ultimate and normal order of Christianity; but all must feel themselves bound to condemn it, and to mourn over it, as a captivity to the iron reign of schism, with longing anticipation of the day when God shall happily bring it to an end.

And so again, it is only by the force of such resuscitated faith in the Church, in the second place, that the way can be opened at all for any return out of this bondage, into the land of true catholicity and peace. It requires, surely, no very deep reflection, to perceive the force of this proposition. The Sect consciousness, as such, can never bring men beyond its own sphere; can never lead them into the clear knowledge of the Church, and of course still less into its full life. All this must come from a different quarter, the living apprehension namely of the idea of the Church itself, as an objective reality in the world.

For it will be observed, that we speak throughout of the catholic Church as an object of faith, which in this view must be regarded as something at once supernatural and real. So it is exhibited to us in the Creed. It is not a mere notion, or abstraction, or subjective creation of the human mind, in any form; but includes in itself an objective being, as we have seen, no less real and abiding than the person of Christ himself, from which it starts. This it is, precisely, that makes the great difference between spurious ethnic catholicity, as exhibited to us in world conventions, or mere stage displays, and catholicity under its genuine form. The first holds only in the region of natural thought and feeling, and disturbs not necessarily, in the least, the inward habit of the Sect mind from which it springs; to admit the existence of a Holy Catholic Church, in such a case, is no more than to admit the existence of a British Parliament,

* Mr. Rupp, in his "Original History of the Religious Denominations, at present existing in the United States," 1844, gives us a list of between forty and fifty sects, which are here allowed to represent their own faith. But this, it seems, was much short of the truth, at least as it stands now. The same gentleman has issued proposals lately for a new work, to contain "authentic accounts of upwards of seventy religious denominations, associations and sects," belonging to the fruitful history of our country.

Churchman? His mother, under God; and who ought to instruct England's mothers in Churchmanship, but England's Church. Whereas, what is the case? young ladies are sent to fashionable schools, where they learn fancy work, embroidery, French, Italian, German, music, singing, dancing, &c.; all proper accomplishments, indeed; but where is the one thing needful, all the time? Is religion interwoven with their everyday's occupation? Does it throw its colouring over their daily avocations? Is the Church's teaching sounded in their ears, and that by its solely authorised teachers? Do early dawn and evening fall re-echo the praises of the Almighty, as they are poured forth from young and innocent hearts in the ancient soul inspiring song of the Church? Alas! we sigh to think it should not be so. We trust however that a brighter day is dawning in upon us; that there will not be wanting true spirits who, in faith will commune and carry on so noble a work. God's blessing we need not fear, will be upon it, and they will reap a reward such as the excellent Bishop of New Jersey is already doing even in this life, from the holy consciousness of being chosen instruments in God's hands to establish and strengthen His Church, and from the reverent affection and love with which their pupils will, in all time, not cease to regard them.

Feast of St. James, 1848. A SON OF THE CHURCH.

P.S. I received the Communion to-day in the Chapel. There were present five Clergy in surplices, and about sixty-five Communicants, some of whom were friends of the pupils.

From the same paper we take the following noble example well worthy of imitation.

A GOOD EXAMPLE.—At a dinner given to the workpeople of the Right Hon. Thomas Pemberton Leigh, at Hindley, near Wigan, on Saturday last, the hon. gentleman, in drinking the healths of those present, concluded some very excellent remarks by the following noble and praiseworthy declaration. The dinner was given, as is customary, previous to the departure of the honourable gentleman from the neighbourhood. He said—"There was one thing he would much like to see, and that was, men endeavouring to save something for a rainy day; and he was quite sure that, in many instances, it only required a beginning. In order to accomplish this, and to make a commencement, he would on the Monday following place to the credit of every one of his workmen, in the Wigan Savings Bank, 2/-, and when he had done so, they would have perfect control over that sum. Further he should not interfere, as every man had a perfect right to do what he pleased with his own. They might draw it out and spend it if they thought proper; for after he had given it to them, it was their own, and he wished no more control over it. At the same time he would strongly advise them to save; he was, however, well aware how difficult a matter that was for a labouring man with a family. Still there were often small sums—threepence, sixpence, or a shilling—which he might put by if he had a fund to add it to, but which, otherwise, he would spend at the public house. Any sum, however small, Mr. Ellison (his agent) would receive, and pay into the Bank for them; and by way of encouragement, every addition so made in every twelve months he would double. If any man added 5s., he would add 10s.; if any one had added 10s., he would add 1/-; if any one of them had added 1/- he would add 2/- Those, therefore, who had saved 20s., would have 5/- with interest to their credit at the bank at the end of the year. He should be glad to find that they had done so. He would make no further inquiries, but, at the proper time, they would bring their books to his excellent agent, Mr. Ellison, who, he was sure, would carry out his wishes. It gave him great pleasure, he said, to see them all around him, and he concluded by drinking their good healths."

FOR THE SUMMER TERM.

The bell to rise rings at 5 A. M. In 15 minutes all students are required to be present in the Conversation Hall, from whence they go by sections to the Wash Room. While one section is washing, the other is engaged at Recitation of spelling, or analysis of words.

At quarter past 6 the bell rings for prayers. The whole family assembles. The "Word for the Day" is given and commented upon by the Rector. The first lesson from the calendar and a portion of the Psalter are read. The Gloria Patri is sung, the creed is recited and appropriate family prayers are offered. A few minutes after prayers all proceed quietly to the Dining Room, and after a short grace by the Rector sit down to Breakfast. This meal generally requires 20 minutes. At 7 the different divisions march from the Dining Room and are dismissed for recreation until half past 7. The bell then calls both Seniors and Juniors to proceed to their respective Halls to form a line before going to study. This plan is invariably adopted to prevent rushing and the confusion attendant upon it. Entering the Study each boy stands at his desk, with his Bible. The "Word for the Day" is repeated; the Morning Hymn is sung; the second Lesson from the Calendar is read by the pupils in rotation, a short prayer for guidance is offered, and at quarter before 8 the work commences. From this until 12 o'clock there are periods for study and recitation to the different Professors and Instructors. At half-past 9 and at 11 intermissions are granted of 10 minutes to prevent the necessity of leaving Study or Recitation room during the Hours of Work. At 12 o'clock the bell gives the signal for recreation. The word for the day is repeated and all proceed in order from the Study to play. A short service is now held in the Church, attendance upon which is wholly voluntary. Many of the pupils attend, especially such as have been confirmed. The prayers are taken from the Liturgy, with the addition of a few specially suited to the nature and duties of the family. At one o'clock the bell rings for dinner. All go to the wash room, and at 10 minutes after 1 are inspected upon section line, to see that personal neatness in all respects is carefully observed. From half past 1 to half past 2 there is an hour for recreation. At half-past 2 study and recitation are resumed and continue until 5 o'clock, when the reports of delinquency and disorder are read. Those who have worked diligently are dismissed to play upon the different section grounds under the care of the Instructors; the delinquents are detained to make up for neglect; the rule of discipline being; if a boy plays when he ought to work:—he must work when he might play. At half past 6 the bell calls all to the Hall, whence they march in order to tea. After tea until dark all are engaged at play. About 8 o'clock the signal is given for evening family prayers, after which all proceed to the Study. Five minutes are given for private reading of the Holy Scripture, and questions for self-examination are read by the Rector, accompanied with remarks which may have been suggested by some occurrence during the day. After this, half an hour is devoted to study. At 9 o'clock the bell rings for bed. The Word for the Day is repeated. The evening hymn is sung and each boy bids the Rector "good night," and goes to his dormitory, (which is under the charge of an Instructor,) to sleep until the bell arouses him in the morning. Proper time is given for private prayer both morning and evening. In the dormitory the Instructor reads an interesting book for half an hour after all are in bed,—and then our little world is as silent as if there were but two or three under the roof.

On Wednesday and Saturday the school is dismissed at one o'clock, and the whole afternoon allowed for recreation, except in case of delinquents. Long walks, &c., are now enjoyed in the company of Instructors. On Tuesday and Thursday evenings choral singing takes the place of study at half past 8. The order of Sunday is quite different. The object of the arrangement is, to make Sunday a day of cheerful holiness. The boys are permitted to walk about in small parties; they practise sacred music for Church service; and they have appropriate books to read. After attending Public Morning and Evening Worship in the Church, and reciting the Sacred Lessons, every thing is done to make the day cheerfully and happily sacred. Thus we proceed, from day to day, and week to week; hoping to accomplish good results by a patient continuance of our routine of duty. 8 hours per day are given to hard study. 8 hours to sleep. 8 hours to recreation, meals, and ordinary personal and family duties. We begin and end the day with prayer. The frequent repetition of the "Word for the Day," is a memento of some religious truth; and thus we seek to know God in all our works. We desire to live together as heirs of a better world than that which we now enjoy.

Innocence is wise. The promptings of a pure heart are as the intuitions of a clear intellect.—Wilson.

MR. EDITOR:—

In lately looking over the 30th volume of Littell's "Museum of Foreign Literature, Science, and Art," for 1836 I met with the subjoined beautiful effusion, taken from the (London) Christian Observer.—It may be as new to many of your readers as it was to me, and I am sure will afford them no less pleasure.

Rev. J. Coleman

The Dead in Christ.

(By the Right Reverend Bishop Doane, of New Jersey, from the Appendix to the second edition of the Rev. Thomas Hartwell Horne's "Manual for the Afflicted.")

Lift not thou the wailing voice;
Weep not; 'tis a Christian dieth;
Up, where blessed Saints rejoice,
Ransomed now the spirit fieth:
High in heaven's own light she dwelleth,
Full the song of triumph swelleth,
Freed from earth, and earthly failing,
Lift for her no voice of wailing.

Pour not thou the bitter tear;
Heaven its book of comfort ope;
Bids thee sorrow not, nor fear,
But as one who always hopeth:
Humbly here in faith relying,
Peacefully in Jesus dying,
Heavenly joy her eye is flushing,
Why should thine with tears be gushing?

They who die in Christ are blest;
Ours then be no thought of grieving;
Sweetly with their God they rest,
All their toils and troubles leaving:
So be ours the faith that saveth,
Hope that every trial braveth,
Love that to the end endureth,
And, through Christ, the crown secureth.

The following extract of a Discourse, delivered in a village where a beautiful new church is now springing up to the glory of God, is sent to the Banner, with the hope that it may be an humble means of doing good elsewhere.—NORTH CAROLINA.

Psalm 84, (1 and 2).—"How amiable are thy tabernacles, O Lord of Hosts! My soul longeth, yea, even fainteth for the courts of the Lord."

The translation of the Psalms contained in the Prayer-book is somewhat different from that in our Bible. Our Prayer-book psalms are rendered out of a Latin translation of the Hebrew, commonly called the Vulgate, and therefore the first two or three words in Latin are prefixed to each psalm, but the Psalms in the Bible were turned by the English translators of the Bible immediately out of the Hebrew, their original language. The difference between them is mostly verbal, but sometimes a clearer sense may be had out of one than out of the other. The Prayer-book version of our text is as follows: "O how amiable are thy dwellings, thou Lord of Hosts—my soul hath a desire and longing to enter into the courts of the Lord." The difference here consists entirely in the words—the thing intended in both is to express the loveliness and excellence of that place which is consecrated unto the service of Almighty God. This in the text is styled the tabernacle of God, because the first visible dwelling of Jehovah among his people in the wilderness was a tabernacle or tent. The people at that time were in the wilderness journeying toward the promised land, and God's dwelling was a moveable tent of costly materials confided to the care of the Levites; so that his presence might go with the armies of Israel wherever they went. After the good land had been gained and the weary wanderings were over, the tabernacles (for there were two, one within the other) were set up in Shiloh, and God had no other dwelling-place for four or five hundred years. When King Solomon at length had built the temple at Jerusalem, he brought into it the tabernacles of the Lord, with all the holy vessels—and so the temple became God's dwelling on earth. But the temple was destroyed on account of the wickedness of the Jews. God refused to have his home any longer among them. Where is his home now on the earth? "Thus saith the lofty one that inhabiteth Eternity, I dwell with him that is of a contrite and humble spirit,"—but besides he has his appointed dwellings among christians now as he had among the Jews of old—the places where the sacrifice of praise and prayer is offered, where his law is read and explained to the people, where children come to be regenerated in baptism by the Holy Ghost and in maturer years set the seal to their baptismal vows in the ordinance of confirmation, and then go on to perfection in the communion of the body and blood of Christ, given to be the nourishment of the soul, as manna was given for the nourishment of the body.

"O how amiable—how lovely are thy dwellings, thy churches, thou Lord of Hosts—my soul hath a desire and longing to enter into the courts of the Lord." These were the sentiments of David when driven from Jerusalem by the unnatural conduct of his son Absalom across the river Jordan. There in his exile, the sweet psalmist of Israel, brooded over the light of other days; he poured out his disconsolate soul in grief, because he thought on the multitude that used to go with him to the house of God with the voice of joy and praise while they kept their sacred holiday. "Why art thou cast down, O my soul?"—moaned the sweet singer of Israel—"for in the day-time his loving-kindness shall be with thee, and in the night his songs shall not fail thee—only, unto the God of thy life, offer thy prayer." But was it not a sore trial for the King of Israel thus to be bereaved of the presence of the dwelling of the Most High, where his heart had nestled its fondest joy and his holiest associations had clustered as around his most loved and most sacred thing—even the altar of his King and his God? The sparrow had found her a house there and the swallow a nest for herself there, where she might lay her young in quiet, but himself had not the holy place whither he might come up and worship with freedom from care and sorrow, with peace and gladness of spirit. Banished from his altar, it seemed that he had been banished too out of the memory of his God—"I will say unto the God of my health—why hast thou forgotten me?"

"O how amiable are thy tabernacles, thou Lord of Hosts—my soul longeth, yea, even fainteth for the courts of the Lord." In all the circumstances of his varied life, King David showed himself solicitous for the tabernacle and service of God. They were uppermost in his thoughts, in misfortune and in prosperity—across the Jordan, in exile and upon his throne in Jerusalem. In the book of Samuel, we read of the uneasiness he expressed to Nathan the Prophet at the thought of his dwelling in the palace of cedar, while the ark of God, the symbol of his power, dwelt only within the curtains of a tent; and we find him solemnly vowing not to inhabit his own house, until he had brought the ark into Zion, where the temple was afterwards erected. "I will not come within the tabernacle of any house, nor climb up into my bed—I will not suffer mine eye to sleep nor mine eyelids to slumber, neither temples of my head to take any rest, until I find out a place for the temple of the Lord, a habitation for the mighty God of Jacob." David could take pleasure nor rest, until a place was prepared for the residence neither of Jehovah in the midst of his people, and after that God had expressly assigned the building of his temple to Solomon his son, he gave himself to laying up costly materials for the work—gold, and silver and precious stones, which were afterwards employed by his successor in rearing the magnificent and mystic temple of Jerusalem or Mount Zion—for David said—"Solomon my son is young and tender, and the house that is to be builded for the Lord must be exceeding magnificent, of fame and of glory throughout all countries. I will now, therefore, make preparation for it. So David prepared abundantly before his death." David also commanded all the princes of Israel to help Solomon his son, saying, "Is not the Lord your God with you? Now set your heart and your soul to seek the Lord your God—and arise, therefore, and build ye the sanctuary of the Lord."

Brethren of the congregation, I address David's words unto you—"Arise and build ye the sanctuary of the Lord." In God's name, I call you to this good work. I invoke you by the example of God's people in the wilderness, who came, says the sacred text, "every one whose heart stirred him up and every one whom his spirit made willing, and they brought the Lord's offering to the work of the Tabernacle of the congregation for all his service and for the holy garments;" "and all the women that were wise-hearted did spin with their hands, and brought that which they had spun, blue and purple, and of scarlet and of fine linen." So that Moses had actually to restrain the people from bringing—"for the stuff they had contributed was sufficient for all the work to make it and too much." Oh! for that spirit of noble and generous giving, which has to be restrained in the Lord's work, because it is too much—more than enough for the service of the work which the Lord has commanded to make.

I invoke you, by the example of the same people of God in their captivity, by the rivers of Babylon, where they mingled their tears with the flowing waters as they remembered Zion, and hanged their harps upon the weeping willows rather than indulged in the ill-timed mirth of singing one of the "Songs of Zion in a strange place"—till at last God visited them in their desolation—"then rose up the chief of the fathers of Judah and Benjamin, and the priests and the Levites, with all them whose spirit God had raised, to go up to build the house of the Lord which is in Jerusalem;" and when at last the builders laid the foundation of the temple of the Lord, "then all the sons of music sang together by course in praising and giving thanks unto the Lord," "because he is good, for his mercy endureth for ever." Too long has your God been without a home among you, brethren of the congregation—and had no certain resting-place to lay his head nor where his honor might dwell. "Who is there among you of all his people?" said Cyrus to the weeping Jesus in the land of their captivity, "his God be with him and let him go up and build the house of the Lord God of Israel. (He is the God)."

Who is there here among you of all his people? His God be with him, and let him strengthen his hands for this good work unto which I call you this day and he shall receive the Lord's blessing. Let there be no longer delay or interruption; but say it with the zealous-hearted Nehemiah unto the enemies that thought to do him mischief, "I am doing a great work—so that I cannot come down? why should the work cease whilst I leave it and come down to you? and though they sent unto him four times, yet he answered them after the same manner." God will indeed dwell on the earth, though the heaven and heaven of heavens cannot contain him, much less a house made with hands, yet will he have respect unto the prayers of his servants there and his eyes will be open toward his house night and day—even toward the place of which he has said, my name shall be there.

"O how amiable are thy dwellings, thou Lord of Hosts, my soul hath a desire and longing to enter into the courts of the Lord's House."

May we through the spirit of Holiness, become holy as God holy, and be admitted for Christ's sake into heaven, that holy of holies, that church—building, not made with hands, where are joys inconceivable and pleasures for ever more.

MR. EDITOR:—

I am a Missionary of Christ's Church, laboring on the very outskirts of civilization. The vows of the Church are upon me; and I stand to herald the gospel in these Western wilds. I see around me victims of delusion, tossed on the restless waves of error. I pray God, through his Church, to pour the oil of comfort on these troubled waters. It must needs be, that I look, with an eye of interest, to the general movements of the Church. I was joyed at the happy termination of the General Convention; but soon a small cloud appeared on the horizon. The "Recorder" said something about a new society, to mend our ills. I trembled at the prospect. I felt that, if we could be free from internal discord, the pure gospel would soon cover the land. The prospect of a new set of Tractarians was by no means welcome.

But, my dear sir, how far short of reality were my expectations. I did not expect an organized system of agitation.

I have just read a pamphlet (from whence I know not), entitled "The Constitution and Address of the Cincinnati Society for the promotion of Evangelical Knowledge, auxiliary to the Protestant Episcopal Society, for the same object." It is nothing less than a fire-brand. I have been startled at every step, in reading it. I am told on the first page of the "address" that the immediate object of the society is to limit the spread of the publications of the General Protestant Episcopal S. S. Union. I find at every step a spirit of revolution. Bishops and Presbyters of Christ's Church are arraigned before these partial judges, and condemned without trial.

I am told, sir, that our S. S. Union has published books contrary to the principles of the English Reformation. I am told that Bishops, Priests and Deacons, Professors of Divinity, Theological writers and authors of Tracts and S. S. Books, are heretics. But, Mr. Editor, who has so decided it? Did the Convention of the whole Church make the solemn declaration? Did the Church ever, in any form, declare the S. S. Union the author of heretical works? Did any committee by order of the authorities ascertain that so great a mass of the Clergy of the Church are heretics? If not, how dare the authors of this address utter the slander? has any examination ever been held, by which it ascertains that these men, who inveigh so loudly against their brethren, are not themselves deficient in the truth?

Here is a society, officered by one Bishop, four Presbyters, and fifteen Laymen, who virtually declare themselves the Church. They have taken into their hands the keeping of the Church. In their eyes Christ's promise to be with his Church has failed; and for the preservation of our dear souls, they have come to the rescue! Yes, sir! here, in this pamphlet, it is put forth to the world, that our Bishops are heretics, our Clergy and the Laity asleep. As for the two first, they are hopeless, but the Laity, "the dear people" must be "awakened." I am here strongly reminded of a humorous story about lard oil being cheaper than daylight in Cincinnati. For it seems that these fifteen gentlemen who have spent their lives in selling merchandize, getting gain, and other secular pursuits, know more about the gospel and the Church—more about the principles of the Reformation and our Church standards, Divinity and Theology, Tracts and S. S. Books, Theological treatises, &c. &c., than our old Divines who have made such things their study from their youth up. Truly this is wondrous, and could only happen in such an enlightened city as Cincinnati.

Mr. Editor, I do not review the pamphlet. I have been led farther in my remarks than I intended to go. I simply wish to enter my protest against such incendiary publications; and I do this simply as an humble member of Christ's Church. I am called or esteemed a heretic by these gentlemen. I could use hard words too, but my Saviour has taught me not to call my brother a fool.

I trust still that the good sense of the Church will resist these reckless agitators.

Baptismal Regeneration.

Bishop Melvaine introduces to the favor of the American public Melvill's sermons. He states in his preface—"It can hardly be necessary to say that in causing a volume to issue from the press as this does, one does not make himself responsible for every jot and tittle that it contains. It may be calculated powerfully to arrest attention . . . though we be not prepared to concur with its author in some minor thoughts or incidental ideas on which none of the great matters in this volume depend."

The doctrine of Baptism, Bishop Melvaine does not class among minor things, and he certainly cannot rank it among the incidental ideas of Melvill's discourses, since a whole sermon is there devoted to it. That sermon, entitled "The Spirit upon the Waters," is a correct exposition of the views of High Churchmen, and I for one am obliged to Bishop Melvaine for spreading it before the American public, though I am rather surprised that he has given it his sanction.

Here is an extract from that sermon, with which the other parts are in excellent keeping:—

"That the Church of England does hold and does teach, Baptismal Regeneration, would never, we venture to think, have been disputed, had not men been anxious to remain in her communion, and yet to make her formulae square with their own private notions."

"The words put into the mouth of the officiating minister immediately after every Baptism, 'seeing now dearly beloved that this child is regenerate,' seem too distinct to be explained away, and too general for any of those limitations by which some would restrain them. You may tell me the Church speaks only in the judgment of charity, on the supposition that there has been genuine faith in those who have brought the infant to the font. But even in this modified view, the Church holds baptismal regeneration: she holds, that if not invariably, yet under certain circumstances infants are regenerate only because baptized. We cannot, however, admit that the language is only the language of that charity which 'hopeth all things.' Had the Church not designed to go further than this, she might have said, 'seeing that we may charitably believe,' or 'seeing that we may charitably hope that this child is regenerate;' she could never have ventured on the broad unqualified declaration, a declaration to be made whenever the sacrament of Baptism has been administered, 'seeing that this child is regenerate;' and then have gone on to require of the congregation to express their gratitude in such words as these, 'We yield Thee hearty thanks, most merciful Father, that it hath pleased Thee to regenerate this infant with Thy Holy Spirit.' We really think that no fair, no straightforward dealing can get rid of the conclusion, that the Church holds what is called baptismal regeneration. You may dislike the doctrine; you may wish it expunged from the prayer-book; but so long as I subscribe to that prayer-book, and so long as I officiate according to the forms of that prayer-book, I do not see how I can be commonly honest, and yet deny that every baptized person is, on that account regenerate."

Such are the views of Melvill, commended to the Church by Bishop Melvaine. They are entirely consonant with the views of

A HIGH CHURCHMAN.

For the Banner of the Cross.

The effort recently made at the Rising Sun village north of the city, has resulted in the organization of a Parish under the title of St. Bartholomews'. Its prospects are quite flattering; an intelligent and large congregation already having been gathered, and increasing with every service.

A lot, through the liberality of Mrs. Dr. Smith, has been given, upon which to locate a church. Stone, of which it is designed to erect an edifice, has been also generously presented by Geo. D. Blight, Esqr.

The following gentlemen have been elected vestrymen:

The vestry seem determined to prosecute the work with vigor, and put up a church as speedily as practicable. It is a wonder that this place has been so long overlooked among the many efforts made to extend the blessings of the church, being a central position, removed at a distance of about three miles from the nearest Episcopal Church, with a rather thickly settled population for miles around. It is hoped that it will meet with that success the enterprise demands, and that liberal response from the hands of those who love the church, that will evince a true regard for the advancement of the Redeemer's kingdom.

GENERAL THEOLOGICAL SEMINARY.—The next Session of the Seminary opens on Monday, the 2d day of October. We take from the Church Almanac the following statement relative to the Qualifications for admission:

Qualifications for Admission.—Either a Certificate of being a Candidate for Holy Orders, with full qualifications; or a Certificate of religious and moral character, of classical and scientific attainments, of attachment to the Protestant Episcopal Church, and of such dispositions and habits as may render the individual apt and meet to exercise the ministry; and then passing a satisfactory examination on the following subjects; (1.) the Primary Elements of the Hebrew tongue; (2.) the Greek Grammar, and the Gospels and Acts in the original; (3.) the rules and principles of English Composition, with a specimen of composition. These examinations are strictly enforced in all cases.

New York.—Confirmations by Bishop DeLancey in the Diocese of New York.—On the 27th August, Bishop DeLancey preached twice in Zion Church, Butternuts, Otsego county, and confirmed eighteen in the morning, and one in the afternoon, having previously, in May last, confirmed one person of this parish at New Berlin, making in all nineteen persons.

On the 29th, in Christ Church, Walton, Delaware co., he preached and confirmed two persons.

On the 30th, in St. John's Church, Delhi, Delaware co., he preached and confirmed fifteen persons.

On the 31st, he preached in St. Peter's Church, Hobart, Delaware county, and confirmed three persons.

September 1st, in Grace Church, Prattsville, Green county, he preached and confirmed nine persons.

September 2d, he preached in Trinity Church, Windham, Green county, and confirmed five persons.

On the same day, in the afternoon, he preached in Calvary Church, Cario, and confirmed three persons.

On the 3d, he preached twice in St. Paul's Church, Oak Hill, Green county, and confirmed twenty-two persons.

On the 4th, he preached in Trinity Church, Rensselaerville, Albany county, and confirmed nineteen persons, including one in private.

On the 5th, he preached in Christ Church, Greenville, Green county, and confirmed four persons.

On the 6th, he preached in Trinity Church, Athens, Green county, and confirmed three persons.—Churchman.

CLERICAL CHANGES.—The Rev. Dr. Williams having resigned the Rectorship of St. George's Church, Schenectady, and entered upon his duties as President of Trinity College, has taken letters dimissory from the Diocese of New York.

The Rev. W. F. Walker from the Diocese of New York has become the Rector of Union Church, Humphreysville, Conn.

The Rev. Sylvester Nash has accepted a call to the Rectorship of St. John's Church, Essex, Conn. Mr. Walker and Mr. Nash have likewise taken dimissory letters from the Diocese of New York.

The Rev. Benjamin Franklin has taken letters dimissory from Maryland to the Diocese of New Jersey, where he has accepted an invitation to the rectorship of the new congregation organised in South Trenton.

The Rev. Henry S. Keppler has taken letters dimissory to the Diocese of Virginia.

The Rev. James Abercrombie has taken letters dimissory to the Diocese of Wisconsin.

JUVENILE DEPRAVITY.—If children could be made to understand how deeply their waywardness wounds the hearts of their parents, they might be persuaded to pause and consider their ways.

The following paragraph is taken from the N. York Churchman, in which paper it appeared, a few weeks since, as a communication.

"I extract the following from a daily paper. The thrilling and melancholy testimony it bears to the intensity of maternal feeling, gives it deep interest to all who would contemplate and study the human character. Its dreadful warning against juvenile depravity, should be most seriously pressed upon the consideration of childhood and youth."

On the 22d ult., as we learn from the Toronto Colonist, a Coroner's inquest was held on the body of Julia Felio, who came to her death under the following distressing circumstances:—

It appeared by the evidence deposed to, that the son of the deceased, a lad about ten years of age, was detected, with several other youths, in the act of stealing fruit from Mr. Hamilton's garden, and lodged in jail. The deceased made great efforts to procure bail for her son without success, and was very much excited in consequence. Seeing her husband coming along the street she approached him with two children in her arms, and when within three or four yards of him, she dropped down dead in the street. The jury returned a verdict in accordance with these facts.—Christian Witness.

hands. The hardened savages mocked at my expostulations, and laughed at my zealous anger. I had the protection of the good king; otherwise, I should hardly have escaped with my life; so irritated were they against me for telling them the truth. Hence I returned with a full conviction that the conversion of such sons of Belial is totally impracticable."

Corman sat down, not a little heated and chafed by his own vehemence. He was, in all essentials, a good man: but, as Bede speaks, he was of a somewhat too austere temperament.

A long pause followed. The Brethren knew not what to say. Segen himself, the experienced Abbot-Presbyter, was evidently perplexed.

At length, a pious Culdee, named Aidan, who was one of the holy Fraternity, rose modestly from his seat: and, being encouraged by Segen to deliver his sentiments, spoke, meekly addressing himself to Corman in manner following.

"No one, my brother, can doubt thy zeal: no one can distrust thy godly sincerity: no one can speak lightly of thy clear knowledge, both of the blessed truths, and of the real principles, of the Gospel: no one reverences thee more highly than myself: no one feels more sensibly his own spiritual inferiority. Yet may not my brother, from the best motives, have erred in method, however sound in doctrine? When the tempest, in the fable, assailed the traveller, he only girt his cloak around him the more closely. But when the warm beams of the kindly sun beat upon him; then, melting under their influence, he first opened his cloak, and at last wholly threw it off. Hast thou not been somewhat too harsh and peremptory with these ignorant barbarians! Perhaps a milder mode of dealing with them might have been more successful. As little as thyself, would I advocate a compromise between Christ and Belial: as little as thyself, would I counsel the instilling or the allowing of false principles. I desire no such converts as Coifi, whose views too exactly accorded with what Satan said unto the Lord: Doth Job fear God for nought? Put forth thine hand now, and touch all that he hath: and he will curse thee too thy face. I would only recommend the practice of the great Apostle of the Gentiles himself: I have fed you with milk, and not with meat: for hitherto, ye were not able to bear it: neither yet now are ye able. Peradventure, if the milk of milder teaching were first offered to these sturdy Saxons, they, being thus nourished by the word of God, might be gradually led on to the strong meat of his more perfect and more sublime precepts."

Aidan sat down, with his eyes diffidently fixed on the ground: for he felt that he admonished one older and better than himself.

But the whole Chapter instantly perceived the wisdom of his counsel: and could scarcely wait to hear the judgment of the Abbot.

"Our brother Aidan," said the venerable Segen with a benevolent smile of full approbation, "hath spoken wisely and well. But who so fit to carry his advice into effect, as the person who hath given it?—Right worthy is he of the Episcopate: and most fit is he to instruct the ignorant and the unbeliever, who is thus endowed with the grace of discretion, which is the mother of all virtues."

The whole Chapter joined in acclamation: and Aidan was consecrated Bishop of the Northumbrian episcopate. Recollecting the Holy Island of Iona, the chief seat of the pious and uncorrupt Culdee Brethren, he, from an early association of ideas, fixed his episcopal see in Lindisfarne, which itself still bears the ordinary name of Holy Island. He was completely successful in his mission: and, by kindness and gentleness, he brought the apparently impracticable Saxons to the knowledge of Christ. Thus did our great northern Bishopric of Durham derive its permanent Christianity, not from Rome but from Iona; not from the associates of the lordly Augustine, but from the holy and humble Culdees.

Bede remarks of this good man: that one great secret, of his successful commending of his doctrine to others, was that he lived as he taught.

"He cared nothing," says the venerable historian, "for the good things of this world: but, whatever was given him by kings or by nobles, that he dispensed to the poor. He would travel through all sorts of places, whether urban or rustic, not on horseback, but on foot: unless some great necessity compelled him to use a horse. Whenever, in his walks, he met with either rich or poor, he would immediately accost them, inviting such as were unbelievers to receive the Sacrament of Faith, and strengthening such as were believers to continue in the faith, and to walk worthily of it by alms-giving and good works."

Such was Aidan the successful Culdee missionary of our great northern diocese.

The Happy Man.

BY BISHOP HALL.

He is the happy man that hath learned to read himself more than all books, and hath so taken out this lesson that he can never forget it; that knows the world, and cares not for it; that, after many traverses of thoughts, is grown to know what he may trust to, and stand now equally armed for all events; that hath got the mastery at home, so that he can cross his will without a mutiny, and so please it that he makes it not a wanton; that in earthly things wishes no more than nature, in spiritual is ever graciously ambitious; that for his condition stands on his own feet, not needing to lean upon the great, and can so frame his thoughts to his estate, that when he hath least he cannot want, because he is as free from desire as superfluity; that hath seasonably broken the headstrong restiness of prosperity, and can now manage it at pleasure; upon whom all smaller crosses light as hailstones upon a roof, and for the greater calamities he can take them as tributes of life and tokens of love, and, if his ship be tossed, yet he is sure his anchor is fast. If all the world were his, he could be no other than he is; no whit gladder of himself, no whit higher in his carriage; because he knows contentment lies not in the things he hath, but in the mind that values them. The powers of his resolution can either multiply or subtract at pleasure; he can make his cottage a manor or a palace when he lists, and his home-close a large dominion, his stained cloth arras, his earth plate, and can see state in the attendance of one servant, as one that hath learned a man's greatness or baseness is in himself; and in this he may ever contest with the proud, that he thinks his own the best. Or, if he must be outwardly great, he can but turn the other end of the glass, and make his stately manor a low and strait cottage. And in all his costly furniture he can see not richness, but use: he can see dross in the best metal, and earth through the best clothes. And, in all his troop, he can see himself his own servant. He lives quietly at home, out of the noise of the world, and loves to enjoy himself always, and sometimes his friend; and hath as full scope to his thoughts as to his eyes. He walks ever even, in the midway betwixt hopes and fears, resolved to fear nothing but God—to hope for nothing but that which he must have. He hath a wise and virtuous mind in a serviceable body, which that better part affects, as a present servant and future companion; so cherishing his flesh as one that would scorn to be all flesh. He hath no enemies; not for that all love him, but because he knows to make a gain of malice. He is not so engaged to any earthly thing that they two cannot part on even terms: there is neither laughter in their meeting, nor in their shaking of hands tears. He keeps ever the best company—the God of spirits and the spirits of that God, whom he entertains continually in an awful familiarity; not being hindered with too much light or with none at all. His conscience and his hand are friends, and what devil soever tempt him, will not fall out: that divine part goes ever uprightly and freely; not stooping under the burthen of a willing sin, nor fettered with the gyves of unjust scruples. He would not, if he could, run away from himself or from God, not caring from whom he lies hid, so he may look these two in the face. Censures and applauses are passengers to him, not guests: his ear is their thoroughfare, not their harbour: he hath learned to fetch both his counsel and his sentence from his own breast. He did not lay weight upon his shoulders, as one that loves to torment himself with the honour of much employment; but, as he makes work his game, so doth he not list to make himself work. His strife is ever to redeem, and not to spend time. It is his trade to do good, and to think of it his recreation. He hath hands enow for himself and others, which are ever stretched forth for beneficence, not for need. He walks cheerfully in the way that God hath chalked, and never wishes it more wide or more smooth. Those very temptations whereby he is foiled strengthen him: he comes forth crowned and triumphing out of the spiritual battles; and those scars that he hath make him beautiful. His soul is every day dilated to receive that God in whom he is; and hath attained to love himself for God, and God for his own sake. His eyes stick so fast in heaven that no earthly object can remove them; yea, his whole self is there before his time, and sees with Stephen, and hears with Paul, and enjoys with Lazarus the glory that he shall have, and takes possession beforehand of his room amongst the saints. And these heavenly contentments have so taken him up, that now he looks down displeasedly upon the earth, as the region of his sorrow and banishment; yet, joying more in hope than troubled with a sense of evils, he holds it no great matter to live, and his greatest business is to die, and is so well acquainted with his last guest, that he fears no unkindness from him; neither makes he any other of dying than of walking home when he is abroad, or of going to bed when he is weary of the day. He is well provided for both worlds, and is sure of peace here, of glory hereafter, and therefore hath a light heart and a cheerful face. All his fellow-creatures rejoice to serve him: the angels love to observe him: God himself takes pleasure to converse with him, and hath sainted him afore his death, and in his death crowned him.

Farewell Letter from the Bishop of Fredericton.

We insert by permission of the Bishop of Fredericton, the following admirable and affecting letter to the Secretary of the Society for the Propagation of the Gospel.

Exeter, August 23, 1848.

MY DEAR —, Before I return to my Diocese, which I purpose to do without delay, I wish to address a few words of grateful farewell to yourself, to the Committee of the venerable Society, and to many kind friends who have given me help. Though my visit to England has not been productive of all the good to my diocese which might have been reaped from a more protracted sojourn, yet I feel sure that I leave many behind who will not forget nor desert it. Many have liberally contributed, some of their abundance, and some of their poverty. In every place I have been welcomed with words of blessing and of peace, and have never left the few or the many gathered together, without a deepening conviction that God is with us as a Church, and that, amidst all our divisions and disquietudes, an increasing number of Churchmen are everywhere working together with all their hearts for the glory of God, the good of his Church, and the salvation of souls. Rich and poor alike have seemed to realize the duty and the blessing of almsgiving; not a word has been uttered in the spirit of party, or of bitterness; and though sometimes the tone has been imperfect, it has never been inharmonious. Surely, "had the Lord been pleased to kill us, he would not have accepted this sacrifice at our hands." Were our Church become reprobate, or a cast-away, these blessed fruits of the Spirit would not abound; love and joy would not utter their glad voices throughout our borders; we should not be enlarged everywhere, and be the heralds of mercy to the uttermost parts of the earth. I am not blind to the sad, sad tokens of our unfruitfulness, our backsliding, our national guilt; but the greatest sin of all is despair of the mercy of God; and to deny his love-tokens is to "frustrate His counsel," and make our state worse than it is. Oh, let English Churchmen pray for an increase of the true spirit among all sincere persons, though they be of different views: let them give up harsh thoughts of each other, anonymous attacks, and violent invectives, and all will yet be well. Let them not be so anxious to put down what is erroneous, as to build up what is true: the strength of Dissent lies not in the political and clamorous partisan, but in the unknown piety of its poorer members; and these will be won to us, not by violent attacks, but by fervent, unostentatious, untrifling charity. Love, victorious love, will win the day at last.

I venture these remarks because many good men have been sorely disquieted by our divisions and our weakness; because some young men have harshly alienated the affections of our ill-instructed members, or have suddenly and unjustifiably withdrawn themselves from our communion to other bodies, whose position is less clear, and whose difficulties are more formidable. After a three years' absence, I see more earnestness and reverence in the English Church than when I left England for America, and I do not see that those who have gone out from us have improved their position and their usefulness. I shall return to my poor diocese benefited in many ways; personally cheered by sympathy amidst severe and unexpected trials, and assisted by men and means. Three candidates for Holy Orders are gone before me—subscriptions have been promised for five years towards the support of a travelling missionary—His Grace the Archbishop, several of my Right Rev. brethren, and many among the laity, rich and poor, "young men and maidens, old men and children," have given their kind wishes, their substantial aid, their handwork to my cathedral. And though I still need a considerable sum before it can possibly be completed, (at least 1500*l.* more before even the external walls and roof and spire can be finished,) yet my duty is to do each part as well as I can, and if my own means are become more limited, to put more trust in Him whose means, whose wisdom, whose mercy is unlimited.

I shall be enabled also to lay the foundation of a Cathedral Library. To the University of Oxford I owe my thanks for a grant of 100*l.* towards this object, to be expended in books printed at the Clarendon press; to the editors of the Library of the Fathers, and of the Anglo-Catholic Library; to the Associates of Dr. Bray, the Society for Promoting Christian Knowledge, Dr. Machride, Mrs. Huyshe, the Rev. Dr. Parkinson, Rev. J. Dornford, Rev. Chancellor Harington, Rev. Mr. Wilson, Rev. Canon Wordsworth, the daughters of a clergyman at Rochester, and others, who have made offerings of books.

Last, but not least in comfortable hope, may come the opening of St. Augustine's College. How glad and blessed was that day, when the spiritual head of the English Church brought together whole centuries of thought by that one act of consecration! How happy were we to be present in a building, reared on those ancient foundations of England's primitive glory, where there was not one who did not heartily sympathize in the work, not one who did not heartily respond, reverently kneel down, and humbly communicate: where the offerings were as large as the means used to obtain them were unexceptionable; where the originator of the design, and the founder of the institution, and the builder of the fabric, had all one mind and one soul; where the building was no motley collection of ill-assorted plagiarisms, but a positive creation, a real thing, which might be said to be like nothing else, and yet like everything else in Christian art.

And yet this is the least part of that most blessed work. To attain material truthfulness is hard; but to train the men who shall win souls to God throughout all lands, how very hard it is! This is your difficult, awful task, Warden and Fellows of St. Augustine's! To bring forth men dead to the world, alive to God; severely simple, but winningly attractive; frugal, yet not parsimonious; gentle, and yet firm; nursed in contemplation, but full of the fire of action; studious, and "apt to teach;" gentlemen, if not by birth, yet by Christianity; of refined taste, but neither scrupulous nor fastidious; able with their hands, if need be, to practice the Church's self-denial, with their skill to build her fabrics, with their voices to chant her psalms and prayers, with their spirit to infuse her rules, and by their words and good example to teach all her members holiness.

The good Lord increase this spirit in you who labour for us, and in us who dwell in the lands for which you labour; may He fill your house with students whose hearts He hath touched; may He raise up in all the Colonies of Great Britain like godly institutions, and may their fruits ripen in eternity and be as the grapes of Eshcol on the borders of Canaan. Once more, my dear friend, farewell, and God be with you evermore.

REV. ERNEST HAWKINS.

J. FREDERICTON.
R^o Rev John Medley

Bishop McCoskry's Address to the Convention of Michigan.

DEAR BRETHREN:

I present to you the record of the few duties I have been able to perform during the past year.

June 13, 2d Sunday after Trinity, I preached three times in St. Paul's Church, Flint, and confirmed seven persons. This parish had long been under the care of the Rev. Daniel E. Brown, by whose unwearied exertions a neat Church edifice had been erected, and the parish kept nearly free from any pecuniary embarrassment. It was with much regret that I transferred him to the Diocese of Illinois. The transfer was made on the 28th of June. A few months prior to my visitation, the Rev. Mr. Reighley took charge of the parish, under whose active ministration it has continued.

July 25, I held a special confirmation in St. Paul's Church, Detroit, and confirmed two persons.

Sept. 5, in St. Paul's Church, Detroit, I ordained the Rev. Daniel T. Grinnell, as a Priest. The candidate was presented by the Rev. M. H. Hunter, and the prayers read by the Rev. Charles Reighley—both signified their approbation by the imposition of hands.

Oct. 7. Dismissed the Rev. William Walker to the Diocese of New York. He was connected with my Diocese only a few months. It would have given me much pleasure to have retained one so active in the cause of the Church.

Oct. 10, 1847. Received and accepted from the Bishop of Pennsylvania, the letter dismissory of the Rev. Wm. M. Woodward. The greater part of this month was spent in New York, at the meeting of the General Convention. It was a source of much gratification to me, that the Diocese was so well represented by the Clergy and Laity. The distance is so great, and the expenses so heavy, that it requires no little effort and self-denial on the part of the Clergy, to be able to carry out the wishes of the Diocese; and the time required for the transaction of the business of the Convention, is often given at a great expense by our Laity. Their presence, under all these circumstances, shows the deep interest felt by all for the preservation of the peace and prosperity of our beloved Church. Perhaps at no former period of her history was there more anxiety felt in these respects than at the last Convention. So much had been said and written to alarm the members of the Church in reference to supposed heresies that had crept in, that the most calm and considerate could not divest themselves of anxiety. Many prayers had gone up to heaven for the guiding and enlightening influences of the Holy Ghost, and every member appeared to feel that this aid could alone keep us from those unholty conflicts, and partisan triumphs, which too often disgrace the religious bodies in our land. Never in the history of the Church, was there such an assemblage of men. The wisest and the best of her sons were there. All appeared to feel the increased responsibilities resting upon them, and that the future peace and prosperity of the Church were deeply connected with their deliberations. Questions of the deepest moment were freely and ably discussed, and principles settled, which must have a happy influence in all the future legislation of the Church. At the termination of the labors of the Convention, the most delightful and christian interchange of feeling and interest took place between the members—and the evidence clearly furnished, that whatever minor and nonessential differences exist—all "desire the prosperity of our holy Apostolic Church." Important as such assemblages may be, still we think the comfort and peace of the Church would be greatly secured, if they would take place at much longer intervals of time. Seven years is quite short enough to test and carry out the regulations of the Church. Besides, it would tend to defeat the restless spirit which is too often shown in the Church on the part of some who may be desirous of change, and who may be guided more by the spirit of party, than the spirit of Christ. It would give time for quietness and peace, and as a necessary consequence, make us better qualified to legislate for the promotion of the cause of Christ. Besides, there is great danger that our General Convention may, in some degree at least, destroy the independence of our Dioceses, and become the ruling and controlling power in the Church. It is an important question to be met, and guarded against; for, if carried out, it must overthrow and destroy the whole constitution of the Church of Christ. I simply allude to this subject, without intending to go into any examination of it at present. During the sitting of the Convention, I also attended the meetings of the Board of Missions. It was a source of deep mortification and shame to hear that so little had been done by the members of the Church, to provide for the wants of those who had been sent out into the destitute parts of our country, to preach the gospel of Christ, and "to seek for Christ's sheep that are dispersed abroad, and for his children who are in the midst of this naughty world; that they may be saved through Christ for ever." The self-denial and hardships endured by our Missionaries, are of themselves quite sufficient to test their zeal, faith and patience, without being deprived of the means necessary to provide for the wants of themselves and families. I trust that these obligations will be met; and that the members of the Church will furnish one of the strongest evidences of love to the Saviour—a hearty co-operation in extending his holy Church. I was much gratified at the result of the deliberations of this body, in reference to our beloved brother, and ardent advocate of the cause of Christ, and his Church, Bishop Southgate, the Bishop of Turkey, &c. Few men have been more wantonly assailed, and few could have shown more quiet and patient endurance under slander and falsehood. His triumphant vindication was to every lover of the Church the cause of much gratification. His mission has always appeared to me to promise more than any foreign mission of the Church, although the result may be distant. And the manner in which it has been conducted, has convinced me of his far-seeing wisdom, and his firm and resolute confidence in the promises of God. I also visited the Depository of the Protestant Episcopal Sunday School Union and Tract Society. I regretted very much that circumstances beyond my control prevented me from being present at their Triennial Meeting. Having had abundant opportunity of becoming acquainted with these institutions during the time when I performed Episcopal duties in the Diocese of New York, I feel deeply interested in their continued success. I had witnessed the great care manifested by their directors, to prepare suitable books and tracts for the members of the Church, and had also given much of my time in carefully reading those that were published during my residence in the city. I had also met there in former days many old and valued brethren in the ministry; and among the number, the venerable and long to be remembered Milner, who was most generally present, and contributed much to the success of these institutions. In addition to these pleasant associations, I had received many of their books and tracts for the use of my Diocese, and had evidence that they had accomplished much good. I have never had occasion to change my opinion in reference to these institutions. On the contrary, after the triumphant vindication of them by the agent from the charge of disseminating heresy, I have felt still more confidence, if possible, in their publications; and feel well assured that the vigilance which has always been manifested by their directors, will be continued, to prevent the slightest introduction of error. I have full confidence in them, as true and faithful followers of Christ, and advocates of the principles of his Church. Besides their own efforts, they always call in the aid of every Bishop in the Church, to revise their books prior to their publication, so that every possible safeguard may be thrown around the truth. They have never made any charges against their brethren for either want of piety, or for error, nor have they ever established any tests of soundness in the faith, save those that are contained in the articles and liturgy of the Church. It is but justice to add, that I have never met men of more singleness of heart and purpose, and of more unwearied devotion to the interests of the Church, than the Secretaries and Agents of these institutions. It is but a thankless office at best, and can only be met and sustained by higher expectations than this world can give.

After these duties had been discharged, I returned with a thankful heart, to my own diocese, in which the voice of discord and strife has never been heard. Every day I trust I feel more thankful to God, who has kept us with one heart and mind, allowing to each and all, the perfect right to differ on subjects that are not essential, we have had no brethren to suspect, and none to charge with a want of clearness or faithfulness in proclaiming the truth. We have had no party tests among us. Our rule of faith has always been the word of God, interpreted and defined by our Holy, Catholic and Apostolic Church. We have had none among us who take their own private interpretation of scripture as their only guide, but all have endeavored to carry out their ordination vows, "to give faithful diligence always so to minister the doctrine and sacraments, and the discipline of Christ, as the Lord hath commanded, and this Church hath received the same, according to the commandments of God." This has been the foundation of our peace. I now proceed to detail the few Episcopal duties I have been able to perform.

Jan. 7, 1848, I licensed Mr. Eno L. Freeman as a lay reader, from Trinity Church, Marshall. This parish, I regret to say, still continues without a rector. The Rev. Mr. Large, under whose care it had been for several months, has taken charge of Trinity parish, Monroe. I trust they will soon be able to secure the services of a pastor, as but few parishes in the diocese present a more delightful field of labor. On Tuesday, Feb. 15, I preached in St. Luke's Church, Ypsilanti, and confirmed thirteen persons. This parish is now under the care of the Rev. Mr. Wilson; and it was the cause of much surprise and thankfulness, to witness, how great an extent God had blessed his labors. Every thing has been done by his parishioners to make the Church neat and comfortable; and it now presents as pleasant a field of usefulness as any in the diocese. Several have been gathered into the church, who had been once opposed to her Holy services, and the hope is confidently entertained, that these are but the first fruits of a glorious harvest. To secure such results every where, nothing is wanting but a firm, prudent and decided exhibition of the principles of the Church. On Wednesday, Feb. 16, I preached in St. Andrew's, Ann Arbor, and confirmed seventeen persons. Here a new church is much needed, or else an extension of the old one. There is a limit now placed to its growth for the want of church room. On Thursday, Feb. 17, I preached in St. James, Dexter, and confirmed one person. This parish had long been deprived of ministerial services. A new exertion was about being made at the time of my visit, to erect a Church edifice. I have since learnt that it met with success, and the hope is cherished, that within a year, the parish will worship in a building suitable for the worship of God. I have placed it under the care of the Rev. Mr. Hollister, in connexion with St. Stephen's, Ham-burgh. On Friday, the 18th, I preached in the latter Church, and confirmed six persons. I also baptized an adult at the request of the rector. This is the only country parish we have. The village is very small, and most of the worshippers come from a distance. The church will compare with most of our churches in neatness and in suitable arrangements for the worship of God. It exercises an important influence in the neighborhood, and I hope will, in some degree, root out the heresies that abound. On Sunday, the 20th of Feb., I preached three times in St. Paul's Church, Jackson. In the morning I admitted Mr. George Willard to the order of deacons. Prayers were read by the Rev. R. Adams, and the Lessons by Rev. Daniel E. Brown, of the diocese of Illinois; and the candidate presented by the Rev. Mr. Grinnell, the rector of the parish. In the evening I confirmed three persons. This parish is in a prosperous condition. It has always been distinguished for the kindness it has shown to their Pastor, and the promptness with which they have met their engagements. As a matter of course, they have received spiritual blessings in return.

The fourth Sunday in Lent, April 2d, I preached in Christ Church, Detroit, and confirmed sixteen persons. I am greatly indebted to the Rector of the parish for attending to many of my parochial duties during my absence on my invitation. Having no assistant, many of those duties have fallen upon him. It is but a few years since this parish was organized, and its prosperous condition shows how much it was needed, and how necessary it is to provide even before it may be needed, Church accommodation for our rapidly increasing population. The fifth Sunday in Lent, April 9, I preached twice in Zion Church, Pontiac, and confirmed six persons. The same day I preached in St. John's Church, Troy, and confirmed two persons. The former parish, in connexion with St. Paul's, Waterford, has been under the care of the Rev. Mr. Woodward, since October last. St. John's Church, Troy, has been only occasionally supplied. It is my intention to connect it with Zion Church, Pontiac. The latter Church, I found to be in a prosperous condition, and seldom have I preached to a larger congregation in the same space. On the Sunday before Easter, April 16, I confirmed fifteen persons in St. Paul's Church, Detroit. This parish was never in a more prosperous condition than at present. We cannot accommodate the number anxious to obtain sittings. It is hoped that a new Church edifice will be soon erected, or another parish organized in another part of the city.

On Monday, May 15th, I preached in Trinity Church Monroe, and confirmed seven persons. From this point I returned home quite sick, and for the first time was unable to complete my visitation. It was, of course, a sad disappointment to me, as I was obliged to recall many appointments. My duties at home are so numerous and constant, that the least interruption in my plans deprives me of that intercourse with the clergy and their parishioners, which is so pleasant to myself, and I hope profitable to them. I have much cause to thank God for my restoration to health. It is my intention to visit the parishes from which my appointments were withdrawn, as soon as possible after the Convention. My last Episcopal service for the year, was performed to night; the confirmation of seven persons in this building, soon to be set apart for the worship of God. We have only to look around us on this beautiful edifice, to find the evidence of the prosperous condition of the parish. It is the first real Church edifice erected in the Diocese, and I trust will be followed by those parishes now about to erect Church buildings. The plan is from Mr. Upjohn, of New York, who has done more to provide suitable houses for the worship of God, and for promoting reverence for holy things, than any man in our country. It is far better to pay well for a suitable plan, than to fail in erecting such an edifice as we would wish to appropriate for the worship of Almighty God. In reviewing the past year we have good cause for thankfulness. No breach has been made in the number of my clergy by death, and but few of our lay brethren have been removed. Our Churches are nearly all free from pecuniary embarrassment, and God has dwelt in the midst of us, blessing his word and sacraments, to the edification and comfort of his children. We have only to be true to our vows, and live in accordance with our high profession, to receive the most glorious results. We cannot expect to effect this without continued effort. The Gospel has always been and will be an offence to sinful men; and the Church through which it is to be proclaimed, has ever been opposed by those who set up their own judgment as their standard of the truth. Let us then be doubly faithful, and no human power can keep back the triumphs of our Saviour. Let us keep ourselves free from all human machinery, and all associations that are not sanctioned by the Church. Let us have no tests of soundness in the faith, but what she has prescribed, and we will continue to be at peace, and prosper. We pray that God will vouchsafe his blessing on all our efforts, and that he will make us the humble instrument of extending his kingdom among men.

SAMUEL A. McCOSKRY.

CHURCH-YARD ADORNMENTS.—I was much struck with the appearance of several new graves in the church-yard of (Swords, near Dublin), rudely ornamented with crosses, garlands, curiously cut paper, &c. &c., and interspersed with flowers, aromatic herbs, myrtle, &c. I believe these were tokens of affectionate regard to young women and children. The rude blasts were scattering these proofs of love after death; and the flowers and herbs, like the cheeks of the once lovely deceased, were faded and withered to blush and smile no more. A frozen-hearted formalist may condemn this, and call it superstition; true religion and pure affection would give it a far different name. I felt affected and edified by these dumb remembrances of life, youth, beauty, and affection,—of death, disappointed hopes, broken bonds, keen sorrow, and lasting distress. I felt and could have wept with the disconsolate parents and survivors; and kissed the fingers that composed those garlands, the tokens of pure affection; and the crosses by which the meritorious death of our blessed Saviour was thus out to public view as the only foundation of the survivor's hope that death, the last enemy, should be finally destroyed; and that those hearts knit together here in pure and honest love, should be re-united in eternity,—where bonds can no more be broken, and death can never enter. —Dr. Adam Clarke.

GIVE GOD YOUR YOUTH.—As in the pouring out of a bottle, that which is purest comes out first, and that which is thickest and most dreggy sinks and remains at the bottom;—so the best of our days run out first, and the worst at last. Now it is a contempt cast upon God, to give the devil the flour of your youth and Him the bran. Suppose a landlord should come to his tenant and entreat him to set before him somewhat to eat; and he should reply, "Excuse me, I pry, Sir; there are a company of villians and varlets which I am at present providing for, but if you will be pleased to stay awhile, you shall have these broken scraps which they shall leave." Would not this be a strange, rude, unseemly behaviour? But thus it is with most of us. God is our great landlord, and He comes and moves, and solicits us to serve Him;—but we have fleshly, filthy lusts that war against our souls;—and yet these must be straight provided for—they must have the cream of our bodies and of our souls!—Wade.

DOG DAYS.—"The Freeman's Journal," a Romish paper published in New York, is getting rabid. In its last number it snaps and foams, and at last fairly bites a cur of its own kennel—the Catholic Herald, which seems to be a sort of low-church Popery affair. After this we must not be surprised to find our cotemporaries—the Church Times, and the Christian Witness,—very fiercely barked at. They had indiscreetly admitted an article on Secessions from Romanism to Nothingism, in which they seem to approve such a change; tho' we are very sure they would do no such thing. However—we all fare alike, and are written down a pack of Infidels; which does not precisely inspire us with a disposition to contribute to the "Irish Relief Fund." The article to which we allude concludes with these words:

"And in this, these Episcopalian editors glory as the result of their free schools, broadcast Bibles, instructions and exan- ples—This may surprise some people, but, for ourselves it is not at this late day we have learned that they are themselves infidels, the whole pack of them."—Calendar.

A BARBAROUS CUSTOM.—It is said the fashion of seating the ladies at the further end of the ships or pews at church, originated in consequence of the anticipated attacks from the savages in the early settlement of our country. The men placed themselves at the outer end, for the double purpose of protecting the females, or being ready to get out without obstruction in case of an alarm. If this be true, it may well be said to be a barbarous custom; and since it is so inconvenient, let it not be persisted in to the annoyance of a whole congregation, by four or five gentlemen stepping into the broad aisle, to let a lady pass in.

LETTERS FROM NEW ZEALAND.—Having been favored with the perusal of the following letters, we have asked and obtained permission, from the friend who received them, to publish portions of them. We are very much mistaken if they do not interest our readers.

They come from a far distant land, a region of almost romantic interest. A few years ago the very thought of planting the Church among the Cannibal New Zealanders, would have seemed a wild and visionary project. These letters tell us what Missionary zeal and faithfulness may accomplish.

There is another aspect in which these letters are full of interest. We may gather, from their perusal, a faithful impression of the character of those who are devoting their lives to the noble and self-denying work of advancing the condition of New Zealand. Clergymen and Laymen of the noblest stamp, as men and Christians, are labouring for this benighted people. At their Master's call they have forsaken all to follow Him in blessing, with the light of His Gospel, those who were sitting in darkness and the region of the shadow of death. With such a Layman as Chief Justice Martin, and such a Bishop as Dr. Selwyn, what good must be accomplished.

The Bishop of New Zealand is widely and favorably known in this country. We know him as the noblest pattern of a Christian Bishop. The second of these letters gives us still more intimate knowledge of his character, and will raise still higher our esteem.

We trust the noble example of deep and true interest expressed by Judge Martin, in the Aborigines of New Zealand, may quicken our zeal, or shame our indifference, towards our own native Indians.

These letters were addressed to a Clergyman of this city, the author of that most useful and popular work the "History of a Pocket Prayer Book." A copy of this Book was forwarded to Mrs. Martin. The advertisement to the last edition contains the following extract from a letter of her Father, the late Rev. Wm. Parker, for thirty years Secretary of the Society for the Promotion of Christian Knowledge, in London.

"Your History of a Pocket Prayer Book, has long been a favorite in my family. A copy of this very instructive little work was given some years ago by a pious Clergyman of the Protestant Episcopal Church in the the United States of America, to my younger daughter, who is now wife of the learned and excellent Chief Justice of New Zealand, the Honorable Wm. Martin. In December last she sailed to join her husband, on board the Tomatin in company with the Lord Bishop of New Zealand, his amiable lady, and a band of devoted Clergymen, Catechists, Schoolmasters, &c. I have reason to believe that the Judge and my dear daughter will zealously co-operate with the Bishop in every good work: and that she has been much encouraged to do so by the perusal of your little history."

We give Chief Justice Martin's letter almost entire in answer to this acceptable gift.

AUCKLAND, NEW ZEALAND, Nov. 19th, 1847.

REVEREND AND DEAR SIR:

I have long purposed to write to you, though I have not the advantage of personal acquaintance, and am known to you only by report. I felt sure that the memory of your old friend and my reverend father-in-law, the Rev. W. Parker of St. Ethelburga's, would insure for my letter a ready welcome. For some time I intended to write by the "Auckland," a pretty barque which has visited our harbours lately. She was built in New England and named after this place: and so connects you with us in a very pleasing manner. You will easily conceive the interest with which we witness the arrival of a messenger from the oldest and greatest of the Colonies of England, opening to us the means of permanent communication with you. Thus the eldest daughter of Britain is ministering, in a most sisterly fashion, to the needs of her youngest babe. The time of the Auckland's return is however still uncertain, and I have therefore availed myself of another mode of transmitting a letter to you.

Let me begin by thanking you heartily for the kind spirit which has manifested itself towards me (in too favorable a manner) in the Preface to your "History of a Prayer Book:" and very especially let me thank you for that book itself, as well for myself as for others also in this land, who have derived from it not merely enjoyment but moral benefit.

I proceed to state the special cause of my venturing to trouble you now, to add to labours which doubtless are onerous enough already. Indeed I should not have thought myself justified in thus addressing you upon any ordinary matter. But the truth is, that in this early stage of our colonial polity, we are called to the consideration of questions of great and abiding importance, in respect of which your experience in the United States, may be of extreme value to us.

The first point relates to our Church, our comm'n Church, which notwithstanding present discouragements, promises (I think) to be, by God's blessing, eminently effective for good in all our colonies, and powerful in binding together the scattered communities of our English stock throughout the world. To us in New Zealand it is a cause for especial thankfulness that our Church, has been carried in all its completeness into this new field of action. We possess an advantage which the Reformed Episcopal Church in America was denied for more than 150 years. And we have a further blessing in our Bishop. Out of the whole body of the Clergy of England, no fitter man (as I believe) could have been selected; so many and so large are the gifts, physical, intellectual and moral, which God has given him. Then the Church in this land stands in a position most favorable for her purity. She has no political ties whatever: no man is directly or indirectly influenced by worldly privilege or immunity to join her.

The great deficiency, and that in which we have most need of help, is in the matter of our internal discipline, for on this point England furnishes no good precedent, the Church being, by the misfortune of her position, greatly crippled in this respect. We naturally turn to you, who having started from the same state of things, have built up for yourselves a system of discipline and law, and have now for many years been testing and improving it. That system appears to have commended itself to the judgment of men of very different modes of thinking, and I see that lately, the Chevalier Bunsen, in his Church of the Future, p. 80, has pronounced the Constitution of your Church to be "without doubt the most remarkable phenomenon in the history of ecclesiastical polity during this and the last century." A copy of your canons is in our hands, but something more minute and specific is needed for our purpose. There are (or may be) many circumstances, hidden from a distant reader or thinker, yet known by observers on the spot to have a most material influence; sometimes modifying the operation of an express written rule even perhaps to the length of almost negating it; at other times rendering unnecessary a regulation which might under other circumstances be essential. Then it may happen that some rules, not actually repealed are yet of so little value, that they would scarcely be worth enacting, if the work of organization had to begin afresh from the beginning. For these and other reasons, you will not be surprised at some further knowledge of the system of your church being desired by your brethren here, beyond what Bishop Wilberforce's History and the Book of Canons supply. And though your own labours in her cause (or rather in the cause of her Head and Ruler) are sufficient to occupy all your time and thoughts; yet, when I remember the spirit which fills your little volume, I naturally come to believe that you will be willing to withdraw an hour or two from the service even of the Church of the United States, and to bestow them upon another Church, which is yet not another. My hope then is that you will be able to send me a list of all such books and documents as you may think likely to be serviceable here: and (which is the main point of my request) that you will please to accompany the list with remarks as to the comparative value and authority of those books, and generally with any practical suggestions which you may find time to commit to paper.

I turn to my second object in addressing you. I refer now to a topic on which your book shows you to feel a strong concern. Indeed were it not for the sinister interests which touch upon it, one might have hoped that all men, at least all Christian men, would be of one mind respecting it. I mean the condition of Aboriginal races, and the modes of proceeding by which the contact of a more advanced Colonising race may be made as little injurious and as greatly beneficial as possible to them. This question is in New Zealand, a practical and most urgent matter, affecting materially every interest in the colony. This race too is eminently susceptible of good influences, and has not yet suffered so much as some others from the immigration of our people. Melancholy indeed is the history of the Colonial Church of America in this respect. When the efforts of the British Church were so small and insufficient for the nurture and guidance of her own children, we cannot wonder that she thought little of adopting others—that so few of her sons were like minded with our noble Bishop Berkeley. The exertions of other communions also have been limited, though the names of Elliot and Brainerd, and of Leisberger and others in later times, ought never to be mentioned without reverence by a Christian man. Still in one way or another enough has been done to prove that the Red man is capable of being civilized and christianised; that he is in capability and nature our brother. The Cherokees alone prove this. What is your Board of Missions doing for these people? We have very imperfect information here; but enough to show that in the United States, there are true and faithful men striving to resist and diminish the evil, and if (by God's blessing) it may yet be done, to effect some permanent good. Does not the new position of the Indians, free from the embarrassment of the question of state-rights, afford some sort of opening even at the eleventh hour?

Now on this whole subject, we need fuller knowledge. I shall be very thankful for any information you may find time to supply as to the various means that have been resorted to for the purpose of civilizing and christianising the Indians, in particular as to Schools instituted and books written in order to teach them our faith, language, or usages. It is not indeed to be supposed that methods found successful in America, would necessarily be so here, under very different circumstances; yet we may hope that American experience would at any rate furnish some safe inferences and useful suggestions. It can hardly fail to be instructive to us, to be told which of the various modes, brought to bear at different times and places upon the native race, has been comparatively most efficient. Though I cannot but fear that I am seeking to impose considerable trouble upon you, yet I persuade myself that, in so good a cause, you will be content to bear it. Do believe that no considerations, except most grave and weighty ones, could have induced me to trespass upon your time.

Believe me,

Reverend and Dear Sir,

Very truly yours,

WM. MARTIN.

The following is a portion of Mrs. Martin's response:

AUCKLAND, NEW ZEALAND.

September 16, 1847.

REVEREND AND DEAR SIR:—

I ought long ago to have written to thank you very sincerely and gratefully for your kind remembrance of me. It was indeed a welcome gift, one of the many precious tokens of the love and respect felt for my beloved father. It is a blessed thing when we are remembered and cared for by the good for our sainted parents' sake. Your little book, which interested me so much when I read it as a girl, has now been again and again, read in New Zealand. I have lent it to many people, young and old, rich and poor, and all have returned it with expressions of real satisfaction. The history of a pocket prayer book is just the class of books needed here. We have most of us been parted from family ties and loving associations—and we must have Church membership to bind and draw together hearts which otherwise seem to find no resting place. I am sure that the full blessedness of our liturgical services grows continually more present to our minds, as we find ourselves separated from all the familiar and early associations of home and kindred. In the midst of strange scenes, on the sea or in a new land, we hear the words that comforted and taught us long ago, and we feel no longer exiles from those who remain behind—the loved ones for whom we so wept, that we should see their faces no more, are still with us in spirit,—repeating the same prayers—offering the same thanksgivings—joining in the same high Communion. Never can I forget the intense feeling with which one and all of our party united in the responses of the litany when we met on the first Sunday to worship together on board. We were strangers to each other before, and our hearts were still aching with remembrances of the past, but those blessed loving words of our mother, drew us together as children of one family. And then too when we assemble to worship in this our new country, a comparatively small band, there is the cheering thought of being part of that large branch of the Church Militant, by which are daily offered up and down the world the same form of supplication to our Father in heaven, and we remember joyfully the long list of saintly ones who are gone, to whom those prayers were dear. You will, I am sure, dear sir, rejoice to hear that our Church prospers in this land. Through God's great mercy it has been planted and taken root from the very beginning. When we look at Australia, even now, and see the up-hill painful work there, of God's ministers—and the open vice and worldliness which grew with the growth of the colony, almost unchecked for years by any better influences; we ought indeed to bless God and take courage. Our Bishop is well fitted for the great work to which God has called him. Simple and self-denying in his habits and manner of life, in the very prime of his years, in full vigor of mind and body, he goes up and down the land among his Native as well as English children, labouring unweariedly for the good of all.

He is one of those rare spirits, which can lay large, vast plans for the future, and yet be content patiently to work away at the smaller details. Never perhaps would you more heartily admire him, than when keeping his watch on the deck of his little schooner, as he sails along the coast to visit some distant settlement; he shares the night and day fatigue with his men, and when his share of duty is over, he is reading with some ignorant sailor; teaching him to read God's word, or he is having his Native and English morning and evening services; or he is quietly seated on the deck writing letters, or arranging needful matters of business. When we came out from England, he was never idle, he watched by the berths of the sick, tending them with the kindest care; ever ready to minister to their wants. He worked with his clergy and with the young men who went out with him, at the Native language and the Greek Testament. When on deck he was sure to be busy, learning to take observations, or receiving lessons in Navigation from the Captain,—and this all with a practical end, and then till prayer time, he was working away again at Maori, and with such success that to the surprise of all, both Natives and Missionaries, he preached the first Sunday after he landed, in the Native tongue. Your account, my dear sir, of the Oneida Indians, has been especially interesting to us, surrounded as we are by a race of fine intelligent men, of whom so large a number are professedly Christians. I thought as I read of your good Bishop's primitive way of travelling, that ours is even less conformed to old English rules, for he has no means of conveyance generally, but what his own stout limbs give him. He walked up last year from Wellington; (after visiting the English settlements by sea, and holding confirmations,) through the country with no suitors but his Maori lads, bearing a tent, blanket and the simplest of food boxes. He went over not less than 1000 miles in this way, held large confirmations, and baptized converts at the several mission stations,—took a census as far as he was able, of all the people in the parishes and villages through which he passed; and after all his wanderings, he returned to work as Head of the Infant College at St. John's—he calls this his rest. I hope my account will not have tired you. I thought it would interest you to hear of any efforts towards good in this distant Isle. We have been many months wishing to write to you, both my dear husband and myself, but there are difficulties in forwarding a letter from here to America, and we waited a long while to send by a merchant vessel which was to return there, but which is still detained trafficking among the islands of the Pacific. We have been much interested lately by reading Wilberforce's history of the American Church. Amidst much that is painful in it, there is still much to cheer and afford hope for the future. I was much pleased to meet with an account of Bishop Chase and of his College, for two reasons; first, that I remembered at so early an age, hearing of him; my dear grandfather Dr. Gaskin, and our old friend Lord Kenyon, being such warm friends of his Lordship; and also that all we read of his difficulties overcome in forming his College, suggests grounds for hope about our St. John's.

His Lordship, the Bishop of Illinois

RAVENSROFT SEMINARY, TENNESSEE.—Bishop Otey desires us to acknowledge, with thanks, in his behalf, the receipt of $20 from a Lady in Western New York. As this donation was given for any purpose the Bishop might deem most expedient, he says "I shall appropriate it to the benefit of the Ravenscroft Seminary." And no better application, we are sure, could be made of christian charity.

Under the head of "Diocesan Intelligence," will be found the Prospectus of this important Institution. We give it, more especially, for the benefit of our many subscribers in the South West. It will present the claims of this Seminary to the confidence of the Churchmen in that region in a stronger light than anything we could offer. The well known zeal and devotion to his work of the Bishop, under whose immediate oversight this Institution is placed, is sufficient security that the plan, laid down, will be faithfully carried out.

But this, like every other enterprise in a region where the Church is not strong in numbers or resources, needs the helping hand of more favored Brethren. And surely these will not refuse when the call for aid is so urgent, and the object so worthy, appealing to every better feeling in the hearts of Churchmen. Our Bishops, who have the best opportunity of judging, tell us that the growth of the Church in their respective fields, depends upon their ability not only to train up the young members of the Church in the way they should go; but also to prepare, on the very field of their work, laborers to gather in the great harvest ready for the reaper. Strong in faith, "strong in the Lord and in the power of His might," yet relying as they must upon those who are the appointed agents of God in distributing over the earth His bounties, they found the needful Institutions. Oh, what everlasting shame, what eternal reproach will fall upon those members of the Church who, having the means to spare, stand idly by and see with indifference, these great, these noble plans of mercy languishing or falling to the ground for lack of means which would never be missed from their abundance! In the East as well as in the West there are Institutions thus demanding help. Let them all be remembered, let none be forgotten in the charities which Churchmen distribute for their dear Lord's sake!

We do not think we can present the peculiar claims of the "Ravenscroft Seminary" more forcibly than they are set forth in the following letter from one deeply interested in its welfare, one who knows most truly the wants of that region. The letter is marked "private,"—but we know its author holds nothing back that is his own, when it may serve the interests of the Church. On this ground we are sure he will pardon the use we make of a portion of his most excellent letter.

"Is it too much to hope that the attention of churchmen may be drawn to the enterprise in which we are now engaged—that of establishing an institution which may in some good degree meet the wants of this important and interesting portion of our country, in providing the means of intellectual and religious education? If you will cast your eyes over the map of the U. States, you will perceive, at a glance, that the south-west has been left deplorably destitute of the means of Theological education so far as our communion is concerned. The states of Tennessee, Georgia, Alabama, Mississippi, Louisiana, Texas, Florida and Arkansas possess not a single school to which our candidate for orders may resort. While to the north of us Kentucky, Ohio, Wisconsin, Illinois and Missouri, have each one of these schools for preparing young men for the ministry of the Church. All that we now want or ask for is accommodation in the way of buildings. We ask not for endowments of Professorships or scholarships. We can make our seminary self-supporting if we can procure the requisite buildings. The necessities of life are abundant, and the pupils to pay for their education at hand, if we can accommodate them. The experience of the last 20 or 25 years must have satisfied every man of reflection, that the expectation of getting a supply of ministers from the Theological seminaries to the north and east of us, is vain. We must prepare men for the duties of the ministry here, and this is one great object to which we are looking in the establishment of Ravenscroft Seminary. The name, "clarum et venerabile," which the committee of the Convention have adopted,—a name cherished in the memories of churchmen—clearly enough indicates the standard of churchmanship at which we aim—"evangelical truth and apostolical order." The good which we wish to accomplish you perceive is great, the field in which we are called to labour vast, but promising rich rewards,—the means wherewith to work very small and weak. And yet I am sure, as I can be of any earthly result, that if we were now aided with a few thousand dollars from those portions of the Church which could bestow it without inconvenience, that four or five years would demonstrate that never had money been contributed with more advantage to promote the spread and increase of Christ's Church in this country. There are perhaps 20,000 communicants in the eastern and middle states, where our church is strongest. One quarter of a dollar from each of these on an average—or in other words $5000—would now enable us to put our school on such a foundation as to require no further assistance from the Church in the way of pecuniary contribution. And is it possible that this small sum—small in comparison with the immense benefit to be realized—will be denied to us? Surely our brethren have forgotten our Lord's words, "it is more blessed to give than to receive."

We are happy to add that this seminary has opened auspiciously, under the Rev. Dr. Wheat and Professor McLeod, with 15 pupils.

Nashotah.

ACKNOWLEDGMENTS.—We have heard from PENNSYLVANIA, as we expected. The liberal Churchman who has sent, through his Rector, the $200 for the Advancement Society, as acknowledged below, has forwarded, by the same sure hands, $100 for the "NASHOTAH MISSION," in addition to $150 for Domestic Missions.

We have also received, and forwarded to Mr. Breck, from "a Pennsylvania Churchman," twenty dollars. This kind donor also authorizes us to say that he will give $100 towards making up the sum of $1000 for the purpose designated in the appeal of "W. I. K.", provided the remaining $900 be contributed.

The following is the portion of this appeal to, which this response is given. "Mr. Breck is now each month refusing applications for admission, because he has no place in which to lodge the students, and no funds to support them. If he had proper buildings to accommodate them, he could now have fifty Divinity Students. The sum of one thousand dollars at the present time would enable him to accomplish this, and what an incalculable benefit would it be to the Church at the north-west! Are there not ten individuals who will contribute this? They will receive even in this world a hundred fold reward."

We have found one of the "ten individuals" for whom W. I. K. inquired, and we trust he will not have long to ask—"but where are the nine?"

Since writing the above we have heard again from MARYLAND, and the voice grows louder and stronger.

From the Rectors of the two Parishes following we have received these letters containing the amount specified in each.

CUMBERLAND, Wednesday Sept. 25th, 1848.

REV. AND DEAR BROTHER:—

In answer to the appeal lately made through the Banner, and in accordance with your kind offer to take charge of contributions, I send you, from the offerings of my Parish, 'Emmanuel Parish, Alleghany county,' $25.00 for Nashotah—and only wish I could do much more for that noble Mission of the Church.

PRINCESS ANNE, Md., Sep. 22d, 1848.

DEAR SIR:—

I give you above a draft on Baltimore for twenty dollars, being a contribution to Nashotah, from two members of St. Nicholas Church in this city. The object of truth which the human mind has ever pursued, its study, as more discipline of the intellect, must be most beneficial, and will, therefore, receive a proportionate share of regard. But the distinguishing feature of the intellectual education of the RAVENSROFT SEMINARY is that we aim not merely at the communication of knowledge, but, in a far higher degree, at the formation of those habits of THINKING, JUDGING, REASONING, and COMMUNICATION, upon which the farther prosecution of St. Stephen's Church, of which he had been a vestryman, and was always a most liberal supporter.

We know not the exact amount of these, except that he has bequeathed to them a large portion of his immense property. He gave an equal part to the congregation and to the Rector.

We record this with pleasure, because it is an evidence to the world, from a man, highly regarded for his probity and sagacity, that there is a reality in the Pastoral relation, that it is something more than a name. Men are slow practically to own this relation. Mr. Burd's will is a striking exception, and deserves to be recorded and remembered.

We are happy to add that he has set a noble example to Christian Masters, by providing liberally for the servants of his household.

CHURCH IN IOWA.—The Rev. James De Pui, the Missionary at Dubuque, is in this city soliciting contributions for building a new church. He has received liberal aid from other cities, and we hope the Churchmen of Philadelphia, will not come behind their brethren of the east.

Dubuque is a town on the Mississippi, about 550 miles above St. Louis, with a population of four thousand. The Romanists have a Cathedral and Bishop there, and are liberally supplied with means from abroad. The other sects are almost all provided with houses of worship, while the Church has no local habitation.

The congregation have made great exertions of themselves, and have secured a good lot in a most eligible situation, and have begun to work. They have also a zealous and active Missionary. So that on all accounts they deserve help. Mr. De Pui preached a sermon on Sunday afternoon, in the church of the Ascension, setting forth the claims of Western Missions in general. The case was most earnestly and eloquently presented, and we hope his forcible appeals may not only awaken churchmen to a more active sense of their duty to the whole west, but also stir up the hearts of the liberal to devise liberal things for the new church at Dubuque.

Mr. De Pui will receive at once any contributions left at the Banner Office, enclosed to him.

SOCIETY FOR THE ADVANCEMENT OF CHRISTIANITY IN PENNSYLVANIA.—We hope the following acknowledgment will attract the attention of some readers who may thus be urged to go and do likewise.

The Treasurer of the "Society of the Protestant Episcopal Church, for the advancement of Christianity in Pennsylvania," has received from the Rev. George Upfold, D. D., Rector of Trinity Church, Pittsburgh, two hundred dollars, contributed by a "friend to Domestic Missions," in aid of the funds of that society.

This is a most acceptable donation, and could not have been more timely bestowed. A quarterly allowance to the Missionaries will become due on the first of November, and there is not yet money enough in the treasury, to pay it.

It will require $300 to meet the deficiency.

BISHOP POTTER'S APPOINTMENTS.—Our Readers in northern Pennsylvania will please notice a change in the Bishops's appointments, under the paper head.

To CORRESPONDENTS.—"W." shall appear next week.

New Publications.

We have received from Messrs Swords and Stanford of New York, SERMONS BY HENRY EDWARD MANNING, M. A., ARCHDEACON OF CHICHESTER, series the second. First American from the fourth London edition.

We have no space to speak of the merits of this admirable republication. Nor does it, to Churchmen, need our commendation. The name of the author is a sufficient testimonial of worth.

The work is published in excellent form, and is for sale at the Book Store of Mr. R. S. H. George, No. 16 South SEVENTH ST.

We have received several Works, too late for notice this week.

The Classical Course at St. Timothy's Hall.

By an examination of the course of study at St. Timothy's Hall, it will be observed that the Latin and Greek languages occupy a prominent position. It is designedly so. It is not deemed necessary to enter into a studied disquisition upon their necessity or their utility. At this day it cannot be worth the labor to waste words upon this subject. It would be attempting to prove what men of learning already admit. We regard the benefits arising from a careful and sedulous training in Classical Study, as so numerous, that we scarcely venture even to enumerate its advantages. Were there no other good result than to form the youthful taste upon the most ancient and the purest models of writing; than to direct him to a source of intellectual delight which cannot elsewhere be found, we should feel that the labor was not lost: Were the simple knowledge of history, of mythology, of ancient Geography, of ancient manners and customs; were the perception of the hidden beauties of these venerable languages themselves, aside from the vast stores of incidental knowledge which must necessarily accompany the acquisition of them; were these all their advantages, we should feel that no labor had been lost, that no time had been wasted. But when the careful and rigid mental drilling which a pupil must undergo to obtain a correct knowledge of these tongues, is taken into consideration; when Latin and Greek are regarded in the light of the best means of intellectual culture and discipline, they rise to an importance far beyond anything which we have already mentioned,—an advantage that is not for the moment, but for the life-time. Let a right system only be pursued in the attainment of them; and their influence, perceptive or unnoticed, will be operative in every stage of our career, and till the last day of our life. That by means of a defective system, or inefficient instructors, these advantages are frequently unfelt, and unrealized, is unfortunately most true. That instead of being a source of intellectual delight in after life, classical studies are oftentimes looked back upon with a feeling of disgust, by those who have gone through with the senseless drudgery of a miserable and incomplete system, is indeed most true. But at St. Timothy's Hall, something better than this is aimed at. We set the mark high. We aim at the highest advantages, by means of the most thorough and complete system. Everything is solid and substantial reality. We present no mockery of public examinations of proficiency, "got up" for display and effect alone. The training is rigid, thorough, persevering. And they who have sat by and listened, as many have, to the searching and critical questioning of pupils on public occasions, and the readiness and proficiency of the latter as then displayed, must say, whether St. Timothy's Hall accomplishes what it professes, or whether this a curacy and thoroughness is an unmeaning boast.

The Latin and Greek languages are commenced by the system of Arnold. This valuable series of classical books needs no recommendation to scholars. It is becoming rapidly introduced, wherever soundness of instruction is the aim. This plan is on the basis of Ollendorff's most admired and certainly unsurpassed system. The means by which a child learns the language of his own land, are the means here employed. The great principles are imitation and frequent repetition. A boy is taught to read, to write, and as far as his limited knowledge extends, to speak these languages in his very first lesson. He is carried through the First Latin Book, and the 2nd Latin Book, before entering upon any classical author; and so with his Greek. As soon as he is qualified to pass on to some plain prose writing in either language, he does so. But not to the neglect of Arnold. The first and second Latin and Greek books are reviewed continually until mastered. As soon as they are sufficiently understood by the learner, he passes from these into the "Latin Prose Composition," and the "Greek Prose Composition," by the same Author, and in pursuance of the same admirable plan. The sheet-anchor in our classical system is the writing of Latin, and the writing of Greek. These are never given up. Two days of every week, the Authors are laid aside by the very highest classes, and they return to the writing of these two languages, as regularly as the days appear.

But when a class of beginners has once been carried through the first steps in the acquisition of these tongues; the first two books of Arnold's Latin Course, or the first and second part of the "Greek Lessons;" he passes on as we have said above to some plain prose writing of the better age of classical literature. For this purpose, in Latin, Cæsar or Nepos are thought best adapted to the system pursued. In this, accurate and close analysis of the principles of the language is the motto; or in other words continual parsing and application of the rules of grammatical construction. In Greek, the same course is pursued, using for the purpose Arnold's late edition of Jacob's excellent "Greek Reader" as far as to the end of the first part.

Thus far do we proceed, to master the elements of the languages; to become perfected in the principles of the languages themselves. From this time, we commence to read Authors: not only to increase our knowledge of words and principles, but to learn the Authors; to learn every item of historic legend, of mythology, of Geography, connected with the subject. We desire to leave no beauty undetected; no figure unnoticed; no variation from the ordinary rules of Latinity unexplained; no imitation of Homer disregarded; nothing of value or of interest unheeded.—But a peculiar feature in our reading of Classical authors, we have yet to mention. It is the writing of translations. From the time the elementary books give place to reading of Classical authors, carefully written translations of every lesson are strictly required. The pupil first prepares his lesson. He learns to translate it, to parse, to explain every classical allusion of whatever nature which it contains. He recites it. His recitations are corrected and commented upon. He returns to his seat and writes it in his copy book, which is kept for the purpose, and often inspected by the Professor who has charge of that department. The next day when he re-appears upon the recitation-bench, he proceeds not a single step in advance, until he has made a rapid review before his Professor, of the previous day's labor. And so on daily, until Sallust and Virgil, and Cicero and three books of Xenophon, and three books of Homer have become sufficiently a part of his "thinking material" to enable him to commence upon the course of study for the Freshman Class with some prospects of deriving instruction and delight from the more difficult authors that will then claim his attention. We say these things in no boastful spirit. We state only facts; not fancies. We state what is done; not simply what ought to be accomplished. We feel it a duty to make known the advantages which are offered in this Institution; and we only invite an attendance at the Annual and semi-Annual examinations; or a visit upon any day during the sessions, that our works may be tested by a criticising auditory.

REV. AND DEAR MR. EDITOR:—

The following beautiful lines, taken from the Children's Magazine, expressive of a cherished truth of our infant years—the continual guardianship of the Holy Angels—will not be unacceptable to such of your elder readers, who in their thoughts upon the Church's Angel-day, look back to the happy period when first they learned to hush Bishop Ken's sweet hymn.

Though somewhat a neglected truth, it is yet a truth. It is an ancient truth. It is a scriptural truth. It is an abiding and a cheering truth. It is a darling truth. Impressed in childish days upon the tender mind, it sinks deeply and indelibly as years increase. Time brings out its tints. It aids to mark the whole character. It aids to form the man. From the cradle to the grave, through all the changing scenes of life, Ministering Spirits cheer him on his way.* And every child of God should know it. Every Christian lamb should feel its reality. And every Christian man should acknowledge it, and adore Him, who has "ordained and constituted the services of Angels and men in a wonderful order."

Do then, dear Mr. Editor, on this festal-day of St. Michael and All Angels, fling your BANNER to the breeze, bearing the hymn for Angels Ministrant.

Ministering Angels.

Heb. i. 14; Matt. xviii. 10.

Do angel's minister to me?

Can such a wonder ever be?

O, sure they are too great,

Too glorious, with their raiment white,

And wings so beautiful and bright,

Upon a child to wait!

Yet so it is, in truth, I know;

For JESUS CHRIST has told us so;†

And that to them is given

The loving task to guard with care,

And keep from every evil snare,

The chosen ones of Heaven.

He says of children's angels, too,

That they His Father's glory view,

And stand before His sight,

In presence of that awful throne

Whose pavement is of sardine stone,

Whose canopy, of light.

When sinful men return to God,

Admonish'd by His chastening rod,

And cast the base alloy

Of Satan's leaven† far away,

And all in tears repent and pray,

The angels sing for joy.

And so, if I am good and mild,

And try to be a holy child,

My angel will rejoice,

And sound his golden harp to Him

Who dwells among the cherubim,

And praise him with his voice.

But if I sin against the LORD,

By evil thought or evil word,

Or do a wicked thing,

Ah! then what will my angel say?

Oh, he will turn his face away,

And veil it with his wing!

Then let me pray to Him who sends

His angels down to be our friends,

That, strengthened by His grace,

I may not prove a wandering sheep,

Nor ever make my angel weep,

Or hide his glorious face!

Obituary, by Dr. Ducault

DIED, at his residence, in Philadelphia, on Sunday evening, the 17th September, 1848, EDWARD SHIPPEN BURD, Esquire, in the sixty-ninth year of his age.—Bereaved by the dispensations of Divine Providence of all his children, he was, in his immediate branch, the last male heir of lines of honored ancestry distinguished among their fellow citizens, from the settlement of Pennsylvania, through successive generations, for their virtues, wealth and influence. Of the former Chief Justice, Edward Shippen, the deceased was a grandson. His father, the late Edward Burd, Esq., himself a son of Col. Burd, was esteemed through his long life, and is well remembered for his usefulness, probity and benevolence. At the close of the last, and the commencement of the present century, the father being Prothonotary of the Supreme Court of Pennsylvania, when the writs issued from the office at Philadelphia ran through the whole Commonwealth, the son, while yet a youth, made the circuit of the State as the representative of the Prothonotary; and as a near connexion of Judges Shippen and Yeates, was admitted into the judicial family, and heard the deliberations for decision of those eminent jurists, McKean, Shippen and Yeates, whose opinions are the earliest of those transmitted to us by the press, through the report of Mr. Dallas, and their authors justly regarded as in a great measure the founders of Pennsylvania jurisprudence. Educated in the office of Edward Tilghman, the most profound among distinguished lawyers, as regards the learning of the law of real property, Mr. Burd became thoroughly imbued with that branch of the law, and his knowledge of land titles combined with the highest integrity and an unusual scrupulosity, served to command an implicit confidence in the numerous titles that passed through his name. In connexion with the late John H. Brinton, Esq., he at successive periods during life, purchased large portions of the plot of the city and adjoining districts, and promoted improvements that largely extended and ornamented Philadelphia. By a liberal and skilful enterprise the deceased had acquired a competent fortune, when by the will of his father he and his children derived a splendid accession, in a moiety of the estate that had been accumulated by the industry and skill of the testator. The revenues of the estates Mr. Burd spent with liberality, especially during his residences in Europe, where his countrymen always received a cordial welcome, and shared a generous hospitality; and not a few, when they needed it, strangers in a strange land, his willing charity.

In the latter portion of his life, Mr. Burd was in a considerable degree withdrawn from the intimate association of his fellow-citizens, owing to absence or the seclusion induced by his domestic sorrows; and but comparatively few had an opportunity of observing and appreciating his elevated traits of character; or of knowing the sympathizing and generous impulses of his heart. His habits of business were of the strictest order, his integrity and honour of unsullied purity, his knowledge ample, and his judgment always judicious and wise. It was owing to the possession of these qualifications, as well as to personal regard, that the late excellent Chief Justice Tilghman made him his Executor, and the late Mrs. Elizabeth Powel procured him to write her will and act as her executor; an appointment not without distinction, since she was distinguished for sagacity and penetration into character, and was intimately familiar with its highest examples from the enjoyment of the friendship of Washington and of most of the distinguished founders of our republic.

In the final dispositions of his large estates, the testamentary instrument is found to be characteristic of its author, as the character of Mr. Burd was understood by those who knew him best. No public institution is founded at the sacrifice of feeling for relatives and friends, with the ambitious purpose of perpetuating his name, though with him to become extinct. To the beloved partner of his bosom he has naturally manifested his devoted attachment by a princely endowment, and to the ties of blood in its immediate and collateral relations he has shewn a liberality beyond their expectation;—while the claims of friendship and faithful service have been munificently recognized. But the most touching dispositions of the will are those that exhibit the traces of a bleeding heart and an inconsolable sorrow, for children cut off in the beauty and purity of their youth; in the ample provision for the nurse of their infancy; for the beloved pastor who instilled their religious instruction; for the Church where they had worshipped their Maker; and in its designation as the hallowed receptacle of a work of art, that in the inspired conception of genius, shall give an immortal expression to the parental grief and the translation of daughters, who had in their lovely womanhood but touched this sphere, before they took their flight to a better world. May we not hope that the splendid bequest for this affecting commemoration will command the efforts of the most gifted of American sculptors, and while the conception and execution shall immortalize this domestic sorrow in the sanctuary of the Church, prove forever hereafter a beautiful study to the American artist.

While we mourn a departed friend, let us not forget the impressive lesson divinely taught through his lasting and intensest of sufferings, which boundless wealth, with no heir to inherit it, could only aggravate and embitter. Yet did he with a fortitude belonging to his firm character, submit himself to the teachings of the divine behest. But the scenes of domestic bliss had been for him turned to woe; his last hope had been blighted; and by sorrow was the strong man bowed to the earth, and sunk to the tomb. With its immediate prospect before him did he assemble his family and friends, and in the most solemn and affecting manner take leave of his beloved wife and sister, his friends and domestics, expressing his reliance on his Almighty Redeemer, and invoking for them the blessing of God. His final and peaceful close gave his mourning attendants the comforting and consoling proof—

"How blest the righteous when he dies!

When sinks a weary soul to rest;

How mildly beam the closing eyes,

How gently heaves the expiring breast."

We add to the foregoing well deserved obituary from the pen of a friend, that a few nights before Mr. Burd's death, (expecting it to be his last,) he said to those around him: "Here is my dear friend and beloved wife sitting by my side, my sister has entered the room, and here is my valued friend Mr. Price; and my household domestics I have requested to be seated in my chamber. They are here to hear what I may have to say to them. They have been kind and attentive to me, and would do all they can to prolong my life. I have formed the opinion that I cannot recover; I am too much prostrated, and expect to meet my end. I am now within the jaws of death. All that I can do, is patiently and resignedly to meet the event that awaits me. I am about to take wing to another world, trusting for my safety only to my Almighty Redeemer. I bid you all an affectionate farewell. My dearly beloved wife," (taking and tenderly pressing her hand,) "my dear sister, and my friends, with all the solemnity of the occasion, I ask for you all the benediction of a Christian man. Still in one way or another enough allotted duties, while I await the great event which is to befall me, has been done to prove that the Red man is capable of being civilized and christianized; that he is in capability and nature Mr. Burd was never very communicative to any one on the subject of his religious views and feelings; but his faith was a Board of Missions doing for these people? We have very incordance with that of the Church. He was always interested in her prosperity; regularly attended her worship, until growing infirmities kept him at home; and had communed at her altar. His interest in the welfare of religion, and his reverence for it, may be inferred from his munificence to his Pastor; and from the fact that he has left an equal and liberal share of his extensive fortune, to him, the Rector of St. Stephen's church, in trust for the use and benefit of that parish; besides a legacy of ten thousand dollars for the erection of a monument, within the walls of that sanctuary, to the memory of three of his children, all of whom, to use his own expression, "had there been trained for heaven."

In what esteem he was held in the congregation to which he belonged, and with whom he had worshipped for twenty-five years, may be seen from the subjoined notice of the action of the Vestry, on the occasion of his death.

Wednesday evening. }

At a special meeting of the Vestry of St. Stephen's church, held this day, the Rector in the chair, Tobias Wagner being Secretary pro tem, the following preamble and resolutions were offered and read, viz:

Whereas, The Vestry of St. Stephen's church have received intelligence of the recent decease of EDWARD S. BURD, Esq., one of the founders of this parish, and for many years a valuable member of this Corporation; and, whereas this Vestry are desirous of testifying their high respect for his memory, therefore,

Resolved, That we accept the invitation sent to us by the family of the deceased; and will, in a body, attend his funeral on Thursday next.

Resolved, That the wardens be requested to order the bell of St. Stephen's church to be muffled and tolled on the day of the funeral, in such manner and at such times as they shall think proper.

Resolved, That a committee of two be appointed to draft a letter of condolence to the respected widow of the deceased, and to deliver the same to her, as expressive of the sentiments and feelings of this body.

Resolved, That these resolutions be entered upon the minutes of this day as unanimously passed; and that a copy of the same, signed by the Rector and the Wardens, and attested by the signature of the Secretary, and the seal of this Corporation, be delivered to Mrs. Burd forthwith.

Whereupon, The foregoing preamble and resolutions, being put by the chair, were unanimously carried and adopted.

The Rector then appointed Charles N. Bancker, Esq., and the Hon. George M. Dallas, the committee to prepare the letter of condolence, as directed by the Board.

New York.—A stated meeting of the New York Ecclesiological Society will be held at St. Paul's Sunday School Room on Monday Oct. 2d, at 7½ o'clock, P. M. Entrance from Vesey St. By order of the Committee.

THOMAS S. PRESTON,
Recording Secretary.

New York, Sept. 19th, 1848. Maryland.—CONFIRMATIONS.—On Sunday the Twelfth after Trinity, September 1th, from St. John's Church, St. John's Parish, Baltimore and Harford counties, two persons.

On Monday September 11th, in Christ Church, Rock Spring, Harford county, nine persons.

On Saturday, the 16th, in St. Luke's Church, Bladensburg, three persons.

On Sunday the Thirteenth after Trinity, in St. Mark's Church, Zion Parish, Prince George county, three persons.—Church Times.

Maine.—On the twelfth Sunday after Trinity, September 10, in St. Mark's Church, Augusta, the Bishop admitted to the Sacred Order of Priests, the Rev. D. R. Goodwin, Professor of Modern Languages in Bowdoin College. Morning Prayer was read by Rev. Alexander Burgess. The Sermon was preached by the Bishop, Text, 2 Timothy i. 6. The Candidate was presented by Rev. T. F. Fales, of Brunswick. Both the above named Presbyters united with the Bishop in the laying on of hands.—Witness.

RAVENSCROFT SEMINARY, COLUMBIA, MAURY COUNTY, TENNESSEE, under the control of the Bishop and Convention of the Protestant Episcopal Church in the Diocese of Tennessee. The Collegiate Department of this Institution will be opened in Columbia, on Monday the 4th day of September.

Instead of the customary college arrangements for boarding—(one large building for dormitories, a steward, and table in common.)—our students will be received into the family of the President or of a Professor, that they may have the constant care and tenderness of parental oversight; no head of a household being allowed to take a greater number than will consist with the order and quietness of a strictly home circle. Particular attention will be paid to every thing affecting their health and proper physical development; such as diet, exercise, bathing and prudent changes of clothing. Personal habits in the chamber, at table, and in the parlour, will be formed under a circumspection and refinement which, we trust, will satisfy the fondest parental solicitude.

A much more solemn responsibility is assumed in their RELIGIOUS TRAINING. As, in our sober judgment, "a Christian is the highest style of man," so we must feel, in the case of every student, that we are successful in his proper education, only in the degree in which he understands, loves and obeys the Faith of the Gospel in the Church of Christ. The Bible and Prayer-book will be our guides in this, the most important part of our duty, and will be in daily use.

THE COURSE OF ACADEMICAL INSTRUCTION will comprise all the branches of Classical, Philosophical, and Business Education; so as to prepare the student, by both his training and his acquired knowledge, for the retired pursuits of the Scholar or Man of Science, the active duties of the Learned Professions, or the successful despatch of business in the diversified occupations of Commercial Life.

THE PLAN OF STUDY, being the distinguishing feature of our tuitionary system, and that on whose results we shall mainly rely for the literary character of the Seminary, we give it a separate and conspicuous place in this Circular, and invite especial attention to it.

THE DISCIPLINE OF THE SEMINARY will be maintained with such strictness as will render severity unnecessary. Loving back to his duty him that has been overtaken in a fault, and patient even with the refractory, a due regard to the safety of the rest will oblige us to dismiss the vicious and incorrigible. A monthly report of particulars in their studies and behaviour will be given in the "GUARDIAN," to which the particular attention of parents is requested.

VACATIONS. The academical year will be divided into two sessions of five months each. The first will begin on the first Monday in September; the second on the first Monday of March. The month of August will be the Summer vacation, and the month of February the Winter vacation.

EXPENSES. For the academical year the charge is fixed at $250, payable in advance; viz., $125 at the beginning of each session.—In this charge are included board, lodging, washing, fuel and lights, and tuition in ALL THE BRANCHES OF EDUCATION TAUGHT IN THE SEMINARY, embracing those for which students are usually subjected to EXTRA charges, such as the Modern Languages, Music, Drawing, &c., &c.

THE PLAN OF STUDY

Will be founded on that recommended and enforced by the illustrious Professor JARDINE, which has given such celebrity to the University of Glasgow: and we cordially express our obligations to that great teacher for several parts of the following scheme. It will combine what are regarded as the two great objects of a liberal Education. From his first entrance into the school, the student will be trained in such exercises as are best fitted to engage, develop, and improve his powers of intellect and taste; while he will be conducted gradually to the knowledge of those general subjects, which must form the basis of every art or science or liberal pursuit, in which he may be afterwards engaged. As in such a Seminary, the abilities of the students, their tastes, their circumstances in life, and future destinations in the world will be very different, due regard shall be paid to these differences; and likewise, in the progress of individual culture, the greatest care shall be taken that the exercises be selected with due regard to the powers of the Student, accommodated to their condition, and stage of advancement, and such as are fitted to interest his mind and encourage his exertions. It is thus only that he can be taught to use his own faculties with satisfaction and success; and no tuitionary system which has not that for its principal end can fail to lead to habits of intellectual dependence, if not to the degradation of the understanding.

THE GREEK AND LATIN LANGUAGES will, accordingly, be taught on the most approved system to all who desire the acquisition of them. As intellectual gymnastics—as inuring the student betimes to intellectual difficulties—as the means of securing a solid and vigorous application at that period of life which will materially influence every part of his subsequent career, they are not surpassed by any other subjects. Stored with the exquisite literature of ancient times, the mind of the student will be better fitted than it could be through any other preparation, for entering on the study of our own and other modern languages in speech and writing. He comes fresh from the contemplation of the classical models whose intellectual subtlety or fervid imaginations have delighted the loftiest minds of every age; he is full of the beautiful descriptions and enchanting images of ancient song, and imbued with the numberless stirring and charming associations connected with classical history and tradition, and with the brilliant host of minds that displayed their diversified endowments during some of the most glorious eras of human history. It can scarcely be doubted that an enamoured familiarity with these old and established directors of taste and judgment forms the best preparation for the study of the English language, including the arts of composition and elocution.

In like manner, MATHEMATICS will receive proper attention, as a means of producing habits of regular and steady attention, and of accustoming young persons to form their judgments on clear and certain evidence. The unbounded utility of this science in extending the sphere of physical knowledge; its dignity and sublimity as an instrument of thought in the very highest tracks to which intellect soars in the search of truth; and its general subserviency to the most exalted pleasures which Reason, enlightened and refined, is capable of enjoying, must ever make it an important part of every rational academical course.

NATURAL PHILOSOPHY, too, being the most rigorous investigation of truth which the human mind has ever pursued, its study, as more discipline of the intellect, must be most beneficial, and will, therefore, receive a proportionate share of regard.

But the distinguishing feature of the intellectual education of the RAVENSCROFT SEMINARY is that we aim not merely at the communication of knowledge, but, in a far higher degree, at the formation of those habits of THINKING, JUDGING, REASONING, and COMMUNICATION, upon which the farther prosecution of literature and science and of the business of real life depends; and at the culture, also, of those sensibilities and affections which ameliorate and adorn every stage of human existence. It is upon our tuitionary system for accomplishing these important ends, that we principally rely for favor and support from an intelligent and discriminating community, in this eminently practical age. The system comprises a series of familiar Lectures, Examinations on the subjects of the Lectures, and Themes prescribed by the Professor, and executed by every member of the class.

As soon as the student is prepared to advance beyond the sphere of rudimental instruction, he will be invited to cultivate an intimate acquaintance with his own mind by the study of Intellectual Philosophy. The principal purpose kept in view in the Lectures and Examinations will be to assist the pupil in forming clear notions of what is studied, and in using well-defined language in his own compositions. While such exercises tend to increase knowledge, they leave their traces behind, in confirming all the habits which are connected with acquiring or communicating information.

Another source from which we derive the materials for intellectual culture is the Philosophy of Language, involving its origin and progress, and the principles of General Grammar. There is nothing, in the whole range of education, more easily accommodated to the understandings of the young, or more closely connected with every other branch of literature and Art. These topics invite the attention of young persons of all descriptions, and entice them to read the books which treat of such subjects with curiosity and with interest.

THE PHILOSOPHY OF TASTE forms another branch of our system; and the inquiries connected with it are peculiarly well adapted to the introduction of various subsidiary topics, fitted to interest the minds of the young, to encourage application, and to furnish abundant materials for discussion and reflection. The means of improvement consist of directions for studying, in the first place, the beauty and grandeur of external nature.—next, the best models of composition in the several departments of Poetry, Eloquence, and History:—and, lastly, the principles of the art of Criticism:—the whole being accompanied with such examples and illustrations as seem best adapted to assist the comprehension and memory of those members of the class who are least advanced in age.

The regular requirement of THEMES constitutes one of the most important means to which we shall resort for promoting the intellectual processes of independent inquiry, of reasoning, of composition, and of communication. In proportion to the frequency and regularity with which these combined operations are performed, a permanent disposition to exert them is acquired; and those powers which at first demanded firm, voluntary determinations, will be afterwards exercised without effort, and apparently without volition. As the young artist is no sooner made acquainted with a rule than he is required to practise it, and to produce specimens for the examination and correction of the master; so must the teacher prescribe subjects for specimens or themes, which his pupils shall be required to execute, according to the directions given them; and these are, afterwards to be subjected to his correction and amendment.

With the view, however, of unfolding and extending the power of Gentius, our students will be sometimes left to make rules for themselves in the selection and management of their themes. The rules of schoolmen prevent deviation and irregularities; but they cannot lead to the highest degree of excellence. Young persons should be left on some occasions, to the native impulse of genius and of taste. The great variety of talent in a school, should be allowed to disclose itself naturally; and not always be forced into the same direction, or be stretched on the same Procrustean bed.

There are other intellectual habits, by which the important business of life is carried on (in addition to those above mentioned,) and which can only be acquired by such exercises as tend to promote decision and despatch, to remove doubt and hesitation, and to lead the mind to seize the fittest occasions and the happiest moments for decisive and vigorous exertion. Our system of education tends to the acquisition of these habits, by cultivating presence of mind, a ready command of the intellectual faculties, fertility in expedients, spirit in the attempt, and celerity in execution. To counteract doubt, delay, or hesitancy, questions will be often put which will compel the student to take his ground immediately; and encouragement will be given to those who show the greatest activity and readiness. Again,—to enable the student to apply his faculties to any subject with the same ease in the presence of others, as in private, he shall be accustomed to stand up in his place, to collect his thoughts, to express them on subjects so selected as to require him to survey his store of knowledge, and to bring forth whatever may be necessary to his purpose.

To the highest classes will be given a course of lectures embracing a critical and historical survey of ENGLISH LITERATURE from the age of Chaucer to the present times. Our students will thus have an opportunity of becoming thoroughly acquainted with approved authors, and will be taught to have the great master pieces of prose and poetry present to their minds, regulating their trains of thought and modes of expression.

All the students of this Seminary will be regularly and frequently exercised in the art of Elocution. Proficiency in it implies high talent and sensibility united with cultivated powers of voice and gesture.

Such is a brief account of our proposed tuitionary system. Farther information will be cheerfully given should it be desired by parents or guardians. We have only to add that beginners will be received, and carefully grounded in the elementary branches of the usual school course.

At the next session of the Legislature application will be made for a charter, with the power to confer the highest collegiate honors. In advance of this, however, the different professorships will be filled by the ablest men that can be procured. Meanwhile the full course of instruction will be carried on by the President, and the Professor of Intellectual Philosophy and English Literature, DONALD MACLEOD, A. M., University of Glasgow.

Academy of the Protestant Episcopal Church,

341 Market Street.

The Autumnal Session will begin on Friday, September 1.

An addition having been made to the number of the Teachers, the schools, of which the Academy consists, (from one to another of which the pupils pass every forty minutes,) will be increased after the present vacation to six. The whole, as heretofore, will be superintended daily by the Principal, and from time to time by the Bishop of the Diocese and a monthly Committee appointed for the purpose by the Board of Trustees. Circulars may be had at the Bookstore of Messrs. E. C. & J. Biddle, 8 W. corner of 5th and Minor sts., and after the present month, of the Janitor at the Academy.

G. EMLEN HARE, Principal.

Extracts from Bishop Potter's Annual Addresses to the Convention of the Diocese.

To the Convention of 1846.—"It gives me great pleasure to inform the Convention that some important measures have been adopted during the last year, towards securing to our youth the advantages of superior classical instruction, in connection with proper religious training. The classical department of the Protestant Episcopal Academy, which was established in this city more than fifty years since, (through the agency of Bishop White and others, has been re-opened under the auspices of the Rev. Dr. Hare, and will afford to parents in this vicinity the means of educating boys in the most approved manner. Its funds have enabled the Trustees to make liberal provision for the sons of Clergymen, and others, on whom the charges of instruction would fall heavily, and it is hoped that the Academy will prove rich in blessing to many families."

To the Convention of 1847.—"I had occasion in my last address to call the attention of the Diocese to the provisions, which had just been made, to secure to the sons of clergymen a superior classical training, in connection with proper religious culture. The Episcopal Academy in this city, under the care of the Rev. Dr. Hare, had then just been opened. The anticipations entertained of its usefulness have been more than realized. Its numbers have increased beyond expectation, and its discipline and course of instruction are worthy of all praise. In its influence generally, and especially in its care of the manners, morals and religious principles of the young, it vindicates its claims to the confidence of all the members of our Church; and having occasion frequently myself to visit the school, I feel the greater assurance in recommending it to general favor."

To the Convention of 1848.—"The Academy in this city, under the care of the Rev. Dr. Hare, has had a career, thus far, of great and uninterrupted prosperity; and it is exerting an influence on the principles and character of our children which will be felt for good long after our own earthly course has terminated. It now numbers nearly one hundred pupils." Aug. 19—3w.

Bojesen's and Arnold's Manual of Greek and Roman Antiquities.

A Manual of Grecian and Roman Antiquities, by D. E. F. Bojesen, Prof. of Greek Language and Literature in the University of Sorø. Translated from the German. Edited by Thos. K. Arnold, M. A. First American edition, with additions and corrections. One vol. 12mo; price $1, or in 2 vols, 62½ cents each.

The present Manuals of Greek and Roman Antiquities are far superior to any thing on the same topics as yet offered to the American Republic. A leading Review of Germany says:—"The conciseness and precision which the author has every where prescribed to himself, prevents the superficial observer from perceiving the essential superiority of the book to its predecessors; but whoever subjects it to a careful examination will discover this on every page." The editor observes:—"I fully believe the pupil will receive from these little books a correct and complete picture of Grecian and Roman life. What I may call the political portions—the account of the national constitutions and their effects—appear to me of great value; and the moderate extent of each volume admits of its being thoroughly mastered—of its being got up and retained."

Shelby College, Shelbyville, Ky.

This Institution, which has just closed a prosperous session, is located on the McAdamized road between Louisville and Frankfort, in one of the most desirable and healthful regions of the West. It is under the control and patronage of the Diocese of Kentucky. Arrangements have recently been made for the completion of extensive additions to the present College buildings, for the accommodation of students, and for the erection of an Astronomical Observatory. Every facility will be furnished for the thorough instruction of youth in this Institution, and due diligence will be required of every class of its pupils in the prosecution of their respective studies. Those who have the control of Shelby College are resolved that it shall contribute its full share in forming and perpetuating an elevated standard of collegiate discipline and scholarship. The President will receive the sons of members of the Church in his family, and give special attention to their religious and moral, as well as to their literary education.

Strict attention will be given to the training of the pupils of this Institution in the various branches of English education, as well as to classical and scientific instruction. Candidates for the ministry and sons of clergymen will receive the benefits of the College gratuitously.

FACULTY.

REV. WM. J. WALLER, M. D., President, and Professor of Intellectual and Moral Philosophy, and Natural Science.

W. W. THEOBALD, A. M., Professor of Ancient and Modern Languages.

JOSEPH WINLOCK, A. M., Professor of Mathematics and Mechanical Philosophy.

PRINCIPAL OF THE PREPARATORY DEPARTMENT.

An able and efficient officer will be engaged for this department before the beginning of the next session. The ensuing session will commence on the first Wednesday of September next.

There is already belonging to the College one of the most extensive and most judiciously selected Theological Libraries west of the mountains, which will be gradually enlarged. And as it is the design of the Faculty and Trustees, that the exact and natural sciences shall be thoroughly studied by its pupils, the Institution has been furnished with an elegant Chemical and Philosophical Apparatus, as well as an extensive assortment of the best text books in these departments.

ANNUAL CHARGES.

For instruction in the Classics and the Sciences, per session of 10 months, $40 00
Modern Languages—French, German, Italian or Spanish, each 20 00
English Studies, in the Preparatory Department, 25 to 30
Board, Fuel, Washing, &c., for a session of 10 months, 110 00
Fuel, and Servant's hire for Public Rooms, 3 50
Music and Drawing, if desired, 15 00
The expenditures of all the boys who may become members of the President's family, will be exclusively controlled by him. This rule is absolutely necessary, and will be insisted on in every case. Its firm, but mild enforcement, is found to operate, so as to effectually prevent the vexatious consequences which never fail to attend youthful extravagance and folly.

Those who may desire further information, may obtain it by addressing the subscriber, Shelbyville, Ky.

Images of God.

BY THE REV. JAMES GILBORNE LYONS, LL.D.

Nor from the noble quarry,
Nor from the wealthy mine,
Shalt thou bring images of God
To deck His house or shrine:
Carra's marble mountains
Before His face are dim;
The purest gold, that Sibir yields,
Recoils abash'd at Him.

Canova's art and chisel
Could faultless beauty give;
His glowing thought and magic touch
Could make dead marble live:—
For him lost Nymphs and Heroes:
Would from the rough block spring;
But weak were all Canova's skill
To frame the seraph's King.

In stone of snowy whiteness,
And precious ores of Earth,
Triumphant Genius carves or moulds
All shapes of human birth;
He calls up forms and features,
Which never yet have been,
But vainly will he toil or think
To show—THE GREAT UNSEEN.

If thou wouldst find His likeness,
Search where the lowly dwell,
The faithful few that keep His laws
Not boastfully but well:
Mark those who walk rejoicing
The way which Jesus trod;—
Thus only shalt thou see below
FIT IMAGES OF GOD.

Christian Songs, Third Edition.

From the British Magazine.

Modern Monasticism.

In some late numbers of the Times newspaper have appeared a report of an appeal to the House of Lords from a decision of the Lord Chancellor of Ireland, and likewise some general observations on the case in an editorial article. The case is one to which we had already directed the attention of our readers in the Magazine for September, 1847, in a notice of Mr. O'Leary's useful "Treatise on Dispositions of Property for Religious and Charitable Uses, as affected by Recent Acts and Decisions," where a report was given of the Irish Chancellor's decision, which we reprinted.*

The case, which on many accounts is extremely important and deserving of attention, was that of a bill filed in the Irish Court of Chancery by the superiors of the Convent of Ursuline Nuns, near the city of Cork, in Ireland, to recover for the convent some property to which they alleged two of their nuns were legally entitled. The facts of the case are so clearly stated in the editorial article in the Times, that it will be desirable to transcribe it, as it will enable the reader to understand more easily the legal arguments before the House of Lords, and the subsequent decision of their lordships.

"We published yesterday the report of an appeal before the House of Lords of a character so extraordinary as to deserve all the attention which we can bestow for it. Some details of the transaction involved have appeared already from time to time in our columns, but it will be best to furnish the reader with a brief recapitulation of the entire case, in order that an opinion may be the more readily formed on the point at issue. We are not much in the habit of issuing impassioned appeals to the Protestant public, but we really think an occasion has now presented itself on which they may exert a very judicious vigilance, and construct a serviceable moral.

"On the 12th of July, 1843, Alexander M'Carthy, Esq., departed this life in the city of Cork, leaving behind him ten children, and property to the value of 100,000*l.* Two of these children had previously entered a religious community, denominating themselves the Professed Nuns of the Order of St. Ursula, of Blackrock, in the county of Cork. Maria was the first to take the veil, and she carried with her to her spiritual consorts a portion of 1000*l.* Her sister Catherine contracted a like symbolical alliance, and with a similar dowry, in the year succeeding, and both at the time of their father's death had been full and accepted members of the society for some three or four years. It happened that Mr. M'Carthy, though he left several bequests and outlines of his intended will, eventually died intestate, so that his eldest son, Alexander, claimed as heir-at-law, and the remaining children became beneficially interested in the personal property of the deceased as sole nearest of kin. A month after his father's decease, Alexander took out administration to the estate, and finally divided the effects among the family, but to the exclusion of his sisters, Maria and Catherine. In consequence hereof, on the 29th of December, in the same year, Maria executed a deed of assignment of all her distributive share or interest in the personal estate of her father, to Cecilia Fulham and Margaret Lynch, of Blackrock, aforesaid, spinsters, and their executors, administrators, and assigns—a surrender which was duly followed, after the lapse of a few weeks, by a similar act of her sister Catherine's, for the use and behoof of the self-same parties. The representatives of the convent accordingly sued the administrator for the two shares in the estate thus acquired by the community, but were defeated by a decision of the Lord Chancellor of Ireland, on the 1st of December, 1846. Against this decision has been brought the appeal of which the hearing will be resumed to-day.

"The case, which has been argued at great length on both sides, is full of the most instructive details respecting the practical operation of modern monasticism; but our space will not permit us to digress from the consideration of the great point at issue—the competency, that is, of parties situated like these two sisters, to execute such acts as are here described. For the family it was urged, that the deceased always conceived himself to have already made adequate provision for his 'professed' daughters by the 1000*l.* which he had paid upon their respective admissions—a sum which was considerably above the premium usually received; that in the outlines of his will which he left behind him, these children had been excluded from any further participation in the property on these express grounds, and that the sisters themselves had repeatedly admitted and acknowledged that the provisions made for their respective uses were absolutely final. We should hardly like to defend the case on such grounds as these, but the question is, not what were the legal claims of the sisters in their own persons, but what is the value of these claims when transferred to such parties and under such circumstances as the pleadings disclose.

"It is alleged that the reluctance of the recluses to appear in their own persons was the simple cause of the transfer, but against this affirmation is brought a mass of depositions to show that it was never the wish of the sisters that the family property should pass into the hands of strangers; and that as they had neither the need nor the competency to acquire wealth of themselves, they were willing and desirous that their shares should be absorbed in the dividends of the rest of the family. At the first interview which Alexander obtained with his sister Catherine, after their father's death, she told him, on learning there was no will, that 'she was sure the convent would set up a claim to their shares; that she was bound by her vows to do as she was ordered; but that the Roman-catholic bishop of Cork had power to authorize her to dispose of her property as she thought good.' For this authorization she subsequently applied, but after being bandied about between the titular prelate and the superior of the convent, she was at length told that she 'must observe her vow of obedience.' On her intimating gently that a court of equity would surely protect her from the compulsion of distributing her property against her conscience, the bishop is stated in the pleadings to have replied, 'If these are your ideas, madam, let me tell you I have lawyers in my family as well as you, and this is too good a thing not to be looked after.' With regard to the execution of the assignments in question, an express statement of Maria is alleged that she signed the deed 'with the greatest pain,' and solely 'in conformity with her vow of obedience; that she had 'cried all night long' after doing so, and had 'no free will of her own; that her act was 'like the act of a dead person,' and that the 'operation of her vow was like the presentation of a pistol by a highwayman.' Catherine's condition was not dissimilar. When one of her brothers called at the parlour of the convent to see her, he was told by Maria 'that she was unwell; that she had suffered much from the censure of the bishop, and was undergoing punishment.' Subsequently, however, she did come down, bearing 'all the appearance of having suffered much, both mentally and corporeally, when she stated, that 'a pen might as well have been put into the hands of a corpse as into hers when she signed the deed,' and added that she had 'accidentally procured a book in the convent containing the rules of the order, and that she had found therein that the punishment awarded on the continent for a serious crime was to be immured between two walls in a standing posture, and be fed on bread and water, and that in some cases parties had been known to die from the punishment.'

"These few extracts will probably lead our readers to a due appreciation of the audacity or the avarice which has impelled Cecilia Fulham and Margaret Lynch into the presence of a British House of Lords. We are not concerned with the substantiation either of one plea or the other in this particular case, but what we conceive to be self-evident is, that in no case whatever can any deed of any person under 'vow of obedience' executed for the direct or indirect benefit of the parties to whom the obedience is due, be taken as a valid instrument upon any known principles of equity or justice. It may be decided that the administrator to the estate of the deceased had no right to assume the provisions of a will which his father omitted to make, and to exclude two of his sisters from their share of the inheritance, but it can surely never be decided that these shares belong to the Blackrock Nunnery. The question at issue is the civil competency of a nun, which should be settled wholly one way or wholly the other. If Catherine and Maria M'Carthy have enough of civil life left to execute a deed, they have enough left to enjoy property, all the ordinances of St. Ursula and all the other saints of the calendar to the contrary, notwithstanding. They cannot be alive as regards the power of conveyance, and dead as regards the power of possession. Perhaps on the whole it would be better that the civil deicide implied by monastic vows should be literally accepted by the world without, and that such exclusion as that to which Alexander M'Carthy subjected his sisters should be warranted by law. At any rate the present century will tolerate no such revival of those particular monastic practices which have been here exposed."

In addition to these statements, it may be as well to add, what we happen to be informed of, that the father of Miss M'Carthy having made a large fortune in business, and being anxious to give his children such an education as he considered suitable to their circumstances, sent his two daughters, as boarders, to the Ursuline Convent. When he found, however, that the nuns had persuaded these girls (as they are in the habit of doing where their pupils are likely to bring wealth to the convent) to take the veil, he was seriously disappointed and displeased; but considering it more becoming his own circumstances, as they had chosen in this manner to alienate themselves from their families, to enable them to enter the order in a creditable manner, he paid the convent 1000*l.* with each of them, the usual sum required being no more than 800*l.* It is also to be observed, that although Mr. M'Carthy died intestate, there was no doubt whatever in the minds of any of his family, of what his intentions were respecting his two daughters who had taken the veil; as it was perfectly understood that, knowing that whatever he should leave them would be taken possession of by the convent, he had determined not to leave them any claim on his property, and in this intention the two sisters entirely acquiesced. It appears, also, that to avoid litigation, a proposal was made by their brother, the administrator, to pay his sister Catherine an annuity of 300*l.* a year during her life, and that she wished to accept of this compromise, rather than be dragged before the public by the convent as a complainant against her brother. But the convent would not agree to this, and in the interview which she had with the late Bishop Murphy, of Cork, to whom the superior of the convent referred her, he told her that her vow of poverty prevented her from compromising her claim for an annuity of that amount, instead of her distributive share, and informed her that the whole belonged to the convent.* Subsequently the convent compelled the sisters to join them in a suit in Chancery to recover their distributive shares from their brother. The Chancellor dismissed the bill with costs, chiefly on the ground that Miss M'Carthy and her sister, as nuns, and simply as such, were under a continuous coercion sufficient to make any deed executed by them utterly null and void; and he held that the moment the vow is taken, the member of one of these religious orders ceases to be a free agent in the distribution of any property that may devolve upon her, and becomes enslaved by the rules and regulations of the community, without any possibility of relieving herself from the dominion of the vows thus taken upon her.

From this decision the heads of the convent have appealed to the House of Lords, and their appeal has not been dismissed. However, from the pertinacity with which they appear determined to pursue their claim, it would seem not at all improbable that they will file a new bill in the Irish Court of Chancery.

The appeal was argued before the House, July 14th, and 17th, and the following is the report which appeared in the Times, and which we earnestly recommend to the attentive perusal and consideration of our readers.

From the Churchman.

Unlawful Marriages.

Mr Editor.—After reading attentively the Report, to the Queen, of the English Commissioners, reprinted in your paper of August 26, I offer to your notice, and that of your readers, the following remarks.

The Report does not enter into the merits of the question, the principal subject being that of marrying a deceased wife's sister; it is confined by the terms of the appointment of the Commissioners, to "the state and operation of the (English) law of marriage." Accurate minds will so understand it. But of the public at large, many will peruse it as an investigation of the main point—the compatibility of such marriages with a sound and safe conscience, and duty to God. This is unfortunate. One can hardly be deemed exacting, if he allege that, in a country where Church and State are explicitly united, the broad merits, the ground everywhere of a right judgment in the matter, should have been embodied in the Commissioners' Report. Instead of which, at the nearest approach to that cardinal point, it is only remarked, "We consider that the feeling (not the principle or conscientious scruple) against these marriages is, in a great measure, founded rather on a vague and uninformed assumption that they are prohibited by God's Word, than on a mature examination either of the Scriptures or of the law of the Church." This paragraph contains, I presume, the opinion of the Commissioners, that the prohibition is not scriptural; but it is unsupported, throughout, as to the voice of "God's Word," by a single reference or argument.

Yet on "God's Word" depends, among Christians, the final determination. This the Report allows, declaring, "If this opinion be admitted, cadit quæstio," the opinion "that these marriages are forbidden expressly, or inferentially, by Scripture." Instead, however, of closing in upon this vital consideration, they merely advert to the popular judgment, unenlightened as it is, and as they admit it to be,—"But it does not appear that this opinion is generally entertained." Neither the "feeling" that the bible forbids, nor the want of an "opinion" to that effect, is examined. This abstinence from the main point need not be referred to a disposition to avoid or evade it, though more than enough of that unmanly caution may be found on both sides of the Atlantic. The Commissioners had their line given them, and they have adhered to it. Yet, "God's Word" being left unsearched by the Report, we cannot but regret that wherever be the fault, the union of the sacred and the secular can result in the semblant predominance of the latter.

"God's Word" is final. And this its awful prerogative entitles it to awful deference in gathering its verdict. An intimation is enough; so is a probability: and if there be a doubt of its interpretation, the doubt accrues, not, as in other investigations, to the liberty of the governed, against apprehended encroachments of fallible governors, but the other way, to their restraint, to the greater completeness of their indefeasible and intangible obligation to the unerring and illimitable Sovereign. These are postulates, requiring only to be comprehended to secure the concurrence of every sound, humble, and duty loving mind. Such a mind, perceiving in Scripture a law or rule, whether explicit or justly inferred, accepts it without parley. Or, if it find there a trace only of the Divine will, however indistinctly visible, it follows that trace, as the degree of heavenly guidance vouchsafed; the supreme authority being the same, though the path, for some wise end, is not so clearly shown. Marriage with a wife's sister is not explicitly forbidden in the sacred volume; but it is by sound inference,—by an inference which has always been either universally or largely acknowledge in the Christian Church,—and which is plain enough to each individual intellect, accustomed to reasoning, and accustomed also to reason with deep and affectionate humility of matters pertaining to the sovereignty of the uncontrolled Lawgiver. Some duties are clearly revealed; others, only clearly enough; and the latter is all that subjects of a law can justly demand, however ingenious they may be, alas, however wayward, however rebellious, in objecting that more than light enough should be afforded them.

In thus appealing to the opinion of the Church in every age, that these marriages are forbidden by "God's Word," I go not into the argument that tradition and traditional interpretation are authoritative. It suffices to offer this wide opinion as a presumption that the prohibition is Divine: the burden of proof lying on those who deny that such a prohibition exists. Very many questions may be determined by the burden of proof; such indeed is its usual preponderance that it is generally equivalent to a test or touchstone, though perhaps too frequently overlooked, even by analysis of ratiocination. Often, though unconsciously, it affords the basis of the practical conclusions of inexpert sagacity or what is called natural strength of mind.

The Report agrees (and an Apostolical Canon attests) that the Church "for several centuries," i. e., the Primitive Church included, forbade these marriages. Why did it so? If it were not through caprice or an immoderate fondness for governing, which can only be gratuitously alleged, it must have been because it regarded them as contrary to the law of God, or, if you please, as of authority so questionable as to be a peril to the conscience. Except as they impinged on the divine statutes, the Church had nothing to do with them. Such was the judgment, the biblical interpretation, of the early fathers and brethren. Without the least reference to infallibility, (in which I have no belief whatever,) it is incontrovertible that, in the Christian Church, this interpretation of the heavenly commandment had possession from the first, and through "several centuries." And he who objects that the possession was without right, has the burden of proving his objection. Till that is done, the right is unharmed, the presumption secure.

Both the Greek Church, which idolizes antiquity and seems to abjure private judgment, and the (Presbyterian) Church of Scotland, its very opposite, scorning antiquity and almost making private judgment the one thing needful in the search of truth,—both ratify the primitive expounding of this law of God. So admits the Report. Now the consent of contrary minds affords a presumption not to be despised. And through the Greek Church, the primitive interpretation is continuous, absolutely unbroken, from the days of the New Testament to this moment: which is a presumption of the highest character. Can the burden of proof thus created be readily thrown off?

Nor is this presumption weakened by the claim of the Pope, in the later of the "several [early] centuries," to dispense from some of the restrictions of marriage: for dispensation implies prohibition; this being the rule, that the exception. So likewise, of several Protestant communities which allow the disputed marriage by "dispensation or license." Other Christian bodies, in not requiring dispensations, have in fact dispensed in the lump from the old prohibition. Nor, because the usurpation of the Pope, ratified by a succumbing Church, reached at length a denial that the forbiddance was of God, but had only ecclesiastical authority as a matter of discipline, is the primitive rule cancelled, or the presumption flowing from it subverted: for that fact merely proves that the voice of part of the Church faltered and changed,—the very change attesting the previous determination of law. And the burden of proof lies on the changers and those who uphold them.

The Church of England, say the Commissioners, reached the time of Henry VIII. under this change through papal encroachment. That monarch and Cranmer saw that his first marriage was forbidden by "God's Word," and that the Church could not abrogate or qualify a divine law; and they were sustained by nine foreign universities, one of them in the papal territory, and all then functionaries of the Church. The marriage questioned was not exactly of the kind before us. But the opinion of the universities inferred that the Pope did affect to nullify a law of God, and so weakens the entire argument against the divine origin of these prohibitions drawn from their being thus relaxed. This judgment was from within the erring Church itself, and was rendered by most learned and able bodies of the priesthood, and in contravention of both the feelings and the interests that attached them to their spiritual community and its head. A weighty addition, it must be allowed, to the burden of proof lying on those who argue, or who further the argument, that, because a Church dispenses, the enactment made to yield is not from heaven: THE CHURCH has never accorded a dispensation.

Nothing to compare with this immensely accumulated anticipatory presumption can be found on the other side. And it must be overthrown,—which it never can be by the usual slender oppugnation, the hum of may-be's, whether timid, or timid, whether of the committed or of the non-committing urbanity,—before an advocate for these marriages can touch the merits of the question, the bearing on it of "God's Word." On that, the main point, a few thoughts will now be submitted.

St. Paul (1 Cor. v. 1.) records that there is, for Christians, a law against incest; that it is more stringent than, and superior to that of the Gentiles, the natural law: and that it extends to affinity; also, that it was known to the Corinthian brethren, many of whom had been Jews or Greek proselytes. This is enough,—more than enough in the subdued sense in which I before used the word. Where is this Christian code found? Not in mere natural sentiment, for the Apostle ranks it above the law of nature. Not in any legislation of the Apostolic Church unconnected with the Mosaic statutes, for we read of none. Where, then, shall we inquire for the code here avowed in the New Testament, except in the Old, in Lev. xviii. and the parallel texts? Where else could Jewish converts, or any converts, have obtained it? To the Old Testament, therefore, and to that part of it, we are carried by the obvious meaning (the common sense view) of this record of St. Paul. Thither is our authorized appeal.—Nor the commentators to be spurned, such as Lightfoot and Hammond, who maintain that the old law of incest was re-established by the Apostles and the Holy Ghost, in the Council at Jerusalem (Acts xv.); that old law, given in full in the Pentateuch, being, by its new enrolment, made expressly a law of Christ.

Whether by the unsophisticated interpretation of this apostolic rebuke, or by this learned and highly probable view of the decree of the apostolic Council, or by both, we are brought to he levitical statute, as having renewed and permanent divine obligation. In that statute, "nearness of kin," and nothing else, is declared to be the basis of the prohibitions; not a hint is there of expediency; not an allusion to natural repugnance, though that is recognised in 1 Cor. v.: all is founded on "nearness of kin." Of course, when one degree of "nearness" is forbidden, every equally "near" and similar relationships included in the condemnation; otherwise, the principle would be no principle. If any deny this extended construction, they have no revealed law against a man's marrying his daughter; for that is only inferred from the prohibitions of a mother marrying her son, and a man his granddaughter. In that statute, affinity is recognised, as in 1 Cor. v., and is treated exactly like consanguinity as a ground of interdiction. Now, by this inclusion of affinity, ratified by the Gospel, the wife's sister is the husband's sister; and with an own or a half-sister marriage is expressly barred; and the inclusive construction extends the bar to a wife's sister. Further: "Nearness of kin" being the unqualified ground of hindrance, the explicit censure of marrying a brother's wife is an implied, yet equal censure of marrying a sister's husband, which is the case in question. Yet again: Among the affinities, marriage with a father's brother's wife is forbidden; and, as marrying a mother's sister's husband (i. e. a man's marrying his wife's niece) is transgressing the very same degree and kind of "nearness," that, involved in the command, is forbidden as decidedly:—and then what less than absurd is it, to allege that a man may marry his wife's sister, when he may not marry even his wife's sister's daughter (wife's niece), who is one degree less "near"?—Constructing divine ordinances as we do human constitutions, by their avowed spirit and principles,—the spirit and the principle here being to keep apart the "near of kin," whether consanguineous or affined,—it seems impossible, most highly unreasonable and undutiful, to give narrower scope to this emanation of the sovereign will of the Most High. The exception under the same authority, the occasional marrying a brother's widow, stands by itself; it affords no shelter to any other exception not thus authenticated. And it is unavailing, to plead that that exception takes the statute out of the sphere of morals, when Christ, by His Apostle (beside the act of the Council at Jerusalem), has recognised anew its validity, and so made it perpetual. This fact, however, in a dispensation not ceremonial or local, is proof sufficient that the precepts do belong to the moral code.

Coming to the chief passage in the argument for these marriages, we find that two versions of it are given by our Translators, and both, in their judgment, be it remembered, of equal authority. In the text, they write, "Neither shalt thou take a wife to her sister, in her life-time;" in the margin, but not as an inferior rendering, "Neither shalt thou take one wife to another, in her life-time." By the former reading, the enormous mischief of polygamy is allowed,—broadly allowed and encouraged; for this verse, in its other rendering, is the only levitical interdict of that vice, and that rendering lost, the vice is unrebuked: the permission is clear, but the polygamist must not have two sisters at the same time; yet he, or any other man may take a second sister after the one already his is dead. By the latter version, all polygamy is forbidden, and this branch of the moral code completed; yet, as the forbiddance would sometimes be disregarded, restrictions on the transgressor were added elsewhere, as is done concerning other offences. One would think, that the instinct of purity would irresistibly determine between the two translations. At the very least, it cannot be denied that the alleged permission to marry a deceased wife's sister is doubtful: and doubt is fatal, when liberty is claimed on the one hand, and on the other, a probable (or possible) heavenly obligation forbids. Eminently wrong is such liberty, when the act purposed may readily be forborne. Moral considerations like these, drawn from the eternal rule of rectitude, are, when not imperatively excluded, of great force in determining a questioned exegesis of "God's Word."

But in this case, naked reasoning will suffice. The presumption against the marriage itself applies distinctly to the version in the text, there being another equally good beside it. Against it, we appeal anew to the primitive interdiction; also, to the exclusion of a sister and half-sister. And as a man may not marry his brother's wife, the overbearing probability is, that a translation which seems to allow a woman to marry her sister's husband (the case at issue) cannot be correct,—that the other translation is the sound one. Where shall the burdened exposition find proof, to relieve it of this presumption against it? There is none; it is unsupported, and must of course fall when its equal competitor is so powerfully upheld.

Further: Hebraists inform us that the original phrase for "a wife to her sister," or "one wife to another," is idiomatic, and purports merely "like to like" or "one to another of the same kind": the curtains of the tabernacle were coupled "a woman to her sister," i. e. one to another; the loops took hold "a woman to her sister," one to another; the wings of the cherubim were joined "a woman to her sister," and their faces looked "a man to his brother," each to each, like to like; the scales of leviathan are joined "a man to his brother." Such the Hebraists declare, is the uniform sense of the idiom throughout the bible; where it occurs thirty-five times, never once (unless here) meaning literally "sister to sister," "brother to brother." And is not the presumption next to moral certainty, that a phrase unquestionably idiomatic in all the thirty-four cases, is not precise and literal in the thirty-fifth? Sisters proper, then, are not intended in the passage in dispute. Polygamy is there condemned.

And I will add, that the meaning of the phrase is only "like to like," not "doubly like to doubly like," of that there is no example. To take "one woman to another" was to take "like to like," a wife to a wife. But to take "one sister to another sister" would have been to take "doubly like to doubly like," a sister-wife to a sister-wife. This construction not only disregards the idiom, but, as the letter has vanished from an idiomatic phrase, it would create a new idiom, and that for a dead language. "Sound speech" required that the idiom be avoided, and other words employed, had the law referred to the sisterly relation: no one says that he has "the upper hand" whose hand happens to be raised vertically higher than that of his victorious adversary; the literal meaning is annihilated. Custom is the law of language, and idiom is eminent and despotic custom; and to violate either is to confound the medium by which truth and duty are revealed. Here then is a further significance of the maxims, "the letter killeth," and qui hæret in litera hæret in cortice. And the result is, that the translation faulted should be withdrawn, both in virtue of the direct refutation, and because it requires an unattainable amount of proof to exonerate it of its accumulated burden.

The counterpleas in this whole matter, which I now state more fully, are but feeble, and (though they will be reproduced interminably) would have little practical force if passion and sympathy were excluded. The fundamental error is, that, in "things pertaining to God," there is liberty where there is doubt: whereas, when the divine authority is concerned, the absence or removal of doubt is the only real liberty. Then come a few examples of such unions among eminent saints: but they had not the complete law of restriction: nor has the most saintly of men left no bad example; nor would any appear to have done so, if biography, like scripture, were a faithful record. Next, is the exceptional command to marry a brother's widow; but no other deviation from the code is ordered, and therefore no other than this one, and that on the precise ground mentioned, has the divine approbation. As a more cogent replication, it is argued, that these examples and this exception separate thus much of the law from the department of morals, and place it on lower ground. But, 1. Whatever be the ground of a law of God, its obligation is indefeasible. 2. The reply proves too much; for the sons of Adam, including Abel (probably) and Seth, were allowed to marry their full sisters; which, however, after the early period, was indubitably a moral offence. 3. The recognition under Christ of the ancient code makes it presumptuous and perilous, as well as futile, to deny its moral position. 4. Morals have their penumbra as well as their pure effulgence and their utter darkness; and various degrees of the penumbra (I speak of nothing worse) may be detected in the plausibilities and some conventionalities of social intercourse in many dealings and bargainings, in the ten thousand political managements and manœuvres, in not a few practices under the cover of law, and sanctimony in religion, party cunning and stratagem in Church matters, indirection on a crowding subject and in an expedient form, &c., &c.; none of which are palpably immoral, though far from moral brightness. To marry a sister was at first correct, being unavoidable: as it became avoidable it passed into the penumbra; and at length into the deepest moral shadow. Marrying a half-sister was once in the penumbra, perhaps when Abram did so. So we may say of marrying a wife's sister, as in the case of Jacob, and a father's sister, as in that of Amram. But in due time, with a larger increase of God's people, and more completely developed natural sentiment and under heavenly legislation, all these sank from the penumbra into total darkness. Only the marrying a brother's widow, among that one people, and for a special object connected with the birth of Christ, was, for a time, reprieved from this reprobation. Here, I think, is a solution of the difficulty raised on the moral obligation of these interdicts. And it results that in the divine statute, no penumbra now remains, but every transgression is in undiluted shadow. Yet it is remarkable, that there is a further social penumbra, of several particulars, and touching neither consanguinity nor affinity, as the reflecting reader may discover.

To corroborate this counterplea, objections are made to the reference to polygamy of the verse just debated. 1. Polygamy is thought to be recognised in Exod. xxi. and Deut. xxi.: but the former may refer to the man's son, (Poole's Annot.) and the latter to "two wives" in succession; and hence their meaning is doubtful, as are all arguments built upon them. Nor is it incongruous to forbid an offence as in the present verse, and yet to provide for cases in which it might be committed; as where a man refused to marry his brother's widow. 2. Our Saviour, it is alleged, did not appeal to the levitical code, against polygamy, but merely to the creation of the one original pair. That argument, however, was not against polygamy proper, which did not prevail in His time, but against wrong divorce, which involved only a quasi-polygamy. Divorce allowed "for the hardness of their hearts," He abolished, with one exception, declaring it contrary to the primary ordinance and fundamental law of marriage. His reference to Moses bears not on the relation of the verse mentioned to polygamy. 3. It is maintained that David and other good men would not have committed polygamy if it were forbidden. But no good men are perfect. And David not only transgressed that general law, but the special interdict against the king's "multiplying wives unto himself,"—so that the commendation of him by the Almighty cannot include this part of his conduct. 4. It is warmly urged, that God Himself would not have given Saul's "wives into David's bosom," had His own law interfered. Yet even this plea is unavailing. For we read of only two wives of Saul: one of whom was David's mother-in-law, never to be married to him; only one wife being left, not "wives," to make good this interpretation of the passage; and this wife was dishonored after Saul's death, and would hardly be accepted. Some other settlement, among the females in the royal residence, must be intended,—some honorable and intimate obligation and protection short of marriage, yet close enough to secure against their union with any other, which might have endangered the throne, as when Adonijah asked for Abishag. Duly weighed, the language quoted does not sustain the objection built upon it. And thus there is no tenable barrier to expounding the disputed verse of polygamy, which exposition, as remarked, leaves no shelter for the marriage in question.

Nothing interposes, therefore, between such a marriage and its clearly implied prohibition, where "God's Word" debars the union with a sister, a half-sister, or a brother's-wife, which latter specification reaches conversely a sister's husband, the case in point. Also, as a man may not marry his father's brother's wife, a woman may not marry her mother's sister's husband: and that mother (his wife's sister) is "nearer" to the man than her precluded daughter. In every direction the forbiddance is repeated. The condemnation is inevitable.

With the effect of the Report of the Commissioners on British law or public sentiment, I have no concern: the latter they present as looser than I had imagined. Our own is lamentably wrong; and so in most of the States are the several laws. Concerning our laws, Judge Story speaks with authority: but, wide and deep as is our delinquency, his information could not have been general, concerning these marriages, if he "never heard the slightest suggestion against them," &c.; for one or more cases before the Presbyterian (and I think other) judicatories have been in the newspapers these ten or twenty years, evincing a wide sensitiveness to the "morality, religion, and christianity," involved; and there doubtless are many who, like myself, have observed social position to be somewhat affected by the, at best, penumbral undutifulness.

But neither secular nor even social considerations touch the merits of the question, which lie exclusively in the spirit, the principle, the voice of the LAW OF GOD. Ph. H. V. O.

Parental Negligence and Youthful Depravity.

It is high time that the attention of the whole community should be aroused, through the medium of the press and the pulpit, to devise effectual means to curb the lawlessness, and quell the spirit of insubordination which characterize the youths of our country, and demonstrate their baleful effects in the commission of the most flagrant crimes. It is a subject of national interest, and should be a subject of national action: parents should exert their authority, magistrates should execute the laws, teachers should enforce discipline in schools and colleges, which, at present, are nurseries of rebellion. Especially should women exert their potent influence in animating boys to every thing that is laudable and honorable, and restraining them from vicious and debasing actions. The welfare and perpetuity of the republic depends mainly upon the virtues and christian graces of American women. It is melancholy to read the instances of juvenile depravity which are recorded in our daily newspapers. Boys appear to be instigated by a misguided ambition to compete with their seniors in the commission of the most flagitious acts. I shudder, in walking our streets, to hear boys as soon as they can lisp, endeavouring to swagger and swear in order to appear manly, and to listen to the imprecations of older boys in "darning the souls" of those who offend them. The origin of all these crimes is the want of discipline in the nursery. The first lesson General Washington's mother taught her high-tempered son was, obedience. What an obligation was she conferring upon her country when she taught him this, now obsolete, lesson. How many indolent, imbecile mothers have I heard complaining in the presence of her boys, "I cannot keep them at home," "they don't mind a word I say." Of course they will not if they can disobey with impunity. A spoiled self-willed child two years old will slap and abuse his mother, (which treatment she richly deserves for her folly,) and be exemplary in his deportment at the Infant-School, where he has sufficient sagacity to know he dare not resist. An old Divine remarked "show me a child, and I will tell you the character of its mother," and I think it is an almost infallible criterion. The misconduct of those who have disgraced their families can frequently be traced to the folly or faithlessness of the mother and the neglect of the father. Parents, especially mothers, are responsible for all those crimes which might have been prevented if they had conscientiously performed their duties. The word of God declares "train up a child in the way he should go, and when he is old he will not depart from it." Do the great majority of parents ever reflect upon their responsibilities? Do they act as if they knew they must answer for the souls of the children committed to their charge at the tribunal of their Maker and Judge. Fathers delegate their duties to mothers without strengthening their authority by co-operation. They are satisfied if they furnish the means of supporting their families. It is their duty to provide a comfortable maintenance, but not to toil to procure them the means to purchase luxurious and pernicious indulgences, while they entirely neglect their religious and moral culture. The most eminent men in our country have attained their elevated position by the exercise of their talents and virtues; the most degenerate and degraded inherited large fortunes. The Israelites were commanded to teach the laws diligently to their children, and to talk to them when they were sitting in the house, or walking by the way, &c., &c. How rarely do we hear nominally christian fathers conversing with their sons! If we occasionally overhear animated conversation, is not the sole engrossing topic how to make money or to get gain? When fathers have been toiling for the support of their children all day, what greater recreation could they enjoy than the conversation of well disciplined sons, lively daughters, and the innocent prattle of the little ones? How seldom do we see a father informing and enlivening the domestic circle in the evening! Where are they? while their sons are associating with wicked companions, committing all kinds of enormities and outrages in the streets, or engaged in demoralizing and soul-destroying amusements and indulgences. Parents should provide a happy home for their sons, and select such associates as they approve, and allow them to meet together in the evening for profitable and interesting conversation and innocent amusement. There are a variety of historical and geographical games, &c., &c., which amuse the fancy and brighten the intellect, to enliven the family circle.

A virtuous happy home is the best sanctuary to shelter the young, and a bulwark from which they may defy and repel the evil one. One of the most delightful Sundays I ever remember to have passed, was at the country seat of a truly christian family. I arose very early to inhale the "incense breathing morn." The first sound I heard was a joyful song of praise from the younger members of the family, who had assembled in the piazza to join the matinal hymn of the sky larks, which were soaring aloft, high as the eye could reach, chanting as they ascended. After breakfast the hospitable host furnished his guests with a variety of interesting religious works, and the mother noiselessly withdrew, accompanied with her children, into her own apartment, to impart spiritual instruction to them, not to teach religion as a science but to inculcate the necessity of exercising the spirit of christianity in every thought, word, and deed; and practising the golden rule of "doing to others as we wish them to do to us." What a powerful preventive of crime would this golden rule prove if it were early engraven on the hearts of the young? Her instructions were strengthened by her consistent example. A silent education of the heart and principles was constantly progressing by means of the exemplary christian deportment and conversation of both parents, who co-operated in everything to promote the welfare of their children. It was delightful to observe the love and harmony of this well-regulated family, and their kindness to all within the sphere of their influence. Children are happy in proportion to the judicious restraint to which they are subjected. The eldest son had the most obstinate temper I ever knew, but his father conquered it before he was three years old. The tender-hearted mother wept, but held her peace, when her beloved boy was chastised; the equally affectionate, but firm and decided, father persevered until his son yielded: and never was a father more amply rewarded for conscientiously performing his duty in the affection and respect of a devoted son. When children are judiciously corrected, it increases, instead of diminishing, their love and respect to their parents and teachers; while those who are foolishly indulged, become too selfish to care for any person but themselves. Upon the present occasion I wished for a graphic pencil to represent this lovely young mother surrounded by her children, leaning on her lap, and looking in her eyes with such confidence as if they had nothing to conceal; and she gazing with unutterable fondness upon their innocent young faces, as if there were nothing to censure, and the husband looking with unimpaired admiration, although they had been married ten years! The husband and wife reciprocated all those delicate little attentions, which are usually dispensed with after the honeymoon, and the children imitated their example. When it was time to ride to church this joyous little band appeared in their Sunday clothes, which were remarkable only for their neatness and simplicity. If mothers would devote the time they waste (in making their children look like ridiculous stage puppets,) in reading works to strengthen their own judgments, they would consult their own comfort and their children's best interests. After church I saw or heard nothing of the family until assembled around their hospitable board, for which the preparations had been made the preceding day. Interesting books, profitable discourse and an evening walk around their beautiful grounds completed the happy day. If the community were composed of such families, we might really present a "model republic" to an admiring world. What innumerable crimes are committed on the Lord's day, from idleness and listlessness, and from young men not knowing how to spend their time. If fathers devote six days in the week to provide for the corporeal necessities, cannot they devote one to the spiritual improvement of their children? If every father would study the Bible, he might converse profitably and delightfully with his children, and make the evening of the Lord's day the most delightful of all the seven. If righteousness exalteth a nation, the desecration of the Sabbath must eventually destroy it. While parents are devoting themselves to the temporal and eternal interests of their offspring, they are promoting the "safety, honour, and welfare" of the republic. At the present crisis, would it not be admirable to rivet the attention of parents upon this important subject? I have been a regular attendant at Church for nearly half a century, and never heard ten discourses upon parental responsibilities. Should not every Pastor preach at least a semi-annual sermon upon this important subject, and so rule his own family that they may present a model for imitation to his congregation? Should not every editor of a religious newspaper comment upon the daily instances of juvenile depravity that occur, and trace them to their true source? Not to "the turbulent spirit of democracy," but to domestic anarchy. If children are taught to obey their parents, and "every thing a christian ought to know," they will easily learn subordination to the constituted authorities of the land, and respect the rights, and consider the feelings of others. When we observe the morals and manners of the rising generation, we cannot help reflecting what an awful account for sins of omission, many parents will have to render on the day of judgment! Parents are generally ambitious that their children should rise in the world, and occupy distinguished situations, how will negligent parents feel on the awful day of final retribution, when they see their children stationed, with lost souls, on the left hand of their judge, and condemned to eternal torments. O how ineffable will be the joy of those who have faithfully performed their duties, when they receive the benediction, "well done, good and faithful servant, enter thou, with thy children, into the joy of thy Lord." VALLE CRUCIS, Sept. 12, 1848.

REV. AND DEAR MR. EDITOR:—

I would hereby acknowledge the receipt of several offerings to God for this mission, which were made some of them months ago, and which ought perhaps to have been noticed before this.

In thanking those brethren who have contributed of their substance, I do not mean that they should think themselves to have conferred an obligation upon us, even if they were disposed to think so. They would be the first I know to acknowledge that they have given us of that which is not their own, and therefore they have received more than they have given. They are well assured of the truth of his words who hath said "It is more blessed to give than to receive."

But still we thank them, as the stewards of God, whose hand we see in their ministries. We ask not for more, tho' we have permission from some to do so. We shall not ask for more lest we receive often-r than we need. It is better to wait God's time than to "make haste," tho' we be called to suffer. And if those first born brethren of the "apostolic church, men of great souls could glorify God" tho' suffering the "fiery trial," and "take joyfully the spoiling of their goods," we shall be most unworthy to complain at any small self-denials and sufferings which we are called to endure. One is almost ashamed to speak of sufferings, lest we should be thought to suffer, when indeed there is nothing worthy of the name. And I hope that we are not afraid of suffering, when all around us, we are, at every turn, reminded of Him who hath once "suffered for us in the flesh;" and thus are continually exhorted to "arm ourselves with the same mind," and to rejoice if called to be "partakers of Christ's sufferings."

The following is a list of money we received. The values are as near the truth as could be estimated by us.

Oct. 1847. From brethren in New York: Cloth and articles of clothing,	$8.00
From Rev. Mr. Smedes—the teachers and scholars of St. Mary's, and ladies of Raleigh, money,	67.00

Any offerings, which any may be disposed in their hearts to make, may be left with Mr. John H. Swift, 158 Water St. N. York, and in Philadelphia, at the office of the Banner.

Sincerely your Brother,

W. G. FRENCH,
Superior at Valle Crucis.

INFANT EDUCATION.—A mother once asked a clergyman when she should begin the education of her child, and she told him it was then four years old. "Madam," was his reply, "you have lost three years already." From the very first smile that gleams over an infant's face, your opportunity begins.—Bishop of Norwich.

NEW YORK DIOCESAN CONVENTION.—As the proceedings of this Convention are regarded with general interest, we give the fullest report our space will allow. The important question of the admission of none but communicants as Lay Delegates was fully discussed. We give an abstract of the debate, as it is a practical question which will be forced upon the attention of all our Diocesan Conventions. We are, for the most part, indebted to "the New York Morning Express" for the account given below.

CONVENTION OF NEW YORK.—The annual Convention of the Diocese of New York, assembled in St. John's Chapel, in this city, on Wednesday morning, Sept. 27th, at ten o'clock.

Morning prayers were read by the Rev. Thomas W. Coit, D. D., Rector of Trinity Church, New Rochelle, assisted by the Rev. Mr. Tuttle, Rector of Christ Church, Hudson, who read the lessons. The Ante-Communion Service was read by the Rev. Wm. Berrian, D. D. assisted by the Rev. Drs. Schroeder and Creighton. An eloquent and impressive discourse was then preached by the Rev. William L. Johnson, D. D., Rector of Grace Church, Jamaica, after which the holy communion was administered to the clergy and laity present.

The Convention was organized by the appointment of the Rev. Dr. Creighton, President, and the Rev. Dr. Haight as Secretary. The names of the clergy and lay delegates entitled to seats, were then called. After the appointment of the usual committees, the Convention adjourned to Thursday at nine o'clock.

SECOND DAY.—At 9 o'clock, A. M., there was a very large attendance of delegates and spectators. Morning prayer was read by Rev. Mr. Buel, of Poughkeepsie; the lessons, by Rev. Jacob B. Morss, of Waterford.

The first business, in order, on the resumption of the chair, was the presentation of the Standing Committee's report on the state of the diocese.—It was read, with its appertaining documents, by the Secretary, and from it we should deduce the conclusion that the affairs of the diocese were never in a more prosperous condition than that in which they now stand. The diocesan reports of Bishops Delancy and Potter, who have officiated here during the year, are most cheering, and show that they have performed an unusual amount of episcopal duty. Many churches, and parishes have been erected and formed, and the ordinations and confirmations have been very numerous.

The next business in order was the election, by ballot, of the two great Committees for the year; the Standing Committee, and the Missionary Committee. The following were chosen:

STANDING COMMITTEE FOR THE YEAR.

Rev. Drs. Berrian, Seabury, McVicker, and Haight, and Messrs. Murray Hoffman, Verplanck, and Floyd Smith, and Chief Justice Jones.

MISSIONARY COMMITTEE.

Rev. Messrs. Hart, Mead, Clapp, Morris, and Cox, and Messrs. Rowland, Swift, C. Oakley, F. Smith, and McDonald. Several new churches were reported on, admitted, and found represented. Rev. Dr. Price offered the annual report of the Missionary Society.

Rev. Mr. Cox, of Zion Church, moved the reference of this report to a Committee of five, to report on the causes of the existing deficiency in the Missionary Treasury. He sustained his proposition in a fervid speech of some minutes. It was carried, and Rev. Drs. Van Cleave, Henry, and Cutler, with Hon. Messrs. Bradish and Verplanck, were the committee appointed.

The Report of the Treasury of the Episcopal Fund was then read, by the Secretary.

The Report of the Committee on the Treasurer's report was read and passed; it disclosed a flourishing state of things in the diocese, as it regards finances.—That on the state of the Theological Seminary was equally encouraging. The five following additional Trustees were appointed: Rev. Drs. Whitehouse, S. R. Johnson, and Kipp, with Messrs. Barnard, of Albany, and Cowman, of Hyde Park, and the following, to fill vacancies: Rev. Dr. Henry. Hon. Martin Lee and Hon. Hamilton. Some other incidental business was then transacted.

Rev. Dr. Vinton read a report of the Select Committee on the alteration of Art. III. of the Constitution, touching the qualifications of Lay Delegates: which Committee was appointed by the Convention of 1847. This very able and eloquent report concluded with the following preamble and resolution:—

WHEREAS, it is the opinion of this Convention, that the welfare and prosperity of the Church require, and it is in itself proper and right, that no lay Delegates should be sent to this Convention but such as are Communicants of this Church: therefore,

Resolved, That the Constitution be amended thus:

After the words "lay Members," in Article III. insert the words "who shall be Communicants," and strike out the words "or more," and insert the words, "and not more than three."

The question then came up, on the present consideration of this subject. There had been another Committee on the same subject, on which there had been a report, not acted on, and there was some conversation in relation to the expediency of acting upon the two at once. Dr. Vinton entered upon the defence of his resolution, above given, and moved that the Convention give it their approval, necessary to carry it before the churches for their votes. Mr. Harrison hoped the Convention would act deliberately. Other gentlemen expressed similar opinions.

Rev. Dr. Taylor, moved to insert, instead of the proposition of Dr. Vinton, another, entirely evading the question.

Rev. Mr. Weaver, of West Troy, moved to lay the whole subject on the table; and a conversation arose on the point of order involved in this proposition.—The yeas and nays were ordered, and the proposition to lay on the table was lost.

So the subject was not laid on the table.

SECOND DAY.—EVENING SESSION.—Rev. Dr. Vinton having offered his resolution, with a preamble, (before given.) Rev. Dr. Taylor had offered one by way of amendment, (being entirely opposite, and giving eligibility to "lay delegates to be chosen by the vestry, or by the congregation.") and, on the reconvening of the Convention, in the evening, the question on striking out Dr. Vinton's preamble and resolution, and inserting Dr. Taylor's was first in order.

Some conversation occurred, as to the mode in which to present the question, at the end of which,

Rev. Dr. Vinton rose, and called for a division of the question, so that it could be taken on striking out, first, and then, on the insertion: he, at the same time, withdrew the preamble, and proceeded to defend both report and resolution, upon their merits.

Rev. Dr. Taylor opposed the resolution. He thought it an extreme measure. He thought it would prove fraught with mischief. We should be "wise as serpents" as well as "harmless as doves." It could only operate to the serious injury of the church; especially at the present time, when the church particularly desired peace, and the confidence of the laity. He hoped gentlemen would pause. He admitted the principle, but deprecated carrying principles to extremes. Such was not the part of wisdom. It was not sanctified from above. The change could only be effected through the general council of the church. It was too radical. It would be making the outward observance of a Christian ordinance a test of eligibility to office in the church. It would give ground for alleging against the Priesthood, a desire to control the action of the laity in the councils of the church. It would be unwise to present this question now, how desirable soever it may be in principle. And these views the speaker sustained in quite an earnest and extended speech.

Rev. Charles Jones, of Johnstown, next took the floor. The question was not one of expediency, merely, but of rights. He thought Baptism into the Church was properly the only test,—and not Confirmation nor Communion;—and he alluded to the fact that every pastor knows of instances of men of high piety, who, from a mistaken idea of the sacrament, requiring almost perfect sinlessness of life, shrink from communicating. The proposition was not advisable; and not recognized by the formularies of the Church.

Rev. Dr. Schroeder, of the "Crucifixion," had heard no argument against the principle embodied in Dr. Vinton's resolution. It had gone altogether on the basis of expediency against right, and briefly expressed his reasons for supporting the pending resolution. In the course of his remarks, he alluded to instances of congregations selecting unbaptized persons as delegates to this convention, instead of communicants of piety, of meekness, and unused to mere worldly policy.

Rev. Mr. Balch, of "St. Bartholomew's" followed in opposition to the resolution, and to the Report of the Committee who offered it. In the body of the Report, the Committee, had said:—

"As long ago as the year 1802, the Convention of the Church in New York, composed at that time of delegations from only about twenty parishes then existing, passed, unanimously, the following resolution:

"Resolved, That it is the opinion of this Convention, that the welfare and prosperity of the Church require, and it is in itself proper and right, that no Lay Delegates should be sent to this Convention, but such as are Communicants of this Church, and have been so, at least, for one year previous to their appointment."

And Mr. Balch, turning to the record of the Convention of 1802, showed that there was an additional clause, "recommending" the parishes to adopt that principle in their future action. And on this ground the Rev. speaker based a charge of disingenuousness against the Committee. He also cited instances, in other dioceses, of the attempt to pass such a measure, but, on "second sober thought," in vain. He recapitulated some of the arguments already adduced by others, who had preceded him on the same side.—He regarded the proposition as a degradation of the Holy Communion.

Rev. Mr. Van Cleave, of Troy, quoted Bishops Doane and Potter against the principle of the resolution. The healthy action of public sentiment might be relied upon to correct the evil. The large majority of lay members in this Convention, he ventured to say, were church members. He held baptism to be the true test of a membership of the church of Christ.

Rev. Isaac Pardee, of the "Redemption" in this city, made an elaborate speech in favor of the pending proposition. A preliminary question was to be settled; is this Convention a mere secular organization, or is it a spiritual one, having power in spiritual matters, and he quoted the language of the Constitution, and the usages of the church, in proof of the last position. If this be so the members should be spiritual. He offered Dr. Taylor's argument from expediency, and said that it was a question of right and principle. He reviewed what had been said by others on the efficacy of Baptism, and, quoting the case of Virginia, where, for years, this principle had been acted on, said he was sorry to hear "lower" views taken upon this subject, in the diocese of New York, than in that of Virginia! Mr. Pardee gave an intimation of an intended proposition of his own, tending to combine the two before the Convention. Being told it was in order, he offered it as a substitute for the whole matter before the body. It follows:

"Strike out and insert, (for Art. III. of the Constitution.) This Convention should be composed of Presbyters and Deacons, canonically connected with this diocese, and not under ecclesiastical censure, and of Lay delegates, who shall be communicants, consisting of one, and not more than three from each church, to be elected by the vestry or congregation."

Mr. Hamilton took the floor. He desired to have the Convention consist of a layman for every clergyman. He held that this was the spirit of the original Constitution; and he urged this at some length, and offered an amendment, in consonance with it. He was opposed to Dr. Vinton's resolution. He thought there was no present pressing call for it.

Rev. Dr. McVicker, of this city, (though not ready to vote for it now,) yet defended the proposition, in a few words, in which he took the ground of high principles, existing long before the organization of the Protestant Episcopal Church of the United States, and its Constitution. We regret that we have not the space for a full report of a speech which threw so much light upon the origin of the American branch of the Episcopal Church.

Rev. Dr. Vinton took the floor, on this question, for the next day.

The Bishop's Matters.—Judge Burnet, of Ticonderoga, gave notice that he should offer a resolution, to-morrow, authorizing the payment of $2500 as the Bishop's salary.

Rev. Dr. Anthon, of "St. Mark's, in the Bowery," gave notice of a resolution he should offer to-morrow, inquiring whether "the General Convention has been requested to give the Church in this diocese such relief as may be consistent with its powers," and if so, with what result. For this resolution he said he should claim precedence over that just offered by Judge Burnet.

Adjourned till 9 A. M. this day.

THIRD DAY.—Pursuant to adjournment the Convention met at St. John's Church, this morning, at nine o'clock.—The attendance of members was large, and we noticed a pretty large auditory, principally ladies, in the gallery.

The business of the day was begun by morning prayer, and the Secretary, Dr. Haight, reading the minutes of the day previous.

Certificates of lay delegates, not admitted before, were received, and disposed of, by the Secretary.

The names of members, not before present, were read.

The report of the Committee on the Diocesan Fund was next read.

A resolution, embodied in the report, allowing delegates residing more than twenty miles from the sittings of the Convention, six cents mileage, out of the Diocesan Fund, was adopted. Debate renewed from yesterday evening's session.

Dr. Vinton's Resolution, (embodied in the Report of the Select Committee,) on the amendment of the Constitution, touching the qualifications of lay delegates, (article 3d,) came in regular order of the day.

A long and animated discussion sprung up upon the various amendments offered to the original preamble and resolution. This was participated in zealously by various members.—Mr. Southard, of Calvary, Dr. Augustus Smith, Dr. Henry, of Brooklyn, Judge Betts, of Newburgh, among the rest.

Three o'clock, P. M.—The debate upon Dr. Vinton's Resolution still continues, and is very generally participated in. The discussion is carried on in the most zealous and animated spirit, and many able addresses have been made upon the question at issue. Judge Betts, Judge Jay, Dr. King, Dr. McVicker, and Hiram Ketchum, were particularly eloquent.

Three o'clock came along, and the debate drawing, at length, to a close, the vote was taken on the Resolution, which (our readers will remember,) is in the amended form, as follows:

Resolved, That the Constitution be corrected thus:—After the words "lay members" in Article III, insert the words "who shall be communicants."

The names being called, 76 of the clergy and 56 of the laity voted in the affirmative, and 36 clergy and 38 laity in the negative.

Rev. Dr. Tyng moved that the Record be so amended as to allow St. George's Church two lay votes, as it was constitutionally entitled to.

After considerable debate, the matter was referred to a Committee.

And the Convention, on motion, adjourned till evening.

THIRD DAY.—EVENING SESSION.—The Convention was opened at 7 P. M. with the usual religious ceremonies.

The first business was in reference to amending Art. III. of the constitution, (already referred to) which was carried.

Dr. Taylor's amendment of Art. III. (already given) was then brought forward, and was referred to the committee who had it in charge last year, with power to report either this or next year.

A motion was made that the Rev. Dr. Vinton be added to this committee, which was adopted.

After a slight amendment of the canon of the members of the Convention, and the evidence of their right to seats, which was referred to a special committee—the following resolution was offered by Hon. Judge Burnett,

Resolved, That the Trustees of the Episcopal Fund be directed to pay to the Right Rev. Benjamin T. Onderdonk, D.D., out of the income of the said fund (except the portion set apart for accumulation,) the sum of $2,500 annually, until the further order of this Convention.

The Hon. Luther Bradish, with a few remarks, introduced the following respecting the payment of the proposed salary of $2,500 to Bishop Onderdonk as an amendment to the resolution of Mr. Burnett.

Whereas, the Episcopal Fund was established by the members and parishes of this diocese for the express purpose of securing active Episcopal services therein, and of maintaining the dignity and usefulness of the Episcopal office, therefore,

Resolved, As the solemn and deliberate judgment of this Convention, that no portion of said fund can rightfully be applied to aid or support in any way a Bishop on whom a sentence of indefinite suspension has been pronounced by the highest judicial tribunal of the church, and which sentence still continues in full force.

But whereas, it is desirable that some provision should be made for the Right Rev. Benjamin T. Onderdonk and his family, therefore be it further Resolved, That a committee of three members of each order be appointed to devise, and report to the present Convention, some practicable mode of making such provision, to be adopted or recommended to this Convention.

Mr. Jay then took the floor.

Mr. Vinton rose to show that the proposition of Mr. Burnett was the only one to which the Convention could with propriety entertain. He would first call attention to the purpose for which the Episcopal Fund was created, which was two-fold. First, for the support of the Episcopate, and second, to enable the bishop to perform the Episcopal duties of his diocese, so that even if he had incapacitated himself for the performance of his duties, he had a right to the other portion, i. e. that which goes to the support of the Episcopate; or to the whole if he could perform his duties.

In connexion with his speech, Dr. V. read letters from Hon. Messrs. Ingersoll and Memminger, members of the last General Convention, declaring their opinions as to the action of that Convention, that it implied no recognition of any vacancy in the Episcopate, but the contrary, viz: that Bishop Onderdonk is still Bishop of the Diocese of N. Y.

Mr. Jos. L. White rose and said he entertained no personal hostility towards the suspended Bishop, but would oppose the payment of the $2,500 out of the fund.

The vote being taken on the amendment stood as follows.

Laity, " 28 " 52.

Lost by both sections of the house.

Mr. Bradish then made some remarks in reference to the original resolution, which were replied to by Judge Burnett, of Ticonderoga. The question on the original resolution was taken, and it was adopted.

It was then determined by a viva voce vote, that from the 27th of December next, the Bishop should (in addition to the salary of this year, of course,) receive two thousand five hundred annually from the Episcopal fund until further ordered by the Convention.

At about eleven o'clock, Dr. Sherwood introduced a long preamble and resolution, recommending that in order that the diocese of New York may be relieved from its present anomalous position, the standing committee of the church be authorized to present an application to the House of Bishops, requesting them to suspend or remit his sentence, and to specify at what time such suspension shall cease to exist.

This was replied to by the Hon. L. Bradish, who thought that this was not a suitable hour to consider such resolutions, and then the Convention (after adopting a motion that the resolutions be laid over to the next Convention) adjourned sine die.

Gloria in Excelsis was chanted and prayers were offered by the President.

CLOSING EXERCISES OF ST. MARY'S HALL AND BURLINGTON COLLEGE. We had the pleasure of attending these most interesting exercises. The examinations, which we heard, were of a character fully sustaining the high repute of these Church Institutions.

There was a very full meeting of the Trustees of the College. They were unanimous in expressing their hearty approval of the state of things, and they were greatly encouraged by the prosperous condition of the College, which more than fulfilled their most sanguine expectations.

On Friday evening, in the presence of a large assembly, compositions were read by "the Juniors" of the College, and the members of the sixth Form of the school, and the latter, six in number, were advanced to the Collegiate department. An interesting "statement of the results of the Term" was made to the Trustees, by the Bishop, who also addressed those who had just entered the College, in a most impressive manner. The services closed with Evening Prayer, the Benediction, and Bishop Ken's Evening Hymn.

The following notice comes from a clergyman whose position and character give high authority to his testimony. His long connection with one of the most distinguished Institutions of our country gives weight to the opinions he expresses.

Things as I saw them in St. Mary's Hall and Burlington College.

To the Editor of the Banner of the Cross.

REV. AND DEAR SIR:—

I send you herewith a sketch of THINGS AS I SAW THEM in St. Mary's Hall and Burlington College. I went there on the 23rd inst., for the purpose of bringing my children home for the fall vacation. But finding that they would not be through with their examination until the Thursday evening following, I determined to remain and see the end of it. I attended divine service the evening I arrived, and twice daily the ensuing week. This was not my first visit to the Chapel of the Holy Innocents, and I would fain hope will not be my last. No where have I felt more love for the place where God's honor dwelleth. It is a place where one may worship; nay where every one must feel that they stand on holy ground. Sunday morning, besides the usual service, confirmation was administered to a young man who had not previously had an opportunity of being confirmed, and who was about to be ordained Deacon. After breakfast I went again to the Hall to speak with my children, when I came unexpectedly upon the whole family, numbering 180, assembled in the school room repeating the several words for the day, (certain appropriate texts of scripture) which had been given them during the week past to commit to memory and to meditate upon. These recited, the principal, the Rev. Mr. Germain, commented very briefly upon the one for that day,—"Let every man be swift to hear, slow to speak, slow to wrath." He was followed by the Bishop, in a few words of advice and exhortation. Surely thought I, this is a Sunday school indeed, without its usual drawbacks.

In the forenoon, after an admirable discourse on the requisites for an efficient ministry, the young man before alluded to was ordained Deacon. In the afternoon the new commissioned minister preached, and right manfully did he begin to redeem the pledge which he had given in the morning. During the afternoon service the Bishop baptized a number of children, and remembering that I had seen only a few weeks before a still larger number brought to the same font, surely thought I, if this doctrine of baptism be truly received and truly followed great results must flow from the baptism of so large a portion of the population of Burlington.

Sunday evening came, and with it the usual service in the Chapel at the Hall, quiet, edifying, impressive. The week following I gave pretty close attention to the examination, now at the Hall, and then at the College. I forbear to particularize (as it would be easy to do) instances of unusual success as well in teaching as in learning. It would be invidious to do so when, if all did not very well, none seemed to merit censure. I saw enough to satisfy me (after no very limited acquaintance with public examinations, some of them confessedly the best that this country affords,) that there at least is no sham scholarship, no cant, no pretence of any sort, but a hearty and liberal provision for the attaining of "godly and good learning," and a discipline withal so wisely tempered with all the elements of good government, that if my own children do not make those attainments in purity and learning I so earnestly covet for them, I shall not think of imputing it to those to whose care I have confided them. Considering that they must be educated, qualified, in other words for the unromantic duties of real life, I persuade myself that I have found an asylum for them which, while it does not supersede the care and co-operation of their parents, is yet, all things considered, a little better for them than the best home.

I conversed but little with the teachers, for they were busy, still less with the Bishop for the same reason. I was twice only at his table, not because I was not invited, but because I saw he would not lack for guests though I declined his hospitality.

Meeting at every turn with some undesigned proof of his diligence and care, and that of the teachers under him, such reflections as these crowded into my mind.—How much stronger is God than man, as seen in the motions which they respectively present to the well ordained mind. How much more precious is an approving conscience, than gold, and how much more will a teacher do and impart when you can appeal with more effect to his sense of duty than to his covetousness.

But this is not my line and therefore the sooner I cut myself off from it the better, neither is it to my taste to praise men or their works. These seminaries of learning, may, I dare say, yet be improved and still not be perfect. No doubt these two families, embracing one more than 100 sons, the other 180 daughters, have their domestic troubles as well as lower households. No doubt they have need to bear one another's burdens and to forbear one another in love. But such a degree of harmony, good will and hearty co-operation is, I should think, a phenomenon. Enough, suffice it to say I have not been disappointed. Adieu.

A PRESBYTER OF NEW YORK.

September 30th 1848.

A NEW RECEIPT NOT FOUND IN MODERN BOOKS.—We take the following from the Pittsburg Catholic.

RECEIPT FOR MAKING FRIENDSHIP.—In Pliny's Natural History we find a very curious receipt for making Roman friendship, the principal ingredients of which were union of hearts, a flower that grew in several parts of the empire—sincerity, frankness, disinterestedness, pity, and tenderness, of each an equal quantity. These were all made up together, with two rich oils, which they called perpetual kind wishes, and serenity of temper, and the whole was strongly perfumed with the desire of pleasing, which gave it a most grateful smell, and was a sure prostrative against vapors of all sorts. The cordial, thus prepared, was of so durable a nature, that no length of time could waste it; but what is more remarkable, says our author, it increased in its weight and value the longer you kept it.

We have great respect for Pliny—but we have doubts whether his Receipt is efficacious. We have tried it in part and never succeeded in "making Roman friendship." We admit there is a difference between the composition of the Ancient and Modern "Roman." The latter has a slight infusion of the "odium theologicum," a very deleterious substance, for whose remedy the honest old naturalist does not provide. And we have never been able to find "the several parts of the empire" in which that wondrous plant, called "the union of hearts," is to be found. The only plant of the kind, and it is remarkable for its greenness, is marked in the Roman herbal "Convert," and is produced by artificial culture, through which the identity of one heart is merged in the other, the Roman heart, like Pharaoh's lean kine, swallowing up the Catholic.

We have tried, in vain, the remainder of the "receipt." Our "sincerity, frankness, disinterestedness, pity, and tenderness," though "made up together with two rich oils—called perpetual kind wishes and serenity of temper," effectual in other cases, have never succeeded in "making Roman friendship."

ST. JOHN'S INSTITUTE.—A SCHOOL FOR BOYS.—MOUNT ALBAN, NEAR GEORGETOWN, D. C.—Visitor.—The Bishop of the Diocese.—Rector.—The Rev. Anthony Ten Broeck, A.M.

We have received the circular of this Church School and feel great confidence in presenting its claims to the patronage of the Members of the Church. The following extract will show its general character.

"This Institution possesses the advantage of a location unsurpassed for beauty of scenery by any probably in the United States. It is situated on the Georgetown Heights, and the prospect from it embraces the city of Washington, the Potomac for some miles, and the town of Alexandria. The country all around is elevated, romantic, and healthy, and truly delightful as a place of residence."

"This School is intended to be one in which a good, practical, Christian education may be obtained. It seeks to combine the advantages of thorough academical instruction, with the proper discipline of a Christian home. The various plans and means relied upon, it is not possible to express in a single paragraph of a circular. All needful information will be cheerfully given to those who shall make inquiries to satisfy themselves. In general, it may be said, that ample opportunity will be afforded to attain, and no pains spared to promote, sound learning and accurate scholarship. For the rest, the Rector must be regarded as the substitute of the parent and the pastor. He will exercise, in their stead, the authority of both. He will do, through God's assistance, what a father ought to do, in the nurture and admonition of his child; and what one upon whom rest the vows of a Presbyter of the Church, ought to do in the care of souls. It is hoped that no child will be sent to St. John's Institute, unless there is entire confidence in these respects—such a confidence as cannot be easily shaken, and will not be withdrawn without positive and sufficient evidence that it is no longer due."

"The course of instruction in this institution is designed to prepare the student either for business, for the study of one of the learned professions, or for entering one of the higher classes in our colleges. It includes all the branches usually taught in a full course of English and Classical studies. Instruction will also be given in the Modern Languages, Music, and Drawing."

Academy of the Protestant Episcopal Church,

341 Market Street.

The Autumnal Session will begin on Friday, September 1.

An addition having been made to the number of the Teachers, the schools, of which the Academy consists, (from one to another of which the pupils pass every forty minutes,) will be increased after the present vacation to six. The whole, as heretofore, will be superintended daily by the Principal, and from time to time by the Bishop of the Diocese, and a monthly Committee appointed for the purpose by the Board of Trustees. Circulars may be had at the Bookstore of Messrs. E. C. & J. Biddle, S. W. corner of 5th and Minor sts., and after the present month, of the Janitor at the Academy.

G. EMLEN HARE, Principal.

Extracts from Bishop Potter's Annual Addresses to the Convention of the Diocese.

To the Convention of 1846.—"It gives me great pleasure to inform the Convention that some important measures have been adopted during the last year, towards securing to our youth the advantages of superior classical instruction, in connection with proper religious training. The classical department of the Protestant Episcopal Academy, which was established in this city more than fifty years since, through the agency of Bishop White and others, has been re-opened under the auspices of the Rev. Dr. Hare, and will afford to parents in this vicinity the means of educating boys in the most approved manner. Its funds have enabled the Trustees to make liberal provision for the sons of Clergymen, and others, on whom the charges of instruction would fall heavily, and it is hoped that the Academy will prove rich in blessing to many families."

To the Convention of 1847.—"I had occasion in my last address to call the attention of the Diocese to the provisions, which had just been made, to secure to the sons of clergymen a superior classical training, in connection with proper religious culture. The Episcopal Academy in this city, under the care of the Rev. Dr. Hare, had then just been opened. The anticipations entertained of its usefulness have been more than realized. Its numbers have increased beyond expectation, and its discipline and course of instruction are worthy of all praise. In its influence generally, and especially in its care of the manners, morals and religious principles of the young, it vindicates its claims to the confidence of all the members of our Church; and having occasion frequently myself to visit the school, I feel the greater assurance in recommending it to general favor."

To the Convention of 1848.—"The Academy in this city, under the care of the Rev. Dr. Hare, has had a career, thus far, of great and uninterrupted prosperity; and it is exerting an influence on the principles and character of our children which will be felt for good long after our own earthly course has terminated. It now numbers nearly one hundred pupils." Aug. 19—5w.

Bojesen's and Arnold's Manual of Greek and Roman Antiquities.

A Manual of Grecian and Roman Antiquities, by D. E. F. Bojesen, Prof. of Greek Language and Literature in the University of Sorø. Translated from the German. Edited by Thos. K. Arnold, M. A. First American edition, with additions and corrections. One vol. 12mo; price $1, or in 2 vols, 62½ cents each.

The present Manuals of Greek and Roman Antiquities are far superior to any thing on the same topics as yet offered to the American Republic. A leading Review of Germany says:—"The conciseness and precision which the author has every where prescribed to himself, prevents the superficial observer from perceiving the essential superiority of the book to its predecessors; but whoever subjects it to a careful examination will discover this on every page." The editor observes:—"I fully believe the pupil will receive from these little books a correct and complete picture of Grecian and Roman life. What I may call the political portions—the account of the national constitutions and their effects—appear to me of great value; and the moderate extent of each volume admits of its being thoroughly mastered—of its being got up and retained."

Shelby college, Shelbyville, Ky.

This Institution, which has just closed a prosperous session, is located on the McAdams road between Louisville and Frankfort, in one of the most desirable and healthful regions of the West. It is under the control and patronage of the Diocese of Kentucky. Arrangements have recently been made for the completion of extensive additions to the present College buildings, for the accommodation of students, and for the erection of an Astronomical Observatory. Every facility will be furnished for the thorough instruction of youth in this Institution, and due diligence will be required of every class of its pupils in the prosecution of their respective studies. Those who have the control of Shelby College are resolved that it shall contribute its full share in forming and perpetuating an elevated standard of collegiate discipline and scholarship. The President will receive the sons of members of the Church in his family, and give special attention to their religious and moral, as well as to their literary education.

Strict attention will be given to the training of the pupils of this Institution in the various branches of English education, as well as to classical and scientific instruction. Candidates for the ministry and sons of clergymen will receive the benefits of the College gratuitously.

The Indian Summer.

There is a time, just ere the frost
Prepares to pave old Winter's way,
When Autumn, in a reverly lost,
The mellow daytime dreams away.

When Summer comes in musing mind,
To gaze once more on hill and dell,
To mark how many sheaves they bind
And see if all is ripened well,

With balmy breath she whispers low,
The dying flowers look up, and give
Their sweetest incense ere they go,
For her who bade their beauties live.

She bends above the quiet pool
In which the rill forgets to play,
The frolic eddies quickly school
Their eyes to glass her transient stay.

She enters 'neath the woodland shade,
Her zephyrs lift the lingering leaf,
And bear it gently where are laid
The loved and lost ones of its grief.

She seeks the shore, old ocean heaves
In gladness high his mighty breast,
Prisons his wild winds in their caves,
And, basking in her smiles, is blest.

At last old Autumn, rousing, takes Again his sceptre and his throne,
With boisterous hand the trees he shakes,
Intent on gathering all his own.

Sweet Summer, sighing, flies the plain,
And waiting Winter, gaunt and grim,
Sees miser Autumn hoard his grain,
And smiles to think its all for him.

Modern Monasticism.

"HOUSE OF LORDS.—Monday, July 17.

"The House again assembled this morning to hear appeals.

"The peers present were—the Lord Chancellor, Lord Brougham, Lord Campbell, and Lord Abinger.

"Their lordships proceeded with the arguments in part heard the appeal of CECILIA FULHAM AND OTHERS v. ALEXANDER M'CARTHY AND OTHERS.

"The history of this extraordinary case may thus be described:—This suit was instituted to obtain the payment of two distributive shares of the appellant, Maria M'Carthy, and her sister, the respondent, Catherine M'Carthy, in the personal estate of their father, Alexander M'Carthy late of Grenville-place, in the city of Cork, deceased. Alexander M'Carthy died on the 13th of July, 1843, intestate as to his real and personal estate; the amount of the personal estate of which he died possessed was between 90,000*l.* and 100,000*l.*, of which sum at the time of his death, about 50,000*l.* were invested in Ireland, and the residue invested in England, and in different parts of the continent of Europe. The intestate left the appellant Maria, and the respondent Catherine, and also the respondents Alexander M'Carthy, Nelson M'Carthy, Daniel M'Carthy, John M'Carthy, James M'Carthy, Helena Morrogh (formerly Helena M'Carthy, but then and now the wife of James Morrogh), Elizabeth M'Carthy, and Jane M'Carthy, his only children and sole nearest of kin (and of whom the respondent Alexander M'Carthy was also heir-at-law) him surviving; and also a widow surviving him, who, nevertheless, by the settlement executed in contemplation of their marriage, was expressly debarred of all right whatsoever to a distributive share in his property under such intestacy. The appellant Maria had, with the full approbation of her father, in 1828, become a professed nun of the order of St. Ursula, in the Roman-catholic community of Blackrock in the county of Cork, after having passed through the respective periods of probationship and novitiate in the same community. On her profession her father paid to the community the sum of 1000*l.*, that being a larger sum than is usually paid on the profession of nuns of her station of life. In 1829, the respondent Catherine, with the same approbation, had also become a professed nun in the same community, after passing in like manner her periods of probationship and novitiate. Her father paid another sum of 1000*l.* to the convent upon her profession. On the 12th of August, 1843, the respondent John M'Carthy, took out administration in Ire and to the estate of his intestate father, and subsequently in England and other foreign countries to the same estate. He possessed himself of the whole of the Irish assets, and divided them amongst his brothers and sisters, to the exclusion of the appellant Maria and the respondent Catherine, and then went abroad; and having possessed himself of the foreign assets of the intestate, he remitted a portion to those respondents, and retained the rest, and has never made any payment to the appellant Maria, or to the respondent Catherine, in respect to their shares. The bill amongst other things, set forth to the effect above mentioned; and also that the intestate was, at the time of his death, possessed of, and entitled to, personal property of considerable value, amounting to upwards of 100,000*l.* The bill then stated, that all the brothers of Maria and Catherine had been anxious to prevent them from receiving or recovering any part of their distributive share of the said father's assets, in consequence of their being members of the said religious society; that at first the brothers endeavored to prevail upon said Maria and Catherine to renounce all right and title or claim to their said shares, in order that the same might be divided among their brothers and sisters; and that having failed to persuade them to consent to such an arrangement, the said brothers had used threats and menaces in order to bring them into a compliance with their wishes; and moreover, that if they insisted on payment they would compel them to appear personally in court to be examined, well knowing that such a threat would be likely to have great effect upon the minds of the said Maria and Catherine. However eventually, to put an end to the entreaties of their brothers, the appellant Maria executed a deed on the 29th of December, 1843, whereby she assigned all her distributive share of her father's assets to the other appellants, Cecilia Fulham and Margaret Lynch, as trustees for themselves and the other members of the said religious society. Of this act Maria gave due notice to her family, and demanded to know when the money would be paid over, and also what sum her share would amount to. The result of this communication was that the assets were at once divided between the other members of the family, to the exclusion of the sisters Maria and Catherine (who subsequently executed a similar deed). The bill in the end prayed that an account might be directed to be taken of the intestate's estate, and that the sisters Maria and Catherine might be declared to be entitled to their respective one-tenth shares of their father's personal estate and effects.

"On the part of the respondents it was urged, that their sister Maria had been admitted a member of the covenant about the year 1828; that the respondent Catherine had been admitted the year following; and that upon the admission of each, their father, the intestate, had paid, by way of portion to the convent, the sum of 1000*l.* each, which sum exceeded the amount required by the convent by 200*l.* each—the convent having, in fact, originally demanded the sum of 800*l.* only for each. This latter was the sum usually paid by or for a lady on her admission. It was now, therefore, contended that the intestate, their father, had considered that in making this payment to the convent of 1000*l.* for each of his daughters he had made a final provision for them, and that they would take no further share of his estate; and furthermore, that it was equally clear that the two sisters Maria and Catherine, had not only admitted and believed that such provisions were final, and were all that they were to receive from their father, but that in consequence of the conviction which they entertained that by the 'vow of poverty' which they had taken they had renounced all claims in a pecuniary way upon their family, and therefore that no arrangement had been made with their father as to a release of all their claims upon his estate, it having been at the time expressly stated, not only by the sisters Maria and Catherine, but by the Superioress of the convent, that their father had acted most liberally in paying such sums. Indeed, Catherine had stated that if she had been aware that any further claim could have been set up against the property of her father, she would have taken care before her profession and taking her vows in the convent, to have executed such deed or instrument as would have prevented the setting up of any claim on the part of the convent. By the regulation of the convent, persons desirous of professing themselves nuns, undergo a probation of six months as 'postulants'; at the expiration of that period they put on the white veil as novices, and at the end of two years from the time of their putting on the white veil they are permitted to 'profess' themselves. No particular age is fixed before which 'profession' is not admitted. An infant may 'profess' herself after passing the probationary period. Upon the occasion of 'profession' the person so 'professing' herself is required by the rules and regulations of the convent to take vows of 'voluntary poverty,' 'perpetual chastity,' 'obedience to the superiors of the convent,' and to employ herself in the 'instruction of young girls.' After having taken such vows she becomes a member of the community of 'Professed Nuns of the order of St. Ursula,' and assumes and wears the black veil and dress worn by 'professed nuns.' Maria and Catherine M'Carthy went through all these ceremonies, and are now 'professed nuns of the order of St. Ursula,' and live in the convent. By the vow of 'voluntary poverty,' the 'professed nun' renounces all claims to and dominion over any property to which she may be entitled, and all power to dispose of such property; but no assignment of such property, either of that to which the person 'professing herself' is then or to which she may thereafter become entitled, is made to or in trust for the convent; nor did it appear that any such assignment was made by the appellant Maria M'Carthy, or by the respondent Catherine, her sister, at the time of their respective 'professions.' By the 'vow of obedience' the 'professed nun' submits to be implicitly bound by, and to carry into effect, the orders of the superiors of the convent, with such strictness that any refusal or neglect readily and cheerfully to comply with such orders would be an act of 'disobedience'; the operation of that vow being that the 'professed nun' thereby entirely surrenders all exercise of her own free will to the superiors of the convent, and becomes absolutely subject to their control. The observance of and compliance with these above mentioned vows is enforced, if necessary, by the strictest discipline, and acts of 'disobedience' are in many instances considered as 'mortal sins' and visited with punishment. Alexander M'Carthy, the father, on two several occasions prior to his death, wrote in his own handwriting a will, or memorandum of a will—the one between the years 1834 and 1837, in which he bequeathed to his daughters Maria and Catherine, '5*l.* each, both having been provided for in the convent; and the latter which bore the date of April 1, 1837, in which he bequeathed to his said daughters 'only one British shilling each and no more, both having been provided for.' But neither of these documents having been duly signed or executed as a will was admitted to probate as a will or testament. Shortly after the death of the father several interviews took place between the other respondents and the respondent Catherine M'Carthy and the appellant M'Carthy at the convent. At the first of these interviews Catherine inquired whether her father had made a will? and upon being told that he had not, said that in that case she was sure the convent would set up a claim to a share for her sister Maria and herself, and that she was bound by her vows to do as her superiors ordered her. She also stated, not only then, but upon several subsequent occasions, that she considered it a most cruel and unjust thing that any part of her father's property should be taken from his family and given to strangers; but that she would be compelled by her vows to act, in regard to any property to which she might have any claim, in such a manner as her spiritual superiors should direct. At these interviews the appellant Maria, and the respondent Catherine, both agreed in stating that it was distinctly understood between them and their father that the 1000*l.* paid by him on their respective admissions to the convent were to be the only sums which they were to receive out of his property, and that neither they, nor any one on their parts, were or was ever to have any further claim on such property. Catherine had also said to her brother, John M'Carthy, 'John, I give you any right and title that I have to my share of the assets, to divide amongst my four younger brothers; and blame yourself if the convent ever get a penny of it.' The appellant Maria, the sister, on the other hand, had always said that she would be 'obliged by her vows' to act in regard to her share of her father's property entirely as her superiors directed her, and that she could have no will of her own in the matter; and she also added that, notwithstanding her great affection for her family, yet, that if they were starving, she could not, without the consent of her superiors, give one of them so much as a loaf of bread. After the grant of the letters of administration, John M'Carthy had a conversation with Catherine, when she told him that she had applied to the superioress for liberty to assign any right that she had in the assets of her father to her younger brothers, and that the superioress said she had not the power of giving such liberty, but told her to apply to the bishop. This application she accordingly made to the bishop, the Right Rev. John Murphy, but the bishop replied he had no power; that nobody in fact had such power, and directed her to go to the superioress. Upon this Catherine told the bishop that she had already been with that lady, by whom she had been referred to herself. To this remark the bishop said, 'You must observe your vow of obedience.' Catherine M'Carthy then suggested that, if it was meant that she must dispose of the property against her conscience, it would be for a court of equity to decide how far such an act would be valid. To this the bishop replied, 'If these are your ideas, madam, let me tell you I have lawyers in my family as well as yours, and this is too good a thing not to look after.' Shortly afterwards a claim was set up on the part of the convent to the distributive shares of Maria and Catherine in the estate, by virtue of the assignments of the 29th of December, 1843, and the 13th of March, 1844, with respect to the execution of the assignment of December, 1843, the appellant Maria M'Carthy expressly stated that she had signed the same in conformity with her 'vow of obedience'; that it had pained her very much to do so, but that she had no alternative, as she was strictly bound by her vows. She also stated, that neither she nor her sister Catherine would individually derive any benefit from the money so derived from her father; that it was not with her consent that any proceedings should be taken for the recovery of it, and that she did not authorize any steps to be taken. The appellant Maria, further stated with respect to the execution of the deed, that she had cried the whole night after she had signed it, and that it was no want of regard to her family that had led her to do the act, but that she was called on under her 'vow of obedience' to do so; and that she had no free will of her own. Almost immediately after signing the deed of assignment, she became seriously ill and deranged in her intellect, and continued for some time in great danger. With respect to the execution of the assignment of the 13th of March, 1844, Catherine McCarthy stated, previous to her signing such deed, that if she was obliged to sign a deed, it would be like the act of a dead person, and that she would have no more power over her will or act than a dead person would have; in fact, that it would be as if a pen were held in the hand of a dead person, and that it was out of her power to avoid signing the deed, in consequence of the strictness of her vow, the operation of which upon her she likened to the effect of the presentation of a pistol by a highwayman about to rob her. It appears, however, that afterwards, in the first instance, she refused to sign the deed of assignment; and upon inquiry by one of her brothers at the convent, why his sister Catherine did not come down to see him in the visiting-room, her sister Maria stated that she was unwell, that she had suffered much from the censure of the bishop, and that she was undergoing punishment. Shortly afterwards Catherine came down to her brother, when she bore all the appearance of having suffered much, both mentally and corporeally; her spirits were much depressed, and she then stated that she feared she should be obliged to sign the deed in compliance with her vows, and that he (meaning her brother) had no idea of the mental training they went through; that she would be obliged to state that her acts were free and voluntary, and that everything that was done by her as a 'Religious' must be done cheerfully and freely otherwise it would be deemed and considered that she had broken her vows. She afterwards stated that it was her duty to be silent upon the subject of the assignment; that she had accidentally procured a book in the convent containing the rules of the order, and that she had found therein that the punishment awarded on the continent for a serious crime was to be immured between two walls in a standing posture, and to be fed on bread and water; that in some cases parties had been known to die from the punishment; and that it was decided in the community that any person or member of the convent speaking or acting adversely to the claims set up by the convent for the property, would be guilty of a mortal sin. When the two sisters, Maria and Catherine, were informed that the bill in this cause had been filed, they both expressed great astonishment, and said it was the first they had heard of such a proceeding, and Catherine added that she hoped the convent would never get a farthing of the amount so claimed.

"On behalf of the respondents, it was further contended, amongst many other reasons, that it had been the wish of the sisters Maria and Catherine that their shares should be divided among their younger brothers, and that they had been coerced into the execution of the deeds of assignment by their 'vows of obedience,' and by the influence and control of the superiors of the convent. The bill having been filed, the case was argued, and on the 1st of December, 1846, the Lord Chancellor of Ireland (Brady) pronounced his decree to the effect that the deeds of assignment had not been executed by the said Maria and Catherine McCarthy as free agents, but on the contrary, that they had been so executed under the pressure and compulsion of the 'vow of obedience,' and he therefore declared that the plaintiffs were not entitled to any relief in respect of such deeds. The bill was therefore dismissed with costs to be paid by the plaintiffs, Cecilia Fulham and Margaret Lynch. The present appeal was against this decree.

"Mr. G. Turner, Mr. Bethell, and Mr. T. C. Anstey appeared for the appellants; and Sir F. Kelly, Mr. Rolt, Mr. Napier, and Mr. Hetherington were for the respondents.

"The arguments, which had occupied nearly the whole of Friday, were this day resumed, and on their conclusion after four o'clock,

"The Lord Chancellor intimated that their lordships would consider the case on Thursday.

"The house then rose."

Their Lordships did not pronounce their judgment until Tuesday the 25th of July, when the appeal was dismissed.

It was not requisite, as it appears, for their lordships to decide this Appeal on the ground of its own merits, as they considered it necessary to dismiss it on the grounds that Miss McCarthy could not be a party to the suit. But if the heads of the convent determine on filing a new bill in Chancery, and the Irish Chancellor remains of the same opinion as before, that Miss McCarthy and her sister were under constraint and coercion, and that on this ground they were not capable of executing the deeds by virtue of which the convent has set up this claim, and if, in case of his again dismissing their suit, they should again appeal to the House of Lords, and the question shall be argued and decided on its own merits, many points will come before the public of no little importance, especially at a time like this, when such strenuous efforts are made to restore the monastic orders in this country, and to recover the ascendancy of Rome.

The prudence of such a suit and appeal may well indeed be doubted. Disgusted as Mr. McCarthy and his family must be by the cupidity of the convent, it would not be very surprising if some of them were to have their attention drawn to more abstract questions, and their suspicions awakened as to the Catholicity of a church which encourages and fosters such a system. Stranger and more improbable events have been brought about by similar causes.

As a chapter in the history of Irish Romanism, the whole story is as instructive as it is remarkable. It is by such means as this alone that Romanism has acquired the power and position it has in that unhappy country. It is a thoroughly worldly, secularized, and political system, and so long as it maintains its ill gotten ascendancy, so long as the priest maintains his reign of terror by the horsewhip and the threats of assassination, and the bishops are not ashamed to countenance and abet the cupidity of the convents, and to terrify helpless and unprotected women with the prospect of being immured between stone walls and fed on bread and water, so long must Ireland remain a barbarous, uncivilized country, and its wretched and impoverished inhabitants the slaves of ignorance, superstition, and violence.

Extempore Preaching.

To the Editor of The Church.

Sir,—In your paper of the 31st of August, an article headed "Extempore Preaching" and signed H., has attracted my attention, upon which I beg to trouble you with a few remarks. It is not my intention to enter upon the discussion of the question, as to which mode of delivering Sermons (with or without book) be most conducive to the edification of the people. This subject has been so fully discussed, by many of the most eminent men of our communion, even by the highest dignitaries of our Church, that I should be justly chargeable with presumption, were I to imagine that anything which I could write, on either side of the question, could add weight to the arguments which they have employed.

Had your correspondent confined himself to the discussion of his question, I should not have felt myself called upon to notice his arguments (however weak and inconclusive they might appear to me); I should have allowed them to pass for what they were worth, with your readers; but when I find him laying down, as a rule of the Church of England, that which never has been the rule of that Church, I feel myself called upon to set the public right upon that point; for, surely, it would argue a bad state of things amongst us, were any individual allowed, uncontradicted, to set forth his own private opinions and views as the rule of that portion of the Church of God to which we belong. It would, perhaps, be sufficient for my purpose to call upon your correspondent to produce the rule of the Church of England—"That the Clergyman shall write his Sermons, and preach them as written;" but I shall proceed a little farther, and shall shew that no such rule has ever existed in our Church, but that our Ministers are left, in this particular, to do that which they believe will most redound to the glory of God and to the salvation of men.

There is a document extant to which I would direct attention, as furnishing a decisive proof that the rule your correspondent speaks of was not known in the Church of England in the early part of the 17th century: it is an order from King Charles 2nd to the University of Cambridge, which is found in the Statute Book of the University. It runs thus:—

"MR. VICE-CHANCELLOR AND GENTLEMEN:—

"Whereas, His Majesty being informed that the practice of reading Sermons is generally taken up by the preachers, before the University, and therefore continued, even before himself: His Majesty hath commanded me to signify to you his pleasure that the said practice, which took beginning with the disorder of the late times, be wholly laid aside, and that the aforesaid preachers deliver their sermons, both in Latin and English, by memory, or without book, as being a way of preaching which His Majesty judgeth most agreeable to the use of all foreign Churches, to the custom of the University heretofore, and to the nature and intentment of that holy exercise: and that His Majesty's commands in the premises may be duly regarded and observed, his further pleasure is, that the names of all such ecclesiastical persons as shall continue the present supine and slothful way of preaching, be, from time to time, signified unto me, by the Vice-Chancellor for the time being, upon pain of His Majesty's displeasure. MONMOUTH."

From this it will appear that the practice of reading sermons was, in the time of Charles 2nd, regarded by the King as a novelty in the Church of England, as having taken its beginning from the disorders of the late times, and as supine and slothful, and therefore to be discontinued by all the Clergy.

At a period somewhat late, we find that no such rule existed in the Church of England, for Bishop Burnett, in his Pastoral Care, a work intended for the instruction of Clergymen, not only makes no mention of such a rule, but gives directions to young Clergymen how they may attain facility and excellence in delivering their Sermons without book. His views upon this subject are so replete with wisdom, and so happily expressed, that I shall transcribe a few passages from his Pastoral Care; I do this the more readily, as this work has, since its publication, been regarded by the Bishops of our Church as the best uninspired instructor of the Clergy in the duties of their calling.

After stating that "reading of sermons is peculiar to the English nation, and is endured in no other," the Bishop goes on to say: "But now I come to propose another method of preaching, by which a Priest may be prepared, after a right view of his matter, a true understanding of his text, and a digesting of his thoughts upon it into their natural and proper order, to deliver these both more easily to himself and with a better effect, both upon himself and his hearers. To come at this, he must be for some years at a great deal of pains to prepare himself to it; yet when that is over, the labour of all the rest of his life, as to those performances, will become very easy and very pleasant to him." The Bishop then proceeds to give instructions both as to the materials to be laid in by the diligent study of God's Word, and of all such works as help to the understanding of the same, and also as to the practice which every one must adopt who is desirous "to prepare himself to be a preacher in this method." These instructions are too long to be here inserted, but I would strongly recommend them to the serious attention of all my younger brethren: for, whether they intend to adopt the mode of delivering their sermons recommended by the Bishop, or not, the course of preparation which he prescribes cannot fail, if faithfully carried out, to make them efficient and useful Ministers of the Word. The Bishop thus concludes his instructions upon this point: "Now, if a man can carry on this method, and, by much meditation and prayer, draw down divine influences, which are always to be expected when a man puts himself in the way of them, and prepares himself for them, he will often feel that, while he is musing, a fire is kindled within him, and he will speak with authority, and without constraint,—his thoughts will be true, and his expressions free and easy."

From these extracts it is evident that Bishop Burnett knew of no rule of the Church of England, that clergymen should write their sermons: nay, more, that this excellent Prelate thought that the mode of delivering sermons without book was so well calculated to benefit both the preacher and the people, that he prescribed a long and arduous course of preparation to those who were desirous to adopt it. Thus, while your correspondent would, in elegant phraseology, characterise preaching without a written sermon as "the sour and stagnant miasmata of extempore preaching," this learned divine, whose praise has ever been high in the Church, would strongly recommend the Clergy to prepare themselves to become extempore preachers; and says, concerning the practice when duly exercised: "Discourses brought forth with a lively spirit and heat, when a composed gesture, and the proper motions of the eye and countenance, and the due modulation of the voice concur, will have all the effect that can be expected from anything that is below immediate inspiration."

In the writings of Archbishop Secker we find this subject treated of; and in his last charge the venerable Primate of all England gives this advice to the Clergy, concerning the mode of delivering their sermons: "There is a middle way used by our predecessors, of setting down in short notes the method and principal heads, and enlarging on them in such words as present themselves at the time,—perhaps duly managed, this is the best."

Your correspondent thinks that the rejection of the practice of preaching with a written sermon, can only have arisen "from a certain pragmatical contradictory spirit, which prompts men to differ, even in essentials, for the mere sake of a difference, and to hold opposite courses though it be wrong, and contrary to their convictions, for the vain and silly purpose of creating a distinction." Let him read the advice of Archbishop Secker, and of Bishop Burnett, as quoted above, and then ask himself whether the opinion which he has presumed to express concerning the motives of those who have endeavoured to follow their advice and example, has had its origin in that "charity" which "thinketh no evil." Your readers will be at no loss to appreciate the justice and modesty of your correspondent, in pronouncing the above sentence, which condemns as "pragmatical and contradictory," as "acting contrary to their convictions," for vain and silly objects, such men as Burnett, Secker, Beveridge, Bull, Usher, Cecil, Richmond, Henry Martyn, Venn, Simeon, and a host of others who, from the best and purest motives, adopted and persevered in the practice of preaching without a written sermon. Your correspondent ought also to be aware that, at the present time, some of our Bishops, and many of our most devoted Clergy, preach without a written sermon, and the former recommend to their Clergy to prepare themselves for the same practice. Our own Metropolitan has for years pursued this plan; the Archbishop of Cashel, the Bishop of Winchester and of Ossory also adopt it; and all our Bishops, when they deliver addresses at the time of Confirmation, invariably employ this mode as best calculated to make a deep and lasting impression upon the minds of those who have been just received into the full communion of the Church. If your correspondent is a Clergyman, and has ever been present when our Diocesan has addressed the Candidates for Confirmation, he must have witnessed enough to convince him that an extempore address "may be made persuasive without being dictatorial," "solemn without being whining," and "attractive without being theatrical."

I shall conclude this communication, already too long, in the words of admonition written by the Rev. H. Raikes, Chancellor of Chester, when treating of the same subject: "The quick, extemporaneous preacher should not despise his slower brother, and the deliverer of his studied sermon should not judge his more brilliant brother; but each in the fullness of Christian charity should believe of the other that God had received him, and should look to the edification which followed, rather than to the effect which was produced." B. C.

A Hint to Ministers.

AS TO HOW OFTEN THEY SHOULD PREACH THE SAME SERMON.

It was on Monday morning that I called upon the Rev. Dr. P., of Edinburgh, (Scotland,) whom I found in a most merry laughing mood.

"Why, what's the matter, Doctor, that you are so merry so early in the morning?"

"Had you been here a little earlier," said he, "you would have been laughing too.—Did you meet a man going down the court as you came up it?"

"I did, Doctor."

"Take a chair, then, till I can tell you the object of his so early visit to me on Monday morning."

He laughed again, after which, by screwing and bracing he succeeded to finish the tale, when ——— laughed more than Doctor.

"The person you met in the court," said the Doctor, "is one of my people who felt it his duty to make so early a call this morning, to reprove me for a very great sin, which he conceived me to be guilty of committing yesterday."

"Yesterday morning I preached from such a text, and being under engagement as supply in the afternoon, for Rev. Mr. E., of Leith, who was sick, I preached the same discourse to his people. It so happened that this person, whom you met in the court, went down (after the morning service) to Leith, to visit his daughter, who was sick. Having seen the child, he went to hear Mr. E. preach, when lo! who should preach but the man he had heard in the morning, and what should he hear but the same sermon! This, sir, constituted the very heinous sin of which I was guilty—the preaching at Leith the same sermon which I had preached at Edinburgh. And so grievously great, in his account is this my sin that I ought therefore to be rebuked; and to discharge which act of brotherly kindness to me was the object of his so early visit this morning."

"As he was not in the habit of calling, his visit rather surprised me; the more so on Monday morning, at so early an hour."

"I could perceive by his rather hurried and confused manner that he wanted to say something which he knew not how to introduce. To assist him therefore, I said, 'John I apprehend you have called upon me for some certain purpose; if so, proceed to inform me of the object of your visit.'"

"After some hunting, much ridding of the throat, accompanied by some few mutterings expressive of the regret and sorrow he felt that there should have existed such causes for his visit he said, "Doctor, did you not preach yesterday morning from such a text?"

"Yes, John."

"After morning service, I went down to Leith to visit my daughter, who is sick, and being there thought I would step in and hear Mr. E. preach, but found you in the pulpit in his stead; and did you not there preach the same sermon you preached in your own church in the morning?"

"I did, John, and I will tell you why I did it. I was some miles off, in another town, and in another congregation. If my sermon was of importance to you in Edinburgh, it certainly was so for them in Leith. But John I very well observe the object of your early visit. The questions you have put inform me both of its nature and design. You do not intend I presume to number me among the 'dumb dogs that cannot bark,' but you rank me among the 'idle shepherds,' because I preached the same sermon at Leith in the afternoon that I had delivered in the morning at Edinburgh, being too lazy as you suppose, to prepare another for them there; and you felt it your duty, did you not, to call upon me to reprove me for such conduct?"

"I did, Doctor, yet not exactly to reprove you but to warn against such conduct in future, as I consider it very important, if not very sinful."

"I thank you, John, and am willing to believe you my friend, and that you are sincere in what you have done."

"I am all you say, Doctor, and more too."

"That I am ready to admit, John, yet must tell you that I am more than a little sceptical as to what you affirm respecting the sinfulness and impropriety of preaching a sermon a second time, when preached under such circumstances such as mine yesterday was, away from home, and to a new congregation. But sceptic as I am, and unable as I feel to believe exactly upon these points as you do, you now have it in your power John to convince me of another fact if you will: namely, the propriety or impropriety of preaching more than once the same sermon to the same people. I felt, John, that that sermon was on an important and solemn subject; a subject eminently calculated, aided by the Spirit of God, to admonish and edify, not our church only, but every christian society; and could not fail of meeting a cordial response in every sanctified breast that listened to it."

"It was all you say, Doctor, I never have heard a sermon I liked better. It was indeed a solemn and impressive sermon; a convincing and stirring discourse—just such a sermon as the church of God, in her present circumstances requires; and, with all, it was so plain that all could understand and remember it."

"Well, John, as to the remembering it, you have had an advantage above all others, inasmuch as you have heard it twice, and by your remembering or forgetting of this sermon you have it now in your power of convincing me of the propriety or impropriety of preaching the same sermon a second or more times even at home. Now from the fact that you have heard it twice, and that but yesterday, I hope you are able to repeat for the assistance of others, and the edification of your own soul, the greater part of it, and the more especially so since you say it was so plain and easy to be remembered.—The introduction to the sermon, was neither lengthy nor far-fetched; you are able to tell me how I introduced it?"

"After a good deal of shifting, and changing of his position on his seat he said,

"Well, no, Doctor, I have pretty much forgotten the manner in which you introduced the subject."

"Well, John, you cannot have forgotten the divisions of the discourse. There was nothing artificial about them; they arose naturally out of the text, and were such as every reflecting mind could not fail to see. What was the first?"

"It, too, was lost in forgetfulness."

"Well, the second, what was it? Well, let us pass the third; can you tell me it?"

"Nor could one of them be produced."

"Well, John, you cannot possibly have forgotten the improvement made of the subject. You very well remember, I doubt not, the many and various classes of characters therein addressed; and the many and important christian duties inculcated. The improvement, John, was of all the sermon, the most awful, solemn and impressive part. It you cannot surely have forgotten?"

"It was, sir, it was. It made a deep impression on my mind, and I could see very well it did on many others also; but, Doctor, I have had a bad memory and am sorry to say can repeat but little of the improvement either."

"I waited some time for that 'little,' but found that the improvement also was lost. I then said:

"Well, John, so far are you from convincing me of the sinfulness and impropriety of preaching a sermon a second time when I go from home, that you have convinced me of the necessity of performing a new duty I never thought of before, namely, the preaching of important sermons twice and again at home."

"When you go home, John, you had better reflect upon the object of your visit to me; and while you are doing that, I shall reflect whether it is not my duty to you to preach next Sunday morning, a third time, the same sermon, with a view to assist your so treacherous memory."

"I need not add that John retired, apparently suffering by most mortified feelings."

Where is that Church in which is not to be found many such Johns? All cry, Fy, fy, at the repetition of a sermon, but try them as John was tried, and you will find that bad memories are the curse not of John alone. But how appalling the consideration of such a state of things! how discouraging to ministers, and how ruinous to immortal souls! How ruinous in every church the 'wayside' hearers!—Christian Intelligencer.

A French Lady remarked, "I don't know how it happens,—but I am the only person of my acquaintance that is always in the right."

Religion.

"It is only the land of the Redeemed, who can tell thee, the fulness of that name."

TUPPER.

NOTE by the same. "Strictly speaking only a fallen being is capable of religion; a bringing or binding back, of the affections to their proper object. An Angel, or other pure intelligence, can have no sympathies, with the fallen, as such; and therefore can know nothing of religion, as such. His worship is allegiance: or ligeance."

WORDS which stand for things eternal, in which the well-being of kingdoms and nations, is wrapped up, should always be "strictly spoken." It is for want of this strictness of speaking, the mind of the world gets confused, there being no fixed images of thought. In penning the note above, the Poet conceived a great thought, which if it had been brought forth and born, under this paternity, might have grown to such an estate and power, as to have revolutionized the world. Alas, that it should have been strangled in the birth.

Truly "only a fallen being, is capable of religion." A being that has never fallen, is "bound," by the primary condition of its upright being. It can never be re-bound, to the service of God, for this plain reason, because it never has been loosed.

But what does the poet mean, by "bringing, or binding back of the affections, to their proper object?" This is a new way of binding; binding without bands; ruling without laws; forming into "one body" again, without any form. By their "proper object," the poet meant, God. Of what use to rebind mankind to God, by their affections, if there be no binding of their bodies? Poor sons of Adam, what would ye do, in such a case? make bands for yourselves. It would be the only way. So it is with church mongers now a days. As many bands, as minds. Who does not see this is not rebinding to God. But binding each one to himself, making himself a God, unto himself. This is the religion of these "last days,"—a religion for the "affections," which leaves the "body" out of the case.

If men would be religious, and be bound to God; restored to his government; become anew his subjects; worship and serve him, not themselves, or one another; let them "believe in the Lord Jesus Christ," as "King of kings and Lord of lords," on whose "shoulder the government" of this world is placed. Let them apply to them who have power on earth, "to bind and loose," and seek to be rebound, in an everlasting covenant to God, by Jesus Christ, when alone that great privilege can be secured, in his Holy Church.

Oh! that all those who have taken upon themselves to teach and to preach about religion, could see, and would preach this: that there can be no such thing as true religion, in a state of separation from the Church of God. All other forms of rebinding men, will prove like ties of tow, before the fire of the last days, which is to "try every work of what sort it is."

Prejudice is the chief obstacle to the revival of this primitive practice. A practice so excellent should commend itself to all who hunger and thirst after righteousness.

The objection that frequent reception of the Lord's Supper will detract from its solemnity, is not in accord, it seems to me, with our blessed Saviour's design, and certainly not with apostolic usage, as we read in Acts 20, ch. 7 v.

That the early Church was subject to violent persecutions—even unto death—is no where in Holy Writ assigned as a reason for this usage, and those who urge this plea are liable to the charge of being "wise above what is written."

But admitting that the early church was influenced by such considerations, have we any guaranty that we shall escape sudden death? and should it not be esteemed a blessed privilege to be permitted to partake freely of all the means of grace, especially that "instituted and ordained as a pledge of our Redeemer's love and for a continual remembrance of His death, to our great and endless comfort?"

Let us ever remember the solemn warning "unto whomsoever much is given, of him shall be much required," and learn to prize the rich provision made for our growth in grace, and partake thereof with faith and gratitude.

"I love thy Church, O God!

Her walls before Thee stand,
Dear as the apple of Thine eye,
And graven on Thy hand."

Beyond my highest joy

I prize her heavenly ways,
Her sweet communion, solemn vows,
Her hymns of love and praise.

DONT GRUMBLE.—He is a fool that grumbles at every little mischance. Put the best foot forward, is an old and good maxim. Don't run about and tell acquaintances that you have been unfortunate. People do not like to have unfortunate people for acquaintances. Add to a vigorous determination, a cheerful spirit; if reverses come, bear them like a philosopher, and get rid of them as soon as you can. Poverty is like a panther—look it earnestly in the face and it will turn from you.

CHRISTIANITY AND INFIDELITY.—To a young infidel, who scoffed at Christianity on account of the misconduct of some of its professors, Dr. Mason said, "Did you ever know an uproar made because an infidel went astray from the paths of morality?" The infidel admitted he had not. "Then," said the Doctor, "don't you see that you admit Christianity is a holy religion, by expecting its professors to be holy; and that thus, by your very objection, you pay it the highest compliment in your power?"

We should be cautious how we indulge in the feelings even, of virtuous indignation. It is the handsome brother of anger and hatred.

Miscellaneous.

DAILY OFFERTORY.—Queen Anne's personal generosity to the Church, and her mildness of Government, made her adored by a populace; which still extended its hands to Churchmen, as the kind alleviators of their most bitter miseries; for not only the weekly but the daily offertory was still customary, and is supposed to have remained so until the year 1725. It supplied a fund for charitable purposes to the incumbents of livings too small to allow of efficient private almsgiving on the part of the indigent pastor, who is too often compelled to behold distress, without the power of supplying nourishment to the sick, and clothing to the naked of his flock.

The attachment which the English people manifested to the Established Church at this period, and for the preceding fifty years, has been treated by historians either with utter superciliousness, or with trades of abuse; which give not the slightest information to the very natural questions of wherefore the populace rose to protect when the usual movement of that class is to destroy.

"It is with simplicity of conviction, from every bearing of evidence, we assert that the causes of the insurrectionary movement of the English populace for the protection of the Church and Dr. Sacheverel proceeded from gratitude for the manner in which the poor were relieved and governed by the Church of England, and fears lest the mighty charity of the daily offertory should be extinguished with the vital functions of their Church—apprehensions which were realized in a few years." A. Strickland's Lives of the Queens of England, vol. xii., pp. 120, 121, 284.

DESERTIONS FROM ROMANISM.—We have often expressed the opinion that a large portion of Romish immigrants abandon their church after coming to this country. And this opinion has confirmation in a recent article in the Freeman's Journal, the Romish paper in New York. That paper says:

"These defections, alas, may be called not only numerous, but frightfully numerous. Every priest will attest, every town in the land is a crying witness of it. Week before last two gentlemen unacquainted with each other called on us at different times. Each had recently arrived from Ireland, and the conversation chancing with the first of them to turn upon the comparative state of the Irish at home and in America, he remarked with horror that of his numerous friends who had preceded him to this country he found a fearfully large portion of them who never went to church at all. And on our mentioning it to the second gentleman, he said he had found the same thing. They had become Kirwanites—infidels."

HONOR TO THE DEVOTED BRAVE.—We must not omit to mention an act of heroism exhibited toward the sufferers by that melancholy scene. When only a dozen helpless women and children remained on the burning wreck, paralyzed with fear, and totally incapable of helping themselves by descending from the tottering bowsprit to the boats which in the midst of the heavy sea in vain offered their assistance below, Frederick J. Jervine, a seaman of the American ship New World, stripping himself naked, made his way through the sea and wreck, and with a line in his hand succeeded in lowering the last hapless victim safely into the boats, being himself the last man to leave the wreck. On his arrival on board the Brazilian steam frigate Alfonso, he was received on the quarter-deck by the Prince de Joinville and Duke D'Aumale, who, shaking him by the hand, praised his gallantry in the most flattering terms, bestowing on him at the same time an ample gratuity.

It is said this praiseworthy individual, by his own hands, lowered one hundred persons to the boats below, of whom a great portion were women and children.

ENCKE'S COMET VISIBLE.—A letter from the Cambridge Observatory, dated Aug. 30, and addressed to President Everett, states that on Monday morning last, about two o'clock, the Comet of Encke was seen at that observatory by Mr. G. P. Bond as an exceedingly faint nebulous patch of light. It was, however, so soon obscured by clouds, that only one pretty good place was obtained by the readings of the circles of the Great Equatorial.—On the right of the 29th and morning of the 30th, the examiners were enabled to get a series of micrometrical measures with illuminated wires. The comet is yet a rather difficult object, but has increased in brightness since Monday morning.

ABOLITION OF CELIBACY.—A significant circumstance occurred in the discussions of the Frankfort Parliament on the 20th of July. M. Critzner, an Austrian Deputy, moved that the executive authority should enter into negotiations with the Holy See on the subject of the abolition of celibacy of priests, and that a special commission should be appointed to present a report thereupon. The motion was supported by the signatures of 110 members of the Assembly.

MORALS OF PARIS.—Mr. Walsh, in a late letter to the Living Age, speaks of the depravation of morals in Paris, and adds:—"Polygamy, a kind of promiscuous intercourse, has extended indefinitely." And here (though Mr. Walsh omits the inference,) is the secret, we suspect, of that taste for communism, or of socialism, after the plan of Fourier, which has devolved itself in France, and which some of our own philosophers seem to entertain. The marriage institution is found to be irksome, aristocratic, selfish, and altogether inconsistent with fraternity, equality—and all that.—Secretary.

INFLUENCE OF PRAYER.—Judge Hale, in his letters to his children, makes no scruples to say: "If I omit praying, and reading a portion of God's blessed word in the morning, nothing goes well with me all the day." Dr. Boerhaave said that "his daily practice of retiring for an hour in the morning and spending it in devotion and meditation, gave him firmness and vigor for the business of the whole day." He who goes forth from God, after acquiring his will, and committing himself to his care, is the best fitted for all the successes and disappointments of life.

Mr. George will act as Agent for the receipt of subscriptions, etc.

THANKSGIVING DAY.—The Governor of Pennsylvania has issued a Proclamation, appointing Thursday, the 23d day of November, as a day of Thanksgiving. Few, we are happy to think, in this Christian land, will refuse their assent to the propriety of such an appointment. Various and deep toned are the harmonious voices which invite the citizens of this land to the discharge of this grateful duty. Blessed with abundant harvests, rejoicing in the smile of Peace, no wasting sickness spreading dismay and sorrow among us, our hearts must willingly be lifted up, in gratitude and Praise, to "the high and mighty Ruler of the universe," whose goodness and mercy alone can save His people from the triple scourge of War, Pestilence, and Famine.

We were particularly struck with the manly tone and religious feeling which distinguish the Proclamation of Governor Johnston. As some of our readers may not see this document, we append a large portion of it for their benefit. It is in harmony with the solemn words in which our late Governor, with his dying breath, commended the people of this State to the Great Shepherd's merciful care.

We were surprised to see that, in some of our secular prints, exception was taken to a portion of this official document. And what, think you, Christian reader, are the offensive words? Why, the Governor of this Christian Commonwealth is too exclusive in the terms he employs! He only recommends this day to be set apart by ALL DENOMINATIONS OF CHRISTIANS WITHIN THIS COMMONWEALTH, as a day devoted to Thanksgiving, Prayer, and Praise! This Christian ruler also restricts too much the worship of a free and independent people, by asking them to "supplicate THROUGH THE MERITS OF THE REDEEMER, the forgiveness of sins!" JEWS, TURKS, INFIDELS, and HERETICS, are excluded from the official invitation! This is the head and front of the Governor's offending. The paper in which the censure appeared, excuses the Christian Governor, on the plea of inadvertence, an apology which we hope he will not accept. We trust he will take the manly stand taken under similar circumstances, by Governor Hamilton of South Carolina, whose noble letter was re-published in the Banner. Although no unhallowed union here exists between Church and State, still the great principles of our Government are based upon Christianity. The Gospel is recognized in the administration of our Laws, it is proclaimed in our halls of Legislation, it has been professed in almost every Message and Inaugural Address of the Chief Magistrate of these United States. And woful for us will be the day when the base and servile fear of man, or the mean and cringing design to secure the dying breath of human favor, shall lead the Rulers of this Christian land to sacrifice the last, the only hope of NATIONS or individuals—that hope which enlightens, exalts, and preserves them in time and eternity, and which they have only "through the merits of the Redeemer." These are the burning words in which the Almighty Himself has inscribed upon the everlasting Records, every godless nation's doom. "And it shall be, if thou do at all forget the Lord thy God, and walk after other gods, and serve them, and worship them, I testify against you this day that ye shall surely perish. As the nations which the Lord destroyeth before your face, so shall ye perish; because ye would not be obedient unto the voice of the Lord your God.")Deut. viii. 19, 20.)

A Proclamation.

The performance of duties we owe to the Supreme Disposer of events is a task no less pleasing than imperative. To Him, by whose enduring mercy we live; on whom we lean for support; whose arm is our defence, and whose peculiar regard is our glory; who in adversity consoles, in weakness sustains us; and from whom we receive every good and perfect gift; we owe, especially, our adoration and thanks. This obligation is equally peremptory to nations and individuals. No organization of men, no condition of society, no form of government, can release a people from their duties to God; nor should the seductions of power, the lust of ambition, or the splendor of renown, render them forgetful of the sacred privilege of addressing to the Throne of Grace and Mercy the language of thanksgiving and praise.

These truths apply to us, as a nation with especial force. With political institutions wisely adapted to our welfare and happiness; a country abounding with resources for individual prosperity, and national independence; a climate dispensing health and vigor, and a land yielding to the hand of toil a fruitful abundance; under the gracious superintendence of a righteous Providence, we have arisen in half a century from the condition of an infant and dependent nation, and have become a great and powerful people. In the necessary, yet dangerous struggle to enlarge our proportions, to develop our resources, and defend our rights; in the conflicts resulting from foreign and domestic intercourse, influenced by opposing interests and national jealousies in the balancing of powers belonging to the different branches of the national government, and settling the boundaries between reserved and conferred authority, our institutions have been preserved, our national character vindicated, and our liberties secured and perpetuated. To Him, whose "hand is not shortened, that it cannot save; neither his ear heavy, that it cannot hear," all praise, all glory is due.

The present condition of our country should awaken our most profound gratitude. The war in which we were recently engaged, has terminated, and our citizen soldiers have returned to their homes crowned with imperishable honors. We mourn, indeed, the loss of many brave men, who fell in battle, or by pestilence, but we have the consolation to know that they offered up their lives in the service of their country. Their deeds will be remembered, and their memories cherished by their admiring countrymen. The arts of peace have succeeded the clangor of war, and the spectacle is presented of twenty millions of people, reposing under the shadow of free institutions, alarmed by no danger without, agitated by no convulsions within their borders.

After contrasting the condition of our country with that of less favored lands, the proclamation thus proceeds.

In the midst of these unnumbered blessings, is it not our duty, will it not be our pleasure to return to Him, from whom they flow, the homage of our adoration and the acknowledgment of our gratitude? To His mercy, in our unworthiness, are we indebted for the munificence of His favor; to His gracious and loving kindness must be attributed the continuance of our national prosperity.

Entertaining these sentiments, and deeply sensible of the necessity of Divine aid, to guide and guard us in the path of duty, I do hereby appoint Thursday, the 23d day of November next, as a day of Thanksgiving to Almighty God, and do earnestly recommend to the People of the State of Pennsylvania, that it be set apart, by all denominations of Christians within this Commonwealth, as a day devoted to Thanksgiving, Prayer, and Praise; and that they abstain on that day, as far as practicable, from worldly employments, assemble at their respective places of public worship, acknowledge their transgressions; supplicate, through the merits of the Redeemer, the forgiveness of sins; and with contrite hearts, render to his holy name the homage of adoration, thanksgiving and praise.

Given under my hand and the Great Seal of State at Harrisburg, this twenty-eighth day of September, in the year of our Lord one thousand eight hundred and forty-eight, and of the Commonwealth the seventy-third.

TOWNSEND HAINES,
Secretary of the Commonwealth.

By the Governor.

DIFFICULTIES OF MEN-PLEASING. We copy the following from "the English Churchman." We do not speak from any unpleasant experience of our own, but we know that English Journals are not the only ones exposed to the difficulties herein set forth. A brief trial of the case will satisfy the most sceptical, that in the discharge of editorial duties as in the performance of all others, since there is but "one Lord" while there are many men of various minds to please, their task will be the easier as well as most satisfactory who strive to fulfil their office, "not as men-pleasers; but in singleness of heart fearing God." All the experience of life combines to prove the soundness and wisdom of the Apostolic "rule, whatsoever ye do, do it heartily, as to the Lord, and not unto men."

It would be no unreal statement of the practical difficulties connected with such a journal as ours, if we were to give the following as specimens of letters which we are in the habit of receiving—in fact, they are, briefly, the sense and substance of actual letters:—

I.

Sir,—Why do you attack, or meddle with the Romanists; have we not evils and abuses enough of our own to attend to, and to remedy? And why do you ever apply the offensive term "Schism" to the Roman communion in this country?

Yours, &c.,

A. B.

II.

Sir,—Why do you lay so much stress upon the errors and evils of the popular "Evangelical" system, and so little upon those of Romanism, into which so many, even of the Clergy as well as the Laity have been led? And why do you sometimes call it "seceding" to the "Roman Communion," when a man forsakes the Church for what you know to be a "Schism?"

Yours, &c.,

C. D.

III.

Sir,—Now that the heat of the "Tractarian" and Rubrical controversies has subsided, I wish that you and your correspondents would adopt a more gentle and charitable tone, find less fault, and be less exclusive and dogmatic in your views and opinions. Depend upon it you would have more general influence, and would win over many who now keep aloof from you.

Yours, &c.,

E. F.

IV.

Sir,—It appears to me, and to some of my friends, that you have of late somewhat lowered the bold and uncompromising tone for which you were once so distinguished. If by this you hope to gain over some of the moderate, safe, half-and-half sort of men, you will not succeed, and you will certainly lose—

Yours, &c.,

G. H.

V.

Sir,—I trust you do not intend to allow the course taken by "X. X." to pass without comment. You would not do so if he were an "Evangelical," and unless you proceed impartially—"without fear or favor"—you will lose your influence for good.

Yours,

J. K.

VI.

Sir,—I was much surprised and pained to find you censuring such a man as "X. X." Granted that he has been saying and doing what many of his friends disapprove, still, his former services, and the high estimation in which he is held, should have secured him from unfavourable comment in your paper. If you make no distinction between friends and foes, you will give offence to many more besides—

Yours, &c.,

L. M.

VII.

Sir,—Could you not give more secular and less ecclesiastical matter in your paper? As I only see the local paper besides yours, I am desirous of hearing what is going on in the world; and my family wish to have something amusing. A few hints on subjects which concern our rural population would be also acceptable. The extract from N. O., and the paper by P. Q., which you recently published, are very sound and instructive, in their way, but we don't want sermons in newspapers.

Yours,

R. S., a Village Pastor.

VIII.

Sir,—I wish you would give less secular and more Ecclesiastical matter. As one sees several other papers, we do not look to you for secular, any more than we do to them for ecclesiastical information. Some good practical papers and extracts on the religious and moral questions of the times, with full reports of ecclesiastical intelligence, are what is mainly required in such a paper. Recollect that we bind up, and refer to your journal, and therefore you should give us matter of permanent value, and not such as loses its interest the moment it is read. We want materials for use among our people.

Yours, &c.,

T. U., a Town Pastor.

Now, although such letters as these answer each other, so far as we are concerned, yet, doubtless, the writers often fancy that we are very inattentive to their suggestions, though—like the old man in the fable—we would fain, and, by turns, we try, to please all parties. The true secret of the whole matter is, that those who subscribe to periodicals of a distinctive and restrictive character, very generally, and perhaps very naturally, fall into the habit of regarding their own opinions, tastes, and feelings, as a faithful type of the entire supporters of such periodicals: hence anything which is inconsistent with that type, is looked upon with a jealous and unfriendly eye.

The practical lessons, then, that we are desirous of impressing upon every one of our readers are these:—1. That we have no such type of their opinions, tastes, wants, and feelings by which we can work—and that there is, in fact, no such type in existence; consequently, many (we do not say all) of those points which are regarded as errors, defects, and offences, by one of our readers, may be viewed very differently by another, and even by the same person, at another time, and in another case. 2. That we must constantly, and necessarily, rely far more upon the consideration, patience, and charity of our readers, to excuse, or forgive, whatever is distasteful to them, than upon our ability to please everybody, at all times—a thing which, when the interests of the Church are at stake, no honest and earnest man can do, even with the most ample time for deliberation, or opportunity for personal explanation, and where only his own opinions and language have to be defended or explained—much less can he do so in our position, and circumstances.

We regretted that other duties kept us from the interesting Service noticed below, to which we were kindly invited. We wish all prosperity to this noble work, and trust all engaged in it may be richly blessed by Him, for whose worship they have built a "glorious Sanctuary."

Consecration of Grace Church.

NEWARK, N. J.—On Wednesday last, the 4th inst., this new and noble structure was consecrated to the Service of Almighty God. It is the second Church of that name built by the Congregation, who are to worship in it; the former Church being deemed inadequate. In point of architectural merit, it is one of the very best in the country. All things considered we deem it second to none of those built by Mr. Upjohn, its distinguished architect, and this is saying much.

The Bishop, attended by a numerous body of the clergy (in their surplices) and of the laity, proceeded from the old to the new Church; which was filled to overflowing by a large congregation, whose attention was reverently given to the solemn services throughout.

The Consecration Service, always impressive, never impressed us more than on this occasion. There were considerations, which gave to the solemnity a peculiar interest. We called to mind, that only a few years since, when the venerable and able Dr. Chapin was called to Newark to found a second congregation, many deemed the project chimerical. But in a few years Grace Church was firmly established, and Trinity meanwhile became stronger than ever. We remembered too that when the idea of building a second Grace Church was first suggested, it was thought almost wild; or would have been thought so, had it not been suggested and taken up by a layman, whose good purposes are sure to ripen into generous acts. Now we saw the original conception more than doubly realized. We saw in these results, moreover, the fruit, which through God's grace, faithful ministerial labour is sure in time to yield. And it was to us especially pleasant to trace it in no small degree to the faithfulness of friends and brethren, of Henderson, Chapman, and Ten Broeck; into whose labours other worthy successors and fellow-labourers are entering with the prospect of an ample harvest. For besides Trinity and Grace Churches, there are now springing up around them, as their off-shoots four other Parishes, with the promise of rapid and substantial growth. We saw then in this noble Church, not only the precious fruit of well directed zeal, but the sure earnest, the seed as it were, of a future rich and abundant harvest. Already have the Churchmen of Newark shown that they accept the Bishop's challenge, uttered at the laying of the corner stone of the present Church, to see that the Church in Newark should go "right onward." We doubt not that they will follow up what they have so well begun.

Of the Sermon (from the text, "Worship the Lord in the beauty of holiness") we may only say, that it was most appropriate to the occasion, as the fixed attention of all present testified.

The day was one, upon the whole, to be remembered by those who shared in its sacred and solemn joyfulness.

The following Clergy were present at the Consecration.

Diocese of New Jersey.—Rev. Drs. Barry, Ogilby; Rev. Messrs. Adams, Burnham, Clarkson, Eaton, Fackler, Frost, Germain, Henderson, Lowell, Moore, R. C., Patterson, Peet, Phillips, Putman, Roberts, Sherman, Thompson, Watson, Williams.

Diocese of New York.—Rev. Drs. Haight, Vinton; Rev. Messrs. Carder, Cooke, Duffie, Eigenbrodt, Fowler, Geer, Halsey, Harriman, Haskins, Howland, Mahan, Parker, S. P., Southard.

Rev. D. Huntington of South Carolina,

Rev. Mr. Wells of Boston, Massachusetts. — Rev. Dr. Ogilby

The School of Miss P. C. Evans, at West Chester, for Young Ladies, will be found advertised in our columns. The Bishop commends the school as a "Happy Home" for children; while its advantages as a scholastic institution is commended by numerous highly respectable individuals. We are requested to publish the following:

For the Banner of the Cross.

Miss P. C. Evans' School, Westchester, Pa.

This school for young ladies, so delightfully situated in one of the most beautiful towns of the State, and so eminent for the signal ability with which it is conducted, may not be familiar to some of your readers. I wish that its character may be better known, that its usefulness may be extended to the rising generation. In perusing the last Annual Address of the Rt. Rev. Bishop Potter, I was pleased to see that it had not escaped his vigilant observation. I hope, for the advantage of parents as well as the school, you will publish an extract from the Bishop's Address. I have been for years intimately acquainted with Miss Evans, as well as her mother and sisters, and can speak of their finished manners and high mental and moral accomplishments. Her institution has already accomplished much, and is destined to accomplish much more good in this Diocese. The Bishop happily sets forth one of the advantages of this school, under the exclusive charge of four sisters and their mother, (which will be appreciated by parents) when he says that it embraces "the comforts of a HAPPY HOME."

Extract from the Rt. Rev. Bishop Potter's Address to the Convention of the Diocese, at Philadelphia, May 17, 1848.

After alluding to another, excellent seminary in the Diocese, the situation of which is attractive, the instruction superior, and the advantages peculiar, Bishop Potter says:

"The same is true of the school of Miss Evans, at West Chester, which has recently been removed to a large and commodious mansion, and which bestows upon its pupils the blessings of a thorough intellectual, moral and religious culture, with the comforts of a happy home, at rates so moderate as to bring its advantages within the reach of many who cannot patronize our more expensive schools."

The Winter Term of this institution opens in November next. Circulars may be had by applying to the Principal, or to her brother, Henry S. Evans, West Chester.

St. Mary's School, Raleigh, North Carolina.

REV. ALBERT SMEDES, RECTOR.

We have received the Circular of this Church School, and have great pleasure in making known as far as we can, its claims to patronage. Of course our own opinion of these must be formed upon our personal knowledge of those who have the supervision and conduct of this Institution, and from a consideration of the course of study, and method of discipline as set forth in the Circular received. Upon these grounds we must express a most favorable judgment. "The situation of this school," we are informed by the Circular, "is all that can be desired for convenience, for health, and for beauty. It is about a mile from the Capitol, on elevated ground, and in the midst of an oak grove of more than twenty acres." It has also "been remarkably favored in the health of its pupils."

We have received a gentle hint that the Banner is inclined to be partial in commending schools in its vicinity. The Editor of the Banner can honestly disavow any undue partiality. He has never shown any unwillingness to assert the just claims of any school which he could honestly commend. It is to be expected, and perfectly right, that we should feel greater confidence in commending those Institutions of which we can speak from immediate observation. And there is not a single school in the Church, whose Circular we have received, of which we have failed to speak as warmly and kindly as truth would permit.

And certainly we are justified in so speaking of an Institution which is under such control, as that designated by the names of its "Visitor" and "Rector." We cannot better commend it than by quoting the concluding words of the Circular.

"The Rector has seen so many instances in which the acquirements and accomplishments that wealth has purchased for children, have proved to them in a reverse of fortune, their best friend and their only support, that he often urges upon his pupils, as a powerful motive to diligence, the certain and honorable means of independence within their reach, and endeavors to make the standard of attainment among them, the fitness to become teachers of others. This indeed, in any circumstances, is the vocation of a woman in the most important and interesting relation which she sustains in life. SHE MUST BE A TEACHER—of children, whose minds receive from her their first, and most durable impressions, impressions that stamp their objects for time and for eternity, as good or evil, happy or wretched.

This consideration, the importance of which, it is impossible to exaggerate, is ever present to the mind of the Rector in his efforts for the moral and religious instruction of his pupils. In this department he finds the utmost benefit from the daily and Sunday services of the Chapel. In its 'blest seclusion from a jarring world,' its congregation consisting exclusively of the pupils and their teachers, with no person or object to tempt the eye or the thoughts to wander; in the simplicity and directness of its teachings adapted to the minds of children, often suggested by occurrences of interest among them, and always having systematic reference to their being built up in the faith and knowledge of the true God our Father, and of his Son Jesus Christ our Saviour, and of the Holy Ghost the comforter; in the order and regularity of its services, in which all bow the knee in prayer, and stand up in praise, or sit in the attitude of attentive listeners; in its audible and full responses proceeding from every mouth; in its chants and hymns sung by young voices which nature has sweetly attuned, and which daily practice, with the organ's solemn accompaniment has perfected; and in its celebration of the holy rites and sacraments of the church; are furnished aids for the forming and developing of religious character, which no other agency could supply.

Their happy influence is perceived in the harmony and affection which unite our children together as a family of sisters, in the general order and good conduct of the school, in the influence over the pupils of appeals to their better feelings and sense of duty, when admonition is necessary, and in the sincere consecration of themselves, by many, to the love and service of God in his holy Church. These are fruits of the discipline of St. Mary's School, which we ascribe with humble gratitude to 'the good hand of our God upon us;' or rather, looking to the future, they are seeds which she has sown, and which scattered with her pupils throughout the land, will produce, we may hope, in the present and in future generations, the abundant harvest of righteousness and peace."

RALEIGH, APRIL, 1848.

The thirteenth term of this School will commence on WEDNESDAY, the 7th of June, and continue till the 10th of November. The following term will commence November 11th, and continue till April 18th, 1849.

ST. MATTHEW'S HALL, FOR THE EDUCATION OF BOYS, ON CHRISTIAN PRINCIPLES, AT PORT COLDEN, WARREN COUNTY, N. J.—Of this School the Rev. P. L. Jaques is Rector and Proprietor. For further particulars see the advertisement.

We know the situation of this School well, and a better or safer one was never chosen for the purpose. We know also the Rector well, and this knowledge inspires the highest confidence in the care which will be given to the training of his pupils, not only in earthly knowledge, but in higher and better attainments.

Those parents who wish a quiet, secure, and happy abode for their children, where they will enjoy the advantage of sound and faithful instruction, and governed by mild and careful discipline, will find such a place, we are sure, in St. Matthew's Hall.

CHRIST CHURCH, DELAWARE CITY.—We regret that the notice of the laying of the corner stone of this Church, did not reach us in time for last week's paper. The ceremony was appointed for the 10th, and, as the day was propitious, so we trust was all connected with this good beginning of a noble work.

We understand that this is a promising and important field for the Church, and that in completing what has been so happily begun, the aid of more favored brethren would be well bestowed. The Parish is under the pastoral care of the Rev. Andrew F. Freeman.

We have several new works on hand, but must defer the notice of them for another week.

We must however mention that we have received "THE CHURCH REVIEW AND ECCLESIASTICAL REGISTER, Vol. 1, No. III, October, 1848. From the partial examination we have been compelled to give it, this seems an interesting and able number. The leading article "Kenrick on the Primacy," continues the subject with even greater learning and power than the first portion of this discussion already largely quoted from. We subjoin the table of contents.

Art. I. "Kenrick on the Primacy." Art. II, Origin and use of the Creeds. Art. III. Primacy of all England. Art. IV. Bishop Chase's Reminiscences. Art. V. Oliver Cromwell. Art. VI. Foreign Intelligence.

Although the last English Church papers have little news of general interest, we copy, with great satisfaction, the following from the English Churchman.

"With regard to a statement from a correspondent, which we published a fortnight since in this place, on the subject of a revision of the Prayer Book, the Record of Monday, in a very unnecessarily offensive article, makes the following announcement:—

'We assert, on authority not to be questioned, that there is not a shadow of foundation for the statement.'

We rejoice to hear it, and we sincerely hope that, as there is 'no shadow,' so there is no 'coming event' of the kind. The Record adds, that a false report of an intention to appoint a Suffragan Bishop for the Diocese of Canterbury was, some time since, "set on foot by the same parties." If this is intended to refer in any way to this journal, we beg to say that that report did not appear first, nor, we believe, at all, in our columns."

BISHOP DELANCEY'S EPISCOPAL ACTS.—The following is the summary of duties discharged by the Bishop of Western New York, for the last year, as set forth in his address to the Convention of the Diocese. We copy it from "the Gospel Messenger."

During the year, I have officiated in eighty-one organized Parishes of the Diocese, and in 10 places where the Church is not organized. In some few Parishes, I have officiated more than once.

I have baptized 4 infants, and 3 adults, in all 7.

Male Teacher Wanted.

A young man, who has been accustomed to the instruction of boys, and who would be willing to take charge of a class of a limited number, is wanted in New Castle, Delaware.

He must be a thorough English scholar, and capable of teaching the Mathematics and Classics, if required. The compensation, at first, may be moderate; but there is every prospect of such an increase, as will speedily justify a salary fully adequate to his support.

Address the Rector of Immanuel Church, New Castle, who, upon application, will furnish further particulars. Oct. 14

St. Matthew's Hall,

Port Colder, Warren County, New Jersey.

This Institution is beautifully located in the mountainous district of New Jersey, and the experience of four years has proved the situation to be remarkably healthy. The buildings, which have recently been improved, are large, convenient, and airy. Boys are received from five and six years old and upwards. The merits of this school are now well known, and speak for themselves. The Rector regards his pupils as his children, and gives his special attention to the formation of their correct moral and physical, as well as mental habits. Parents and guardians sending their sons and wards to the Hall, may rely on the faithfulness of the Rector and his assistants, in the discharge of their duties towards all committed to their care.

The terms, for Tuition, Board, Washing, &c., are $150 per year, or $75 per session of five months, payable always in advance. Books, French, German, Spanish, Music, Drawing and Painting, extra, at moderate charges.

The Winter Session opens on the first of November. For the admission of pupils, or further information, apply to the Rector.

FROM THE REV. DR. MORTON,

Rector of St. James' Church, Philadelphia.

REV. AND DEAR SIR:—

As you intimate that a line from me may aid you in your present undertaking, I cheerfully state that I feel perfect confidence in your capacity to instruct in all the branches usually taught in Classical Schools. Your highly respectable honour obtained at the University of Pennsylvania, and what I have personally known of you, being my reasons for such an impression. In your moral character and religious principles, I need not say I have entire faith, and if my warm wishes and personal efforts can aid you in your work you may fairly command the latter as you already possess the former.

FROM REV. WM. H. ODENHEIMER,

Rector of St. Peter's Church, Philadelphia.

From a personal knowledge of the Rev. Mr. Jones, I feel happy in being able to concur in all points with the above recommendation of Rev. Dr. Morton.

Lines by the Lake-side.

This placid lake, my gentle girl,
Be emblem of thy life,
As full of peace and purity,
As free from care and strife;
No ripple on its tranquil breast
That dies not with the day;
No pebble in its darkest depths
But quivers in its ray.

And, see, how every glorious form,
And pageant of the skies,
Reflected from its glassy face,
A mirrored image lies:
So, be thy spirit ever pure,
To God, to virtue given;
And thought and word and action bear!
The imagery of Heaven.

The Sunday Slide.

"I do hope we shall have plenty of ice now," cried Dickey West, as he ran down the lane on Saturday evening, after playing at snow-balls on the common. "Look, Joe! the snow does not stick to my shoes a bit now, as it did a while ago. It freezes hard, sure enough!"

He kicked up the snow as he ran along, and it flew before him in the cold wind. "It would not do for snow-balls now!"

Joe was cantering through the snow behind, with his hands thrust into his pockets, and panting with open mouth. He laughed to see Dickey's breath like smoke in clear frosty air.

"Anybody could tell it was freezing," said he; "for there was no making a fresh snow-ball, even before sunset. There will be fine sliding on that large pond on the common in a day or two."

"I had not one slide all last winter, because of my 'bad foot,'" said Dick: "those chilblains! I hope I shall have none this year. I say Joe, there's nothing in this world I like so well as sliding."

"The frosts seem to last no time this winter," said Joe, as they walked on quietly, being now out of breath. "I wonder whether this will be for more than a day."

"And to-morrow is Sunday! We must have a good slide on Monday after school!—What's the matter now?"

Joe gave him a pull. "Look, Dick! there's the parson coming round the corner, and Miss Ford."

The two little boys drew on one side, pulled off their caps, and made their bows.

"Well, my lads," said Mr. Ford, "how do you like the cold winter?"

The little boys grinned merrily. That was their answer and Mr. Ford understood it.

"How do you like the snow-balls?" said Miss Ford, smiling; and then they grinned still more.

After Mr. Ford and his daughter had passed on, she said something to her father, and they looked back.

"Now remember boys," said Mr. Ford, "that to-morrow is Sunday. Remember there must be no sliding on the pond, to make you late for church. No reward-tickets and the cane besides, for those who do!"

"Remind the others of it," added Miss Ford.—"Don't forget what happened last year. Keep sliding for Monday."

They walked on; and the boys having taken breath, scrambled over a gate, and ran across a field or two through the snow to their cottages on Low Green.

Joe ran in to his mother, Widow Deane, having rubbed the snow from his shoes upon the old broom which stood by the door, though there was not much to be rubbed. Then he went into the shed to help his mother to chop up some wood for the fire next morning, and to get everything ready for Sunday. He was very handy, and always got up early on Sunday morning to light the fire and set on the kettle, that his mother who had hard work in the week going out to wash, might not have to get up in the dark.

When he told her how hard it was freezing, she said she knew it, for she had walked over the pool from Farmer Reeves's, instead of going round by the road; so she knew the ice would bear.

"But now, Joe, remember last year," said she:—"you got into trouble one Sunday about that pond on the common. You are a bigger boy now, and must mind what you are about."

Joe told her how he had met the parson, and said that would help him to remember. In his heart he had some doubts about Dickey, who was said commonly to be "a terrible one for the ice;" but he said nothing of that to his mother.

Next morning it was cold and brisk as any day that January. After Joe had lighted the fire, and seen the furze and twigs blaze up, the little lattice-window was still sparkling with frost—as you may have seen it, in the shape of leaves and trees—and when the sun shone first upon it, it was as pretty a sight as you need wish to see. The icicles hung like long sticks of glass from the thatch of the cottage; Joe pulled them off as he went out to church, put them in his mouth as if it had been barley-sugar, and then cried out and laughed when his teeth tingled, as if he had played off a good trick upon himself.

He called for Dickey West and his sister, as he went by their cottage at the other end of the green. They all lived so far from the church that they had to make haste, so as to get into the school-room, which was close by, in time to have their names called. This fine morning, however, they had started sooner than usual, and had more time, as they thought, before them. So when they got to the open road, which led up the common, they walked slow to take breath.—Several children joined them from the edge of the common, some going on before, and some straggling behind.

At last they came to the pond. There was a fine long slide already made.

"Who can have been there already?" said Jenny West. Joe supposed it was the boys who had come there to make a hole at the end of the pond to water the horses.

Some of the boys got a slide as they went, and then hurried on. The girls put one foot on the smooth ice to feel it, and then turned back into the road. They were rather sorry afterwards; for when stepping through the snow off the road it worked into their shoes; and very cold their feet were in church, when that snow was melted, and soaked through their stockings.

Dickey said "he must have one slide more." Joe followed him. But just as he was going to start, he thought either of Mr. Ford, or his mother, or of both; and he pulled Dickey back.

"Oh, come along—never mind sliding now—don't you hear the bells going?"

"Come, Dickey, come!" said his little sister.

"I shall have one more slide—as if I could not catch you up, every one of you! I dare say I never ran up the common when you were all forced to walk?"

"Not in the snow, Dickey—do come! There again! don't you hear the last chime?" said Jenny. "Look! there's old Mrs. Thompson—she is as good as a clock, you know."

"And don't I know that Mrs. Thompson sets out half an hour before anybody else, that she may sit and rest before church begins? Have not we heard that a thousand times? Don't keep on pulling me—I'll follow you, I tell you."

Jenny stopped a moment longer, and then ran on. Joe still stood there. He had no mind to stay after Mrs. Thompson, who was indeed as good as a clock, was gone by; but he could not bear to leave Dickey behind.

"Hark, Dickey! look! sure enough there's the squire's coach coming up the hill—indeed there is!"

Dickey looked and saw it. He knew he was wrong, but he would not take warning.

"Well, what care I for the squire's coach?" was his answer. "They always go early, that there may be time to put up the horses. And I can get on as fast as those old coach horses any day." But remembering that though the horses could not tell of them, somebody in the coach might, he got off the ice at last, and ran up the hill with Joe.

Joe now felt quite easy; but it did not last long.—From the common, a road led to the village and the church. By the road was a ditch, wide in some places. Most unfortunately it was frozen over, and a slide was already made in one part. Dickey was on it in a moment, and poor Joe in despair.

"It's all up with Dickey now!" thought he. "Dick, Dick! there's the little bell going!" and off he set himself at full speed. It was well for him that it was not the last bell when the clergyman went into church. By running hard he reached school in time to answer to his name, and go with the others into church. So all was safe with him. But where was Dickey West?

Dick's conscience was now asleep. He went on sliding till he was tired, first hoping no questions would be asked, and then thinking one absence could not signify at Easter, when the rewards for regular attendance would be given. He chose to fancy all sorts of impossible things, rather than to suppose he should get into trouble for such a bad thing as playing truant in church-time.

At last he saw two or three red cloaks at a distance. He knew the service was over. And now he might have asked himself what had he gained? The sport was over and the difficulties must now begin.

He shrunk away down a narrow side lane, that he might not be seen; he knew it led towards home. The snow had drifted in high heaps on each side of it, and he had hard matter to flounder through. At last it ended at the gate of a field. He struck across this, and had a hedge to climb. He reached the top of the bank with some labor, by catching at a branch. It was dead, and gave way with his pull. Dick rolled backwards into the ditch, first into the snow, and next, as his weight broke the ice, into the water below. He scrambled out, he could hardly tell how; and then fishing his cap out of the snow, wandered round the field till he found a stile. This he climbed over, and plunged knee deep into a drift of snow on the other side. He was hot and tired, and forced to sit down on a log of wood to rest. But before long he felt all in a chill, and plunged forwards again, panting across the snowy fields. His shoes were full of wet, and his feet smarted and tingled sadly.

Now all this would have been nothing worth minding to a boy who was doing his work, or, at any rate, was doing no harm. It would have been something to talk and laugh about afterwards by the fireside. But it is quite different to any one with a bad conscience—a bad conscience takes the spirit out of both boy and man.

Dick wandered on tired and hungry, till at last he got home to Low Green. The Wests were a large family, and Dick's father at this time was laid up with the rheumatism. His mother had enough to do with nursing her husband, and all her work besides. She said she had no time to see to the children's going to school in time. She asked no questions. His eldest sister guessed there was something wrong; but she gave him a bit of something for his dinner, and took no more notice. It was now snowing; and none of the family went to afternoon church. Whether they could have done it, it is not our business now to inquire.

In the mean time Joe wondered what Dick had done. He himself had brought his dinner, and so had Jenny West, and some others. They had leave to eat it in the school-room, and then to run out and warm themselves. When the other children came into school at two o'clock Joe was afraid to ask any of them about Dick. He wished, if possible, not to tell of him. But after church he could not help hearing that there was a talk of somebody who had been seen on the ice in church-time that morning—a little boy in a cloth cap. Mrs. Lewis had gone out of church with the young woman from the poor-house, who had fits. As she led her home, she remembered seeing a boy on the broad ditch in Church Lane. But she was minding the young woman, and did not give it a thought at the time,—at least to see who it was.

Jenny West said to Joe, as they went home:

"You know about Dick; but don't tell of him, Joey. He will be beat, I know, besides losing his ticket."

"That I won't, Jenny, unless I am asked. I hope I shall not be—I will keep out of the way of it."

"What's that about?" said Widow Deane, who overtook them, and gave Joe her big Prayer-book to carry. Jenny was forced to tell Widow Deane the truth, who was at first anxious about Joe, and now praised him for having kept out of the scrape.

Joe turned red, and said, "I did take one slide."—He remembered he had been punished for it last year, and he did not wish to be praised now; so he began skipping and running towards home.

He hoped he should not be asked about Dick, and thought he would keep out of the way of questions as much as possible. And then he thought about to-morrow, and the pleasure of sliding between school-hours, without feeling that he was doing wrong, or having any punishment to fear.

Now he had a nice warm fire to enjoy, and tea with his mother. They always had these comforts on Sundays, though not always in the week. When tea was over, Joe got one of the candles which his mother made herself with the rushes which he pulled from the marsh; he stuck it in the socket over the mantle-piece. Then old Master Wilson, who could not read himself, and had besides little fire of his own, came in as usual from next door. Widow Green and Joe read aloud the lessons for that Sunday, and some chapters besides. Joe said the collect, and repeated what he had learned about that and the Epistle and gospel at school. Old Master Wilson sighed, and wished he had been able to get schooling when he was a young chap like Joe. And then went on talking how things used to be when he was young, till it was bed time.—Joe scrambled up the ladder to bed. After saying his prayers he looked out,—all was white and frosty.

But in the morning, before he was well awake, he fancied he heard something drop, drop, from the roof. "I hope," said he, still half asleep, "it is not the old story of the snow melting upon mother's bed, as it did last year; but she can have mine, and it won't hurt me."

Being now quite awake, he jumped up, and called to his mother to know how it was.

"No, no, Joey, it does not come through. But it is thawing, sure enough."

Then Joe first recollected there would be an end of his sport on the ice. He came down rather dismal, thinking how dirty and wet everything would soon look.

He splashed through the melting snow to school, and looked sorrowfully at every ditch and pool. There was plenty of ice still left, to be sure, but it was all melted at the top—Much of it was floating in water. It was hard work getting on through the slippery and melting snow; but he reached school in time. There was Dick West in his place.

Joe set to his work as usual; and towards twelve o'clock he was so busy with his writing, that he did not hear the beginning of what now took place.

When he had put away his writing book and slate, and looked towards the master's desk, he guessed how it was.

There stood Dick, looking frightened and puzzled; the master grave and displeased.

"Somebody must have told of Dick, I hope they won't ask me. I would not be in his place now for something. But I wish he could get off. I remember last year." These were Joe's thoughts. Who told of Dick he could not make out; but the master seemed to know all about it, and he feared Dick had been denying it.

"Who set out with him to school?" said the master.

No answer.

Joe shrunk down among his companions, or at least tried to do so.

"Who lives in the house next to West's?" again asked the master.

"Old John Wilson—and Widow Deane—Joe Deane"—cried several voices.

"Joe Deane, stand up!"

Poor Joe obeyed with tears in his eyes. He saw the cane, and knew what must follow. To say the truth, he had felt that cane himself, so he could well feel for Dick. He stood a few moments—what a long time it seemed!—while the master looked at him. He seemed to know what was in Joe's thoughts for he said, "Well I do not want you to tell of another more than need be. I know enough without asking Joe Deane. West it is no use denying it. You are to be punished first for playing truant, and making it far worse by doing it in service-time. Besides you have told me a lie about your bad foot, to excuse yourself. Hold out your hand!"

"Oh, forgive me, Sir, please forgive me! I'll never do so again—never," said Dick, with something between a cry and a howl.

"Hold out your hand!" was the only answer. And then followed two or three severe cuts on the hand.

Dick long remembered the pain; anybody would who had received such cuts on the hand as Dick received that day. He cried bitterly. He was ordered to stay in school instead of going out with the rest, and this for a fortnight; so there was little play for Dick all that time, you may suppose.

The master called afterwards at West's to speak about it. His mother said he was an unlucky boy, always getting into trouble, and she hoped he would be well beat if he did so again. Poor Jenny cried; and Joe was very sorry, though he said nothing to him. Nor did Dick ever name it to Joe; but I believe he long had an uncomfortable feeling when he passed the pond on the common; and instead of slighting Jenny's warnings, he was very well satisfied afterwards to keep the road to church along with her.

As for Joe, the frost came once more, and I believe he had his sport upon the ice before the winter was over; but if there had been no more ice that year, whose place would you rather have been in? Would you have been Dick West with his morning of pleasure, his caning, and, worst of all, the sin of keeping from church upon your conscience,—or Joe, who had done his duty, and shunned temptation, and could go home cheerfully on Sunday evening without having any such bad conduct on his mind?

Edith Aubrey; or, The Wet Sunday.*

A pleasing little tract under this title has been forwarded to the office of the Society. Permission has been asked, and obtained, to reprint it; and it is now given, in an abridged form, with the hope that it may be found both interesting and instructive, especially to the young.

It was Sunday morning. The rain fell in torrents, the wind moaned dismally in the chimney, whilst ever and anon a fitful gust sent the rain-drops pattering against the drawing-room windows. Little Edith Aubrey often cast a wistful and sorrowing glance at the desolate scene without, as she sat in her own pet chair by the warm and blazing fire, closely enveloped in a large shawl; for Edith was that day an invalid, and strictly forbidden to leave the genial atmosphere of the drawing-room. "Oh, mamma!" at length she exclaimed, "how sorry I am to see this wet Sunday morning; must I really stay from church to-day? I have not missed church for so many, many months; I really think it would not hurt me to go, if well wrapped up in my warm cloak and furs."

"My dearest Edith!" replied mamma, "you know the doctor has prohibited your quitting the house while this influenza continues; and my Edith cannot wish to be a rebellious patient."

"No, indeed, mamma! but it does so grieve me to be absent from church; and tears came into Edith's eyes as she spoke. Her mother gently approached, and said in the kindest manner—"Yes, my love! I know it grieves you, and it is right it should grieve you; I hope it always will grieve you to be absent from God's house of prayer; but remember, Edith, whose prisoner you are. It is not the influenza, nor the doctor's order, nor am anxious regard for your health; all these are only the means, simple instruments in God's hand; but it is God Himself who sends you this little chastisement for your own improvement, or to correct some fault, which, perhaps unknown to yourself, may lurk in your heart."

"But, mamma, it must be right to wish to go to church."

"Assuredly, my love; but, reflect for one moment;—you take delight in attending church; it is a real pleasure to you;—it may be, with such happy feelings, you have rather been gratifying your own wishes, instead of looking simply to God's will; and now He sends you an illness to detain you at home, you not only mourn, but—I know it is so—there are murmurs swelling in your heart; oh, my child! remember it is His will that imprisons you, and pray that you may learn to bow submissively to that most holy will, even when it demands the temporary sacrifice of some of the purest and noblest aspirations of your soul."

"Edith remained silent, and bowed her head in humble thought. Her mamma continued—"If thus it grieves you to miss your customary attendance at church for one Sabbath, learn to think with pity on the poor emigrants, who, in the far wilds of Canada, Australia, and other of our Colonies, are, unhappily, too often deprived of the ministrations of the Church, not for one Sabbath only, but for months, aye, sometimes even for years together."

"Poor emigrants! how desolate their Sundays must be without a church to attend! But why do they go away from this country, mamma?"

"Poverty, Edith, stern poverty it is which obliges them to quit their native land, to abandon the home of childhood, the hills and valleys endeared by so many sweet recollections, and, more than all, the village church, where once themselves, and in after years their children, received in Baptism a Heavenly Father's blessing—the altar where, one by one, the elder children, as they had received the holy rite of Confirmation, were severally taught to kneel beside their parents, in humble faith and adoration of the present Saviour, whose "flesh is meat indeed," and whose "blood is drink indeed." And the iron hand of poverty forces them from these hallowed privileges, over the dark blue waters, far away from the sound of the bell of the village church;—and they penetrate the trackless forest, and raise the log-hut to shelter the helpless children; and the trees are felled, and the once tangled brake is changed into the fruitful field, and the log-hut gives place to the neat farm-house;—but where is the Sabbath-bell?—where is the village church?—Oh, that we, in favoured England, would arouse ourselves, that the ears of the poor exiles may once more be gladdened with the sweet bell of the church of their fatherland!"

"But, mamma, are there not churches at the Mission stations?"

"Yes, there are churches at those bright spots in the desert, and thrice happy are they who dwell within reach of the holy services; but many of the settlers are miles, sometimes hundreds of miles away, and never hear the voice of the Church through her ordained Ministers, except when some Missionary Bishop or Pastor comes far over field and flood, cheerfully encountering innumerable hardships, to brighten for one Sabbath-day the home of the lone emigrants, and carry the Sacraments and Ordinances of the Church to the solitary places of the wilderness."

"The good Bishops and Missionaries must meet with many difficulties and inconveniences in such long journeys, do they not, mamma?"

"Indeed they do, Edith; but it is love—love to their Saviour, who suffered so much to redeem His Church, and love for his scattered sheep, and for the poor benighted heathen who are yet without the fold—that enables them joyfully to undergo fatigues and dangers from which we in England should shrink in dismay. There is the river to swim across—the prairie or forest-tract to be pursued;—there are dangers of the deep besetting the Missionary boat;—there is the midnight and tented encampment, where, notwithstanding daily journeyings, the morning and evening services are regularly offered;—and, above all, in the case of the solitary Missionary in a pagan land, there is the loneliness. And yet the Missionary is not alone—his SAVIOUR-GOD is with him."

"Oh, mamma! I wish I could do anything to help the cause of Missions, and build churches for the poor emigrants!"

"You can do something, Edith."

"How, mamma? Oh, pray tell me!"

"You can go among your friends, and collect for the great Missionary Societies of the Church, which aid our Colonial Bishops, and send Missionaries to all our Colonies, whether in Asia, Africa, America, or the Australasian Isles—which despatch Missionaries to the heathen of every clime. We should aid these excellent Societies. From your own little allowance, my Edith, you can spare at least one shilling a year for them."

"Oh, yes, mamma! but that is so little;—I must consider; yes—that will be the way; when I see any thing very nice, or very pretty, and I wish to buy it, I must think, Now that is not necessary: I should like to have it, but it will only amuse me or give me pleasure for a very little while—I shall be just as well without it—I will not buy it—I will save the money for the Missionaries: that will be a much better way of spending it; for then it will produce fruit that will last for ever—fruit that will ripen in heaven."

"That is my own dear Edith! It is true a shilling per annum will not do much in itself; but only think, if every individual in the land could and would give even that small sum annually, how the cause of Missions would flourish! And though you begin with a shilling, you will not end there; as your means increase, the shilling will become half-a-crown, that will increase to a crown, the crown will become ten shillings, that will change to a sovereign, and so on, indefinitely, according to the means which God may graciously give you. And now I must leave you, Edith, for the church-bells are sounding for morning service; but remember, there is one other way in which you may assist the Missionaries, and a way more effectual than any—one without which all the rest will fail, and be useless."

"Oh! what is that, mamma?"

"You may pray to God for them—pray that he will graciously bless their labours—pray for the out-pouring of the Spirit—pray that the Saviour, in whose name you plead, may work with them and through them."

"And Edith was left alone. While her mamma was gone to church she thought and prayed on all that had been said; and, what was better, she afterwards practised it. She gave from her own little purse; she had her little collecting cards; and though at first some turned coldly from her, yet her friends and young companions soon began to feel interested when she read to them some of the touching details recorded in the Quarterly Papers, and other Missionary publications, of each Society; and she eventually became the humble instrument of laying a foundation of Missionary zeal in many a youthful breast—a zeal, whose precious and richly multiplying benefits are beyond calculation.

"And now my little readers, did not Edith Aubrey make a good use of her wet Sunday? And will not you do the same? The wet Sunday is presented for your imitation! 'Go and do ye likewise.'"

The Parson.

PART I.

"Think ye that we excuse ourselves unto you? we speak before God in Christ; but we do all things, dearly beloved, for your edifying."—2 Cor. xii. 19.

THE PARSON! Dear to us, still, is the old-fashioned and once honoured name. Neither the mockeries of the scoffer, the sneers of the self-styled enlightened, nor the coarse irreverence of the blasphemous and the brutalized, have been able to affect our views of this old, English, and good man's title. We still couple it with many national, affecting, and holy associations, though amidst the wayward imaginations, and the wild storms of party strife, it has been too often made the mark of the bitter sneer, and of reckless and profligate calumny. For our part, we shudder with fear, as well as disgust, when we hear a poor ignorant man taught to pronounce as a by-word and nickname that title which ought to be a term of comfort and love—to remind him of the messenger of his God, of a blessing to society, and of his own best and most important guide and friend.

We know, that in olden time, that name used to be pronounced, everywhere, by plain, honest, and faithful Christians, with love and respect:

The service past, around the pious man,
With ready zeal, each honest rustic ran:
E'en children follow'd with endearing wile,
And pluck'd his gown, to share the good man's smile:
His ready smile a parent's warmth exprest,
Their welfare pleas'd him, and their cares distress;
To them his heart, his love, his griefs, were giv'n,
But all his serious thoughts had rest in heav'n.

GOLDSMITH.

And we trust that, notwithstanding the attempts to destroy this feeling, it is not only not destroyed, but on the increase.

But, no doubt, many of our readers have seen—in times before the poor man gloated over the sedition, malice, and blasphemy, which are now so abundantly ministered to him with his beer and spirits, to inflame his worst passions—many we say, have seen the honest labourer, or mechanic, with his best Sunday attire, greet the PARSON with a bow, while kindly looks and a reverent manner bespoke, at once, affection for his person, and veneration of his office. Humble, indeed, and poor, these men were: perhaps, the self-sufficient will, with a sneer, tell us, that they were also unlearned and unenlightened. But they were CHRISTIANS. They were men whom any country might prize and honour. Plain and humble as they were, they were dear in His estimation who "weigheth the hearts." And the day will come, when many a sceptic, who affected to look down with contempt or pity on these poor people, as weak, ignorant, and unenlightened, will discover that "the wisdom of this world is foolishness" in the sight of God. This was known in ancient days; and a wise man has left on record, for our instruction, how the self-satisfied philosopher may have his eyes opened too late, to the bubble by which he has been deceived, and thus, in anguish of spirit, confess the true wisdom of the religious-minded, however low his estate, or slender his learning.

"This was he whom we had sometimes in derision, and a proverb of reproach: we fools accounted his life madness, and his end to be without honour: how is he numbered among the children of God, and his lot is among the saints!"—Wisdom v. 3-5.

Serious and religious-minded men, such as these, could not bear to utter the name of PARSON, without sentiments of reverence, much less with insult. It was the character of Englishmen, that they loved him, because they loved their religion, in their hearts: therefore, they were anxious to give him every outward show of love in their manner. And herein, we repeat, they displayed marks of a higher wisdom, than that flippancy and self-conceit, which usurp the names of enlightenment and liberality; which, like Korah and his associates of old, "take too much upon themselves;" and refuse alike to the rulers of the state, and to the ministers of religion, that deference which is due to them, for the sake of man, as well as by the authority of God. The reverence paid by the Christian to his PARSON, is not offered to the latter merely as a man, but to his sacred office, and his blessed and useful calling. It is offered as not unto man, but as unto the Lord—unto that Almighty God whose servant he is—that dear Saviour whose message he bears—that Holy Spirit of grace and truth, whose means of light, conversion, and salvation he dispenses.

Reader, whosoever thou art—if thou hast uttered the word PARSON in hatred, scorn or derision, be assured thou art under not only a deception, but a most dangerous deception, and art led away by the evil one, from the things which concern thy peace. That the infidel, the profligate, the apostate, the godless—that the enemies of human tranquillity, and of all religion, should use the term PARSON as a by-word, is at least consistent; but that the religious, and the thoughtful, should follow their example, is no less inconsistent and disgraceful, than it is wicked and dangerous. For only consider—who and what is the Parson? What is he, that his name should be to the well-wisher of his country, much less to the Christian, a jest, or a reproach?

PART II.

"I will very gladly spend and be spent for you."—1 Cor. xii. 15.

WHO AND WHAT IS HE?

THIS question, with which we concluded the last chapter, may apply to THE PARSON, first, as to his value in a social point of view, and with respect to his influence over the temporal welfare of the community, particularly the poor. Secondly, in respect to the character with which he is invested by the hand of God and his influence on the spiritual interest of mankind.

Who then, and what, is THE PARSON, as mere members of society, and putting his sacred character and ministrations out of the question? THE PARSON is one of an educated order of men, placed in almost every parish, the example of civilized habits, and promoting the moral improvement of his neighbours.

THE PARSON is the means of setting into motion, (both by teaching the Gospel virtues, and by his own personal influence,) and of collecting, for the benefit of the poor, many charities of their neighbours, which otherwise would never come into action. If the poor man will only use his own observation, he will generally see those persons in the parish most "ready to give and glad to distribute," who are the most constant hearers of the PARSON, and with whom he is on the most friendly terms.

THE PARSON is, by his office, (if not by his studies and pursuits,) the poor man's friend; he is in nine cases out of ten, the first, if not the only individual, to whom the poor man, in distress, comes for advice, comfort and relief.

THE PARSON is the watchful guardian of the poor man's day of rest, the Sabbath. We say the poor man's day, speaking of it now only in a temporal point of his view. It is his day, his only day of rest. Without it, his week of labour would be seven days; but his week's wages would probably be no more, perhaps less.

THE PARSON is the teacher of order and loyalty, the rebuker of strife and disobedience, intemperance and impurity. He thus encourages those dispositions which preserve the general peace and welfare of society, and prevent the poor man from getting into outrage and trouble. He checks those vices and practices which tend to domestic misery. The more he is heard, so much the more members of a family will learn to bear and forbear: children will be obedient; husbands will not squander, in drunkenness, the subsistence of their wives and children; wives will not be faithless and perverse: in a word, evil, and consequently misery, will be diminished. Though he cannot entirely prevent, he does in a considerable degree lessen, these sources of misery.

These are but inferior, and secondary claims of the PARSON on the poor man's veneration and love. They are as nothing, compared with those high and holy claims which we shall have to set forth in our next answer to the question. But with respect even to these, what is there that should induce the poor man, or any good man, to use the name of THE PARSON, with any other feelings than those of the highest respect and love? What folly can induce the poor man to fall into the snare of the infidel or the fool, and use the name of his best friend, his most natural, sometimes his only, friend, as if it were the name of his bitterest enemy?

It is one of the greatest delusions that ever was practised upon the weak and thoughtless. It is a complete surrender of common sense to ridicule and sneers.

And we have only to add, that we wish the poor, and the people in general, would only use their own observation, instead of being guided by the sneers of the thoughtless or the profane, and see who it is, in times of difficulty and danger, is the first to step forward and take the lead—who is the chief labourer in every charitable scheme, and then ask what the poor, or what society could profit, by the removal of THE PARSON.

PART III.

"O Son of man, I have set thee a watchman unto the house of Israel."—Ezek. xxxiii. 7.

WHO AND WHAT IS HE?

In our second chapter, the question "Who and what is the PARSON," that the name should be uttered with other feelings than love and reverence? was asked and answered, with relation only to the temporal blessings, of which his office is the source to society in general, and to the poor especially. We now proceed to ask, and answer it, upon much higher grounds—upon grounds, which will be viewed with serious attention, and laid deeply to heart, by every man who can reflect that he is a sinner—that he has an immortal soul—that he is to be judged by the Lord God—and that he has had salvation offered to him only through Christ Jesus. We shall answer the question now, no longer with reference to frail man, and his fleeting interests, but with regard to God, and out of his Holy Word. Who and what is the PARSON? Hear, from God's Word; hear how the Holy Spirit himself describes him.

Who and what is the PARSON?

The PARSON is the servant of the Most High God, which sheweth unto us the way of salvation.

"The same followed Paul and us, and cried, saying, These men are the servants of the most high God, which shew unto us the way of salvation."—Acts xvi. 17.

The PARSON bears Christ's commission—acts under his authority—in his presence—and with his support.

"And Jesus came and spake unto them, saying, All power is given unto me in heaven and in earth. Go ye, therefore, and teach all nations, baptizing them in the name of the Father, and of the Son, and of the Holy Ghost: Teaching them to observe all things whatsoever I have commanded you: and lo, I am with you always, even unto the end of the world. Amen."—Matt. xxviii. 18—20.

The PARSON comes in the name and in the work of Christ; whose despiseth him, despiseth his Lord.

"He that heareth you heareth me; and he that despiseth you, despiseth me; and he that despiseth me despiseth him that sent me."—Luke x. 16.

The PARSON is an Ambassador for Christ, charged with his most affectionate and all-important message of reconciliation to an offended God.

"Now then we are ambassadors for Christ, as though God did beseech you by us; we pray you in Christ's stead, be ye reconciled to God."—2 Cor. v. 20.

The PARSON is a steward of the mysteries of God, to set forth his will and his word—to administer his holy sacraments with all their precious benefits.

"Let a man so account of us, as of the ministers of Christ, and stewards of the mysteries of God."—1 Cor. iv. 1.

The PARSON bears a commission and authority which, under the direction of the Holy Ghost, speaking through St. Paul, has been handed down, by the Church, in regular and ordained succession, from the times of the Apostles to the present day.

"And the things which thou hast heard of me among many witnesses, the same commit thou to faithful men, who shall be able to teach others also."—2 Tim. ii. 2. (Compare Acts xiv. 23.)

The PARSON is ordained to watch over your souls; and not only to watch, but to give, on the great day of judgment, a most terrible account—terrible as well to him as to you.

"Obey them that have the rule over you, and submit yourselves; for they watch for your souls, as they that must give an account, that they may do it with joy and not with grief: for that is unprofitable for you."—Heb. xii. 17. (Compare Ezekiel iii. 17. and xxxiii. 7, 8.)

The PARSON needs not only our reverence and love, but also our most hearty and earnest prayers for divine strength and assistance.

"Finally, brethren, pray for us that the word of the Lord may have free course, and be glorified, even as it is with you."—2 Thess. iii. 1.

Surely then, the name which describes a person bearing an office so honoured, and involved in a responsibility so awful, is one of the last which a good and reflecting man will pronounce with levity and sneers, or load with rash and uncharitable calumnies. How awful the consideration, that by so doing you may impede him in his usefulness; and that the blood of those, so lost, may be required at your hands, instead of his! Nay even if the wretched man, like Balaam of old, should forget the obligations of his holy calling, and wickedly act unworthily of his profession, will the true Christian dare to laugh and sneer over one who has stumbled on the brink of a precipice?—to boast of his fall, and make it an occasion of slander against the whole body to which belongs? Oh no—the Christian will still always bear in mind, the sacred office which the PARSON holds—he will reverence that office, even though, perhaps, here and there, (as exceptions, necessarily arising from the corruption of human nature, and as spots rendered blacker, and more conspicuous, by the general brightness and purity of the body in which they are found,) some cases must occur, in which he cannot reverence the man who holds it. Yet he will not delight to sneer at him—he will not be found making him the jest of the beer-house and tap-room. He will tremble for him, and pity him. He will not echo the tale of his failure—he will not exaggerate, but strive to cast a veil over his very faults; and breathe many a fervent prayer, that God may turn him to the right way.

But, if this be the case with the PARSON, when forgetful of his hallowed duties, with what feelings ought he to be regarded, when he acts up to them, and blesses mankind by a conscientious discharge of those high and holy functions with which the Word of God has invested him? Here we take a yet higher range for our question; and it is so important, that we shall appropriate to it a separate chapter. We shall conclude this with the simple, but solemn request of St. Paul,—"Brethren, pray for us."—1 Thess. v. 25.

PART IV.

"See that ye refuse not him that speaketh."—Heb. xii. 25.

WHO AND WHAT IS HE?

We answered this question in two former chapters by shewing—I st, What the mere circumstances of the PARSON's office and situation lead, we must say, almost compel him to be, with respect to the civilization, and temporal peace and happiness of society in general, and of the poor particularly:—2dly, in what light he is represented by the Word of God. In both these cases, we assumed nothing from the virtues, the intelligence, the uprightness, the faith, and the zeal of the individuals, who might happen to fill the office. We regarded simply the office—its tendency—its importance, and its sanctify. Nay, we put the supposition, that if the person invested with it should be even negligent and unfaithful in his sacred charge—still, we contended, and feel confident that we proved, to any dispassionate and reflecting mind, that, even when a guilty wretch should be found disgracing this holy and responsible profession, neither Christian charity, nor sober reason, much less the God of charity and of judgment, could approve of our making him the subject of sneers and hatred; or the instrument of exciting the prejudices and hostility of the ignorant against the sacred and useful order to which he belongs, and of bringing into contempt the religion of which he is a minister.

We come, now, to a still higher and stronger position. We will suppose the individual, holding this holy and useful office, to be one (and many, nay, a large majority of such there are,) who feels the awful obligations and responsibilities of it—strives and studies to qualify himself for it—and heartily prays for, and obtains, that heavenly grace, which, as far as human infirmities and corruption will permit, enables him to act up to it. What is the PARSON then? "The sum of our whole labours," says Hooker, "in this kind, is to honour God, and to save man." Is it possible to imagine a more valuable benefactor to his race—a more useful member of society—one, whom to obstruct in his salutary influence and blessed labour, can be more sinful, or whom to deride and calumniate, can be more ungrateful and dangerous? Now let us apply these general reflections to the PARSON doing his duty, in some of those particulars of his office and character, which we have mentioned in the former chapters.

His motives of action are to be not the desire of pecuniary advantage, but a sense of his own awful obligations, a fervent love of his flock, and a zeal for their welfare and salvation. This will give greater weight to his ministrations and offices, and ought, when he discharges his duties well, to be an additional incentive to their affection and support. Let us, then, view the PARSON, acting according to his profession, in some of those circumstances and characters, in which, in our former chapters, we represented him.

We described him, first, in his temporal character, as fixed to a certain district, and mixed up with the welfare and interests of it—as the friend to the poor—the supporter, and purifier of society. But on these points of his usefulness we shall not now enlarge, as our space will not permit us to do justice to even his spiritual usefulness. We will only observe, he is, generally, a man of liberal education, whose knowledge is chastened and guided by religion; whose local attachments and interests are in his parish; who is acquainted with the habits of the poor; who, at the same time, moves in the society of the rich; and who forms, between these separate classes, one of the few connecting links which yet remain. He can assist the necessities, but he will not pander to the prejudices, of the poor: he is not envious of, nor hostile to, the rich: but he knows, and feels the duty, which binds him to defend the poor. He will not shrink from doing this when required, but he will not delude them with vain hopes, nor encourage them to discontent and disobedience. Peace and order, justice and contentment, loyalty and religion, he will uphold, regardless of man's praise or censure, because what he doth, he doth as "unto the Lord." But we must proceed to view him in his spiritual character.

Behold the PARSON, then, doing his duty, as he ought, in the reading-desk. Shall we sneer at him there? His earnest and solemn voice utters the service of the Church—proclaims the word of God—man's Judge and Saviour. Those tones of love, authority and devotion, express not feelings engaged in worldly matters. It is the servant-shepherd calling the sheep to the fold of the great and universal Shepherd. That cheering, that hope-inspiring declaration, that the awakened penitent shall see his soul alive, and that, if we confess our sins there is a faithful One to forgive us our sins, and cleanse us from all unrighteousness, is God's own word, and declared by God's own authorized minister, the PARSON. Will ye sneer at him when thus employed?

Will you sneer, when again he follows up this important declaration, in the persuasive language of the Church, and with arguments, and entreaty, and authority, urges you to act upon it, and "accompany him with a pure heart and humble voice unto the throne of the heavenly grace?"

Will you sneer at the PARSON, when he points, and leads, the way to this confession—when at once your pastor and your fellow-sinner, he humbles himself with you before our "Almighty and most merciful Father," acknowledges our common sins, and claims God's gracious promises, "declared unto mankind in Christ Jesus our Lord?" Would you dare when thus employed, to hold up the PARSON, to the assembled sinners, as a laughing-stock or an enemy? Or would you rise from your bended knees, and from the supplications of lost sinners, to jeer him, when in the name and by the authority of his and your Lord, he declares and pronounces the absolution and remission of sins, which in your behalf, and with your consenting voices he has just implored? Where, then, in the course of this service, can you find him a subject of mockery? Is it when the deep and heartfelt prayer for spiritual strength and protection burst from his lips? Is it when he remembers, and asks the blessings of God's providence? Is it when the name and the merits of your common Redeemer, who died for us miserable sinners, are invoked to strengthen your united petitions? Is it when the word of God, from his lips, tells of providences and warnings, of mercies, of hopes, of blessings, of fears, of dangers, and of lurking foes; of condemnation and pardon, wrath and forgiveness, guilt and atonement, death's triumph and Christ's victory? Is it when the Psalmist's lamentations and rejoicings, trials and deliverances, bring before us the lively picture of man's varied pilgrimage, and the only light to which he can safely turn to direct his steps, and guide him in the way of peace and holiness? Or, is it when the PARSON's full heart would give its feelings utterance, and with him draw his assembled brethren to lift up their hearts with one accord, in pious thanksgiving, to their Father and their Saviour, and to the blessed Spirit, for "our creation, preservation, and all the blessings of this life; but above all, for His inestimable love in the redemption of the world by our Lord Jesus Christ: for the means of grace, and for the hope of glory."

Surely, in these holy occupations he is no subject of mockery—far, very far from it. Woe to the man, who forgetful of these, by rash mockery elsewhere, prevents the ignorant and thoughtless from being present with the PARSON in their Father's house; and from profiting, with him, in these "means of grace," and imbibing these "hopes of glory."

But again, behold the PARSON in the pulpit. Is he, then, a subject for the scoffer? He is an educated man—he has an education directed to the particular object of his calling—he has studied—he has thought, he has prayed for that object. He has read the Bible—he has examined the practices of the early Church, and the writings of the ancient Fathers, and of learned divines. He has leisure and opportunities, which others have not, for looking into errors and exposing heresies. He is the guardian of sound doctrine—he explains scriptural difficulties—he is the expounder of social and Christian duties—he instructs, he exhorts, he rebukes. He lays before his brother sinners, at a time when the heart is less disposed to resist, with an authority which they are not prepared to question, the self-deception to which they are exposed by their corrupt inclinations; the inward treachery which plots against their immortal souls. He applies the sanction of Gospel authority, and the principles of Gospel morality, to all their family and social relations—to their various stations and circumstances of life. He enforces that law which supports, and renders efficient human laws, and has power and authority where no human laws can reach. He enjoins, under penalties that none can defy or evade, the sacred observance of oaths and promises—the great principles of truth and justice—honesty between man and man—integrity and loyalty between rulers and subjects—affection and obedience between children and parents—equity and faithfulness between masters and servants—all those bonds and mutual duties, and love, which unite, and bless, the community here, and fit man for the enjoyment of a purer, and more peaceful society hereafter. He presses on sinners the awful wrath of God; and points out the ark of refuge to which they may escape—he tells them of the hope that is in Christ Jesus—he warns them to hear the call in an accepted time—he shows them the fate of those who reject mercy—he offers the aid of the Spirit, and cautions them of the danger of grieving and despising him. In a word, he lays open to them the whole counsel of God.

Is the PARSON, thus occupied, one whose office we may safely hold up to the ridicule of the people?

THE FLOATING CHURCH OF THE REDEEMER.—We have received from "the Churchman's Missionary Association for Seamen of the Port of Philadelphia," a colored lithographic print of the building now in course of erection, and soon, we hope, to float upon the waters of our harbor. In general appearance, it resembles "the floating Church of our Saviour" in New York. It is, however, modified, and we think, much improved in the details of the plan. It will be indeed a beautiful object, and pleasant and good to look upon as it lifts its graceful spire amid the busy haunts of commerce, and directs heaven-ward the thoughts of those whose hearts may be too much set on earthly things. The first great object of this building is to provide for the homeless wanderers upon the pathless deep a refuge from the stormy wind and tempest, where they may find rest for their souls; that they "may be received into the ark of Christ's Church; and being steadfast in faith, joyful through hope, and rooted in charity, may so pass the waves of this troublesome world, that finally they may come to the land of everlasting life."

But not these alone, we think, will be blessed by this vessel so richly freighted with Love and Mercy. The merchant as he looks forth from his counting room, the anxious man of business as he hurries to inspect his ships or their cargoes, will behold in this a silent but eloquent monitor, whose still voice may reach many a heart as it says—"Set your affections on things above"—"Lay not up for yourselves treasures upon earth: where moth and rust doth corrupt, and where thieves break through and steal: but lay up for yourselves treasures in heaven; where neither moth nor rust doth corrupt, and where thieves do not break through nor steal." The merchant therefore is not merely bound to give liberally to the erection and support of this Floating Church, because it provides for the class of men by whose toil and peril he has his earthly wealth; but he has also a personal interest in this silent preacher, which may, with God's blessing, help to increase his store of imperishable riches.

Nor is it the merchant alone who has an interest in the hardy sons of the ocean. The sailor's peril and toil bring to every one comforts and luxuries. And were it not so, he is our brother, fearfully destitute of the means of spiritual instruction, and exposed to many temptations and dangers. His need demands our charitable help. And we are happy to say, for the honor of Philadelphia, that this demand has been nobly answered by our citizens. The cost of the Floating Church has been nearly provided for. We understand about $1,500 are needed to enable them to open the doors of this holy sanctuary, as a consecrated temple free from debt.

The Bishop, according to the rule adopted by him, will not consecrate the building unless it is paid for. This rule works admirably, if it induces men to be more liberal, so that they may have the house of prayer in every case duly consecrated. But the effect is different if Christian men are thus induced to content themselves with worshipping in unconsecrated temples, and the solemn service thus grows obsolete, whereby an earthly house is set apart to the peculiar honor of the Most High.

The Church is at present in the course of erection at Bordentown and, when completed, is to be floated down the river to its station. It will be in its place before the river closes. There is, therefore, no time to be lost in making up the required sum. We hope much of it may be obtained at the anniversary meeting. It will be an occasion of deep interest, and we trust, will gather a large congregation. We append the notice.

"FLOATING CHURCH MISSION."

"The anniversary of the 'Churchmen's Missionary Association for Seamen of the Port of Philadelphia,' will be held on Tuesday next, the 24th inst., in St. James' Church, to commence at half past seven o'clock, P. M. Several addresses will be delivered, and a collection will be made to aid in completing the structure."

A MIRACLE! We take the following miraculous account from "the New York Freeman's (i. e. Roman's) Journal." It is with no scoffing disposition that we publish this marvellous "development" of the 19th century, the age of boasted progress, of glorious enlightenment! We believe that most of those who are enticed into the Roman camp are led into it blindfolded, and know not to what they are going until the covering is taken from their eyes, when it is too late to return. We think such a fact as this would do more to open men's eyes to see what Rome is, than the fiercest denunciations of her bitterest enemies. Did we not read the narrative in one of the leading Roman Journals, we should esteem it an invention of desperate malice. We have never read any thing in the outpourings of the most violent Protestantism so denunciatory against the corruptions of Rome, as this history by themselves of a miserable attempt to impose upon imagined credulity. It is an outrage upon the intelligence of this country, and every American should esteem it a national libel.

In many respects it is a miracle in truth! It is a miracle that a Journal, published in New York, should dare to darken its pages with such an impious piece of profanity. It is a miracle that a church, which seeks to defend her doctrines and extend her practices by such artifices, could ever gain a proselyte or retain an adherent among those who were not blinded by ignorance!

Let no one presume to deny the doctrine of transubstantiation, for one "Frederick Pallworth," after being induced to "say one Hail Mary every Sunday," declares upon his oath "while I thus viewed the sacred host in its usual bread appearance for about five minutes, and within about two steps from it, on a sudden I saw in it a form which I recognized as the image of our Saviour, in which he is usually represented as the Good Shepherd." "The Saviour was clad in a dark brown dress," &c. &c. This "miracle," even were it real, would be a strong argument against the Roman dogma of transubstantiation. Indeed it goes not so far as the assertion of "the real Presence." It was only "the image of our Saviour," an "apparition," which the visionary in his distempered fantasy, saw! But we care not to pursue the argument which rests upon the baseless fabric of a vision! We ask the thoughtful and sober minded of the Romanists, if this should chance to meet their eye, to reflect upon this blasphemous representation of their glorified Saviour! We question not the oath of this poor deluded man. Doubtless his disordered brain may have given him this imaginary and degrading view of his exalted Lord. But we should be sorry to express, upon the pages of the Banner of the Cross, our loathing and contempt for those who could make such a use of human infirmity, and rest the solemnities of our holy religion upon such "stubble."

To defend and extend their peculiar errors they are ready to aim a blow at the whole truth of the gospel! The miracles wrought in attestation of it, are the strong proofs of its verity. Every word which casts a shadow of doubt upon them, obscures the evidence whereby our immortal hopes are established. May not every infidel say upon reading this, if such be the character of Christian miracles they are all shallow delusions? If we can have no faith but that which required us to believe in such a miracle then we must accept the dreary alternative of scepticism.

This narrative also lets us into the secret of the system of making converts. This poor man was persuaded, to please his sickly wife, "to say one Hail Mary every Sunday!" Doubtless many are thus induced to give these errors a partial trial, and when one link of the chain is secured, the captive is soon fettered.

We also hold this up as a strong argument for faithful efforts to extend the church in our western country. Thus alone can we do our part to keep our fellow men from the bondage of such errors. Let us not forget that this lamentable case occurred in "Wisconsin," and that "Nashotah" is in the same region. By helping to establish it more firmly, and giving this Institution greater efficiency, we will do some thing to save men from such delusions as the following.

Remarkable Conversion.

Mr. Editor—The undersigned requests, for the greater glory of God, to have the following inserted in the Wahrheit's Freund: Inasmuch as it is the duty of every Catholic to contribute as far as he can, to the honor and propagation of his holy Faith, why should facts be suppressed which bear evident marks of the power and of the goodness of God? The one here stated is nothing more nor less than an astonishing conversion, effected by a no less wonderful apparition. In such events, as in every other of his works, the all-searching wisdom of God regards not the notions of cold, calculating infidelity or the malice of proud heresy. The fact has occurred: it is proved before the ecclesiastical authority of this place in the presence of many witnesses, and has been found genuine, and placed beyond all doubt. Besides, the persons concerned are yet living, and easily to be found;—in the Diocese of Milwaukee, twelve miles northwest from the city, township 8, church of St. Anthony. The whole congregation bears witness: enquire freely—then decide. But mark—there is no quackery—no 'new light,' but the ancient light, which has cast its beams hitherto and illumined many hearts.

The readers of the Wahrheit's Freund will remember that last winter, in St. Anthony's congregation, the wife of a Protestant was converted during her sickness, and made her profession of the Catholic Faith. From that time it was her ardent desire that her husband should follow her in embracing the faith, or at least allow their three children to be received into the Catholic Church.—But all her persuasions were of little effect. Being already convinced of many errors in his own belief, he however continued at times to use blasphemous expressions in regard to Catholic doctrines. At length about six weeks ago he was induced to say one Hail Mary every Sunday, with a promise that something particular would happen in his favour before long. This promise was made by the Pastor of this place without being induced to it by any consideration save that of trusting in the powerful intercession of the Mother of God. In about three weeks after this, he unexpectedly spoke to his wife about having their children conditionally baptized. On hearing this, all who knew him were astonished. Sunday the 16th July, was appointed for this purpose. Rev. M. Salzman, with two seminarians, was invited by the Pastor of this place to assist on the occasion. A procession was formed from the pastoral residence to the church, the three children in the midst, with hands joined, opened the solemnity. After the Baptismal ceremonies, a solemn Mass was celebrated, and the whole concluded with the benediction of the most Holy Sacrament. During the time that the Blessed Sacrament was exposed, Jesus Christ appeared in the sacred Host, under the form of the good shepherd, to the father of the three children, whilst he stood behind them, about two steps from the altar. This apparition was invisible to all others present, but it was sufficiently, nay abundantly certified to, by the solemn declaration of the man, which he has since confirmed on oath in the presence of reliable witnesses; and of which the whole congregation was yesterday witness. But still stronger proof was the immediate conversion of the person himself, and also the sudden conversion of a certain Presbyterian, relying solely on the narration given by the individual of what he had seen. Both made together, yesterday, their solemn profession of the Catholic Faith, and the former, at the request of the Pastor of this place, made, immediately after his profession, the following sworn declaration:—

Solemn Declaration of Frederick Pallworth, concerning the apparition he witnessed on the 15th July, 1848, in St. Anthony's Church, Township 8.

I, Frederic Pallworth, hereby testify solemnly and publicly, that I, by the following apparition, was induced to return to the bosom of the Catholic Church.

When my three children were received into the Catholic Church, I was assisting at the High Mass, and the Blessed Sacrament was exposed for benediction in the Remonstrance; the thought suddenly came into my mind to take a good view of the sacred Host; for my belief in the real presence was, up to that time, very wavering, and it was this that kept me back from entering the Church. While I thus viewed the sacred host in its usual bread appearance for about five minutes, and within two steps from it, on a sudden I saw in it a form which I immediately recognised as the image of our Saviour, in which he is usually represented as the Good Shepherd. To the left and right of it there remained a small rim in form of a half moon, of the white appearance of bread; the remainder was occupied by the apparition. The Saviour was clad in a dark-brown dress, with a shepherd's hat upon his head, and a lamb on his shoulder. Without feeling troubled, I held one of my eyes closed in order to see the better, but I still saw the apparition; and in like manner when I again looked with both eyes. Before the benediction was over the apparition ceased, and I beheld again the sacred host in its usual form; so that it lasted about half the time the whole hymn Pange lingua was sung. During all the time that I saw the apparition, the priests and clerks were kneeling at the foot of the altar.

That I had the apparition with all the circumstances here related I certify to be true in the presence of those who have known me for several years as their neighbour, and also my perverse conduct in regard to the Catholic Faith.

Given on the 29th of July, the eve of my entrance into the Catholic Church, at St. Anthony's, Township 8.

FREDERICK PALLWORTH.

The above solemn deposition, made under sanction of an oath, places this wonderful event beyond all reasonable doubt. It was a sublime moment when yesterday the Catholic pastor called upon the first convert to give his second oath in relation to the miraculous appearance, in presence of the whole congregation. A sense of the immediate presence of God filled every mind; the belief of the real presence of Jesus Christ in the adorable sacrament was revived, and in many hearts strongly confirmed. The miracle, like an electric shock, pervaded the entire neighbourhood, and as he who was favored with it is one of the first settlers of this country, none doubted the truth of his declaration, even before it was sworn to.

A solemn High Mass, with a procession and benediction of the Blessed Sacrament, celebrated this admirable display of the omnipotence and goodness of God. The new converts ranged among the children lately baptized, went in procession from the Pastor's house to the Church. They were preceded by a number of girls dressed in white, and bearing flowers. An address was delivered suited to the occasion, after which followed the Veni Creator, and other solemnities.

REMOVAL.—It will be found, from the advertisement, that Mr. GEORGE S. APPLETON has removed his store to 164 Chesnut Street, corner of Seventh, Swaim's Buildings.

In this new and extensive store, the books are classified and arranged according to their subjects. Each department of literature has its appropriate place, so that there is little difficulty in making selections.

To those who take an interest in books, this large and beautiful store, filled with the intellectual treasures of various ages and countries, is truly an inviting place. It is well worth a visit, even though not with the intention of purchasing, still we must honestly caution those who cannot wisely buy, to be careful how they expose themselves to such manifold temptations.

NEW AGENT. Mr. R. H. WELLER, has kindly consented to act as Agent for the "Banner" at Memphis, Tennessee.

New Publications.

THE GEM OF THE SEASON FOR 1849.—For this most beautiful book, published by "Leavitt, Trow & Co., New York," we are indebted to GEORGE S. APPLETON, 164 Chesnut Street, corner of Seventh.

This book, unless strenuous efforts are made to surpass it, will maintain the truth of its title as the Gem of the Season. Rich in outward form, it possesses all the inward beauty that the highest art of the Printer and Engraver can give. The engravings are beautifully executed, and all of them picture interesting subjects, some of them peculiarly so to the American reader.

The Prose and Poetry are by authors of the highest repute, and are printed in a type which greatly adds to the pleasure of reading them. Altogether, this book is a choice one, and we hope will secure that deserved popularity which may repay the Publishers for the taste and expense bestowed upon a book which does credit to American art.

THE WOMEN OF THE SCRIPTURES, EDITED BY THE REV. H. HASTINGS WELD. Philadelphia, LINDSAY & BLAKISTON. This is another choice and beautiful book, impressed with external and internal attractiveness. The illustrations, engraved on steel, by Sartain, from original designs by Rossiter, are admirably conceived and executed. The printing is equally fine, and the names of the distinguished authors are a warrant that the matter of their productions corresponds with the pleasing manner in which it is set forth.

The sacred subject of this book is well chosen to make it an appropriate gift for those whose highest aim should be to resemble "THE WOMEN OF THE SCRIPTURES."

We have also received from the Publishers, No. 37 of Appleton's Literary Miscellany, ELLEN MIDDLETON, a Tale by LADY GEORGIANA FULLERTON.

GRACE CHURCH NEWARK.—The following is an accurate description of the new Church at Newark. We take it from the Newark Daily Advertiser kindly sent us by a Reverend Friend.

The building is certainly one of Mr. Upjohn's choicest productions. It is an early English structure, a style most chaste and fitting. It is cruciform, with a door at either transept. The Nave is 64 feet in length: width of Transepts 34 feet. Depth of Chancel 22 ft.; making the entire length 120 feet; measured in the clear. Width across the Transept from North to South, 67 feet; width of Nave, 37 feet; width of Chancel, 37 feet; the Organ loft is in a gallery in the North Transept.—Here is also a west gallery, reached by a stair-case in the tower. It has 131 pews. The roof is open timbered of a single span. The rafters are of a light (too light) Sienna colour. The ceiling is French grey or light blue. Appropriate texts of scripture are inscribed on the walls, in the Nave, Transepts and Chancel; those in the Chancel, taken chiefly from the Communion office. The altar and reredos are very rich and beautiful. The chancel rail is of iron, gilded and exceedingly graceful.

There are no pew doors, those abominable incumbrances of modern selfishness. The windows are fine, both in colours and quality. The glass is embossed and diapered. The great East window is well done. But, after all, I think there is wanting "the dim religious light," which Mr. Upjohn has hitherto excelled in producing, and which I have heard him blamed for.

There was too much power of light.—The atmosphere was most agreeable to the eye, when the sun went under a cloud. I trust Mr. Upjohn will not allow himself hereafter to depart from his own conceptions of propriety, notwithstanding the complaints of those whose eyes are dim, for too much of the mercantile light of the ordinary day, will blind us all to the solemnities of Divine worship. But this, by the way.

The Organ is a richly voiced instrument, encased in a graceful edifice. The font is of the very richest work in stone, surmounted by a pierced cover of Walnut.

On the whole, this Church is quite complete in all its arrangements and decorations. And I was delighted to hear the Rector announce that by Divine permission, morning and evening prayer would be celebrated every day at the hours of 9 A. M., and 7 P. M. The people of the goodly city of Newark should take shame, as they must loss, to themselves, if they do not avail themselves of the privilege thus furnished them in Grace Church.

But let us now walk outside. The Tower and Spire reach the height of 150 feet, the spire being surmounted by the gilded cross. I was particularly struck by the admirable manner in which the spire is joined to the tower. There is the requisite division, yet a unity in the whole structure. It is an improvement on the spire in University place N. York, so much admired as one of Mr. Upjohn's choicest steeples.

The masonry of Grace Church is as admirable as the rest of the building. It is first-rate rubble work, nicely pointed. The stone is the grey rock of Jersey from a new quarry near Newark. I subjoin a list of the persons employed in the construction, who have all done themselves honor:

Mr. W. S. B. Clark, was the mason.

Messrs. Gould and Moore, the carpenters.

Mr. Amos Wilcox cut the exquisite Font, and laid the Tiles in the Sacrament.

Ward and Exall, were the plumbers and tinnerns.

W. G. Black, the painter.

Charles H. K. Smith, the letterer and gilder.

Carter and Ely, the glaziers.

Thos. Hall, the organ builder.

Meneely, of Troy, founders of the bell, weighing 1813 pounds.

Matthew Ely, was also one of the mechanics.

Richard Upjohn, Esq., the architect.

The Organ has three sets of keys and two octaves of pedals. The Great Organ contains the open diapason, stop'd diapason, principal twelfth, fifteenth sesquialtera and trumpet. The Choir Organ contains dulciana stop'd diapason, principal, flute, fifteenth and cremona. The swell contains double stop'd diapason, open diapason, stop'd diapason, dulciana, principal trumpet and hautboy. The pedals, double open diapason and double stop'd diapason from CCC 16 ft., extending up two octaves. In addition to the above there are five coupling stops connecting the different sets of keys, each with the other, thereby affording the performer an opportunity of combining any two stops in whatever part of the organ they may be placed, or uniting the whole power of the organ upon one set of keys.

The opinion of persons well qualified to judge of the instrument is that it possesses the merit that but few organs have, viz: that all the various stops have the proper quality of tone, the requisite power and no more; this is what is technically termed being properly balanced, and is the true test of artistical voicing. The diapasons, reed stops and pedals, are not surpassed by any organ in the country, and very few will admit of a comparison with them.

The design of the case, which is of black walnut, is by R. Upjohn, Esq., the Architect of the Church.

BISHOP DE LANCEY'S ELEVENTH CONVENTIONAL ADDRESS, 1848.—After the record of his Episcopal acts during the year, the Bishop thus concludes his Address.

Under Canon XXVII, of 1832, which authorizes the Bishop to "address to the people of his Diocese Pastoral Letters, on some point of Christian doctrine, worship or manners," I have during the past year issued three Pastoral Letters, one in behalf of our Diocesan Missions, one in behalf of the Christmas Fund for Disabled Clergymen, and one in relation to a proposed organization of a Society at Rochester, in May last, a movement of individuals which however well intentioned by those who started it, was not I apprehended fully understood by all who signed the circular, some of whom have withdrawn from all connection with it. As I could not but deem it dangerous to the peace, harmony and unity of the Diocese, unsanctioned as it was by any of the Parochial or Diocesan authorities, likely to prove distracting to the Parishes, and to work out, in its result, that very schism from which we pray the good Lord to deliver us, I was in duty bound, though not myself invited to attend the meeting, nor in any way consulted on the subject, to say to the Clergy and Laity of the Diocese who would look to me for an opinion on the movement, entitled and bound as I was, to have an opinion on the subject, that I regarded it as an irregular, needless and distracting measure; and, however undesigned to do so, yet calculated to provoke and to promote disunion and conflicts, rather than to advance union, harmony and peace; and to express the hope that the gentlemen themselves, when they come together, would see such an organization to be so fraught with evils, that they would not complete it, and as they had never been interfered with, but had always enjoyed the fullest freedom which the Church allows, in their opinions, doctrines and instructions, that they would not commence a system which of necessity involved, in my judgment, interference with others, and looked to an indirect, if not a direct, party action in the Diocese, and party influence on the Convention, with all its evils.

It could not be regarded as a mere individual step of a few clerical and lay gentlemen, to provide themselves with books and tracts, but an organization to extend throughout the Diocese. The circular was sent to both Clergy and Laity in all parts of it. It was published in a religious paper beyond its limits. A large body of the Clergy and Laity were invited to attend. It was a step auxiliary to a Parent Society, seeking to spread its wings over all the Dioceses independently of all the constituted authorities of the General Church, and to rest on an independent and voluntary basis; an evolution of a new principle in the Church of individual, party organization, disconnected with all Church authorities, responsible to itself alone, for its fidelity in doctrine, or in practice, and repudiating alike the action of vestries, standing committees, conventions and Bishops, though taking the name of a Diocese, and working within its limits. I wish to put on record my views in regard to it. We all know that the desire to promote holiness in the Church of England, led to the organization of sundry persons into a Society, out of which sprung when it reached a vigor and strength uncontrollable by its originators, a large body of Christians that has repudiated the Prayer Book, the ministry and the institutions, of the very Church from which they started.

My Brethren of the Clergy and Laity, I state it with the emphasis of most solemn conviction, that it is because as a watchman on "the walls of Zion," I see in this movement the element of such a distraction, that as in duty bound, I lift my feeble voice against its first displays, however undesignedly made in the Diocese over which the Holy Spirit has made me overseer. In the Church there are no compulsory societies. There are two kinds of voluntary societies. A voluntary society formed with the express or implied sanction of the ecclesiastical authorities of the Parish, or the Diocese or the Church at large, is one kind.

The other kind is a voluntary society, formed by individuals without reference to any ecclesiastical authority whatever, Parochial, Diocesan or General, and repudiating its control. Of the former kind are all the societies who have heretofore approvingly existed in the Church. Of the latter kind is this new society, as I understand it. On any deviation from rectitude of action, or instruction in the former kind of Society, the Church authorities can lay the hand of correction.

Over the acts and teaching of this other kind of society, as a society, the Church authorities have no control for correction or restraint. They are voluntary in the sense of self-constituted, independent and irresponsible combinations within the Church, exercising not as the others, co-operative but co-ordinate influence in the affairs of the Church.

In the Protestant Episcopal Sunday School Union, it is provided by the constitution that "in all questions in the Board of Managers, if it be required by any one member, the vote shall be taken by orders, a majority of the Bishops, and of the Clergy, and of the Laity, present being in such case, necessary to the validity of any act of the Board."

"The same rule shall apply to the Executive Committee," thus giving the veto power equally to Bishops, Clergy and Laity, and with it the amplest means to control its workings, and resist and amend its errors. No such provision exists in the constitution of the new society.

The Protestant Episcopal Sunday School Union, was formed in 1826, at a meeting of the members of the General Convention of the Protestant Episcopal Church, and others, Bishop White, presiding Bishop, in the chair at one meeting, and the Rev. Dr. Wilmer, President of the House of Clerical and Lay Deputies in the chair at another meeting. Bishop Hobart being Chairman of the Committee which reported the Constitution.

It has sought and received directly or indirectly, from sundry Conventions, their approval,* and it consists of the Bishops of the Protestant Episcopal Church, and of the Clergy and Superintendents of the Sunday Schools of the same, with life members paying fifty dollars. It was formed therefore, by and with the implied sanction of the constituted authorities of the Church, and from the outset, has openly sought their control and guidance.

The formation of distinct and independent, self-constituted, voluntary associations, within the Church, disavowing all connection with any of its constituted authorities, and in no way amenable to them, is a system which, in the only view I can take of it, is fatal alike to the peace, the fidelity, and the welfare of the Church.

In England where voluntary societies exist, there is no representative, ecclesiastical body, in a position to take cognizance of such societies. There, as you know, the Church is allied to the State.

The "Convocation" is silenced. There are no Diocesan Synods or Conventions.

The Political Parliament legislates for the Church. Individual organization is the only organization practicable, and that, as I understand it, is not made without the concurrence of the ecclesiastical authority of the locality. But here, thank God, the Church is not allied to the State.

Every Diocese has its convention to act, in which the Clergy and Laity are duly represented. A general convention representing the whole Church, exists, to act, or to give directly or indirectly, its sanction to the proceedings of societies within the Church. "The Protestant Episcopal Society for the promotion of Evangelical Knowledge," is a Society formed by several of the Bishops and Clergy and Laity of the Church, in their individual capacity, on the voluntary principle, and seeking no sanction from Vestry, Convention, or any Church authority as such. Although formed at the time of the General Convention, it did not seek any countenance, aid, or approval of that body, gave no general invitation to the Bishops, the Clergy or the Laity of the convention to unite in it, many of whom did not know of its formation; all its officers except the Vice Presidents and four of the Executive Committee, may be Laymen; and any person approving of the objects of this society, and paying one dollar becomes a member. In its published address it declares "our invitation is to all, and only those who for substance of faith and practice, agree in the stand which we have taken."

We have only to suppose the principle carried out to all the branches of religious enterprise, and to each class of religious opinions in the Church, and the friends and supporters thereof organized and set apart on the basis of independent "voluntary organization," and "spiritual affinity," in every Diocese, and then all harmony of feeling in the Church, all unity of action, all brotherly intercourse, all disinterested labours, all looking to Christ and the Holy Spirit, for grace and blessing on united efforts for the glory of God, and the salvation of men, will be merged in the one great and absorbing object, of strengthening, respectively our "sections of the Church," by all the measures, powers and money that can be enlisted, until at last from separate organizations come parties, from parties, alienation, from alienations, discord, from discords, division, and from divisions, schism, secession from the Church, and thus we stand before the world a broken, disjointed and scattered flock, with as many differing Prayer Books, contending Seminaries, opposition Boards of Missions and conflicting Societies, as there may be divisions amongst us; and so the experiment to purify the faith of the Christian body, by irregular action, shall result in tearing out the vitals and scattering the limbs.

Not so taught St. Paul to the contentious Corinthians, when he said to them:—(1. Corinthians xiii. 12.)

"For as the body is one, and hath many members, and all the members of that one body, being many, are one body; so also is Christ.

For by one Spirit are we all baptized into one body, whether we be Jews or Gentiles, whether we be bond or free; and have been all made to drink into one Spirit.

For the body is not one member but many.

If the foot shall say, because I am not the hand, I am not of the body; is it therefore not of the body?

And if the ear shall say, Because I am not the eye, I am not of the body; is it therefore not of the body?

If the whole body were an eye, where were the hearing? If the whole were hearing, where were the smelling?

But now hath God set the members every one of them in the body, as it hath pleased him.

And if they were all one member where were the body?

But now are they many members, yet but one body."

Not so taught our blessed Lord in the parable. (Matt. xiii. 24.)

"When the servants of the householder came and said to him, Sir, didst thou not sow good seed in thy field? from whence then hath it tears?

He said unto them, An enemy hath done this. The servants said unto him, Wilt thou then that we go and gather them up?

But he said, Nay; lest while ye gather up the tares, ye root up also the wheat with them.

Let both grow together until the harvest; and in the time of harvest I will say to the reapers, Gather ye together first the tares, and bind them in bundles to burn them: but gather the wheat into my barn."

While therefore I readily admit the abstract right on the part of individuals as men, and citizens to organize such independent bodies, and while I would not lay a straw in the path of the broadest and fullest discussion of all the principles and doctrines of the Church, yet I cannot but see in such organizations, when made without, or against the constituted authorities of a Diocese or Parish, the impending evils of convulsion, revolution and dismemberment.

I rejoice to record, with the deepest thankfulness to God, how calmly, steadily, and almost universally the Clergy and Laity of the Diocese, concur with me in the desire, and the effort to uphold the Bible and the Prayer Book, on the principle of maintaining "in essentials unity, in non-essentials liberty, in all things charity;" and in sustaining the Convention, as the appointed and regular organ of associated action amongst us.

And I am fully satisfied that if our Clerical and Lay Brethren who have moved in this matter, had seen the proceeding, in the light thus presented, they would have refrained from the step, free as they all are, and ever have been, to procure for themselves whatever Church Books and Tracts they may choose, the Laity for themselves, and the Clergy for their Parishes.

My Brethren, I quote now the language of the venerable Bishop White.*

"That there is such a sin as schism, and that it is severely censured in Scripture, is a position probably not denied by any who call themselves Christians; so that it must be important to form a correct idea of what comes under the name.

Wherever the Church was planted, it was as to its government one in itself, within its bounds, commonly of considerable extent, and under a jurisdiction reaching all spiritual concerns, which fall within the sphere of the determination of human wisdom. Although there was a good understanding kept up among the different Churches, by the means of letters of communion, the internal government of each was over an extent of territory prescribed by the circumstances of the case. All departure from an authority so constituted was considered as schism. Such to name, no more, was that of the Novatians, and that of the Donatists, not reaching to the point of heresy, but considered as very sinful, and as excluding them from the society of the faithful. It follows from these principles that wherever in any extent of territory, there is an ecclesiastical organization duly constituted and adjusted to the ordering of matters within the sphere of human jurisdiction, departure from such a body by a portion of it, setting up an organization of their own, without ground for the charging of fundamental error in doctrine, as the cause of their secession is schism in the scriptural sense of the word."

It is because I see, however unintentionally made in such organizations, when repudiating the constituted authorities of the Church, the forebodings of this sin of schism, that addressing you as I have done within the limits of my individual, ministerial, Episcopal and canonical duties, I have struck this chord of warning, and that I utter the fervent supplication to the God of all grace, that he may avert from his Church this impending evil.†

* See Bishop White's Charge on the "Past and Future."

† On this subject of the unity of the Church, it ought to be a serious consideration with any who may hereafter be tempted to disturb it to the extent of a secession, that by so doing, they will put themselves in a situation in which, whatever may be their new organization, there cannot be any such separation from it, as will fall under the name of schism. In

I am in no way desirous of magnifying this matter beyond its merits. Still less do I wish to foster the evils which in my judgment, if successful, will flow in its train. In no respect would I curb or restrain the freedom of religious opinion held within the limits of ministerial or Christian obligation. It is not for any purpose of heaping odium upon those concerned in this movement, for there is no odium in stating facts and uttering warning, within the sphere of my duty; and both as a Bishop and a Protestant, I may surely claim the right to form and to express in the only way prescribed, by the Canons, and in the only way practicable in this case, my opinion of a measure in which the whole Diocese is concerned, where silence might be construed into acquiescence, or be perverted into encouragement to movements in an opposite direction.

Of the asperities and censures which have been or may be heaped upon me, in the discharge of my duty, I should present you an evil example if I took any other notice of them than to say that both for the past and in advance, they are forgiven.

It is not, as I have said in my Pastoral Letter, and now repeat, that I supposed the gentlemen concerned had any desire or design to promote schism by their action, that I did then and do now, point out the dangers of this movement.

But I wish to put on record, some of the grounds of my apprehensions; in regard to which, all will rejoice if they shall not be verified, and if they prove true, there will be before the Church the reasons which have influenced my judgment, in the conclusions it has reached, and the evidence that I have uttered my sentiments with the fidelity, courtesy and kindness, appropriate I trust to the character of a Christian, and the office of a Bishop in the Church of God.

Among the provisions that the Church has made for providing sound and faithful clergymen to minister at her altars, is the appointment of prayer to be used at the stated times of ordination, invoking the great Head of the Church so to guide and govern the Bishops and Pastors of his Church, that they may lay hands suddenly on no man, but faithfully and wisely make choice of fit persons to serve in the sacred ministry of the Church, and so to replenish them with the truth of his doctrine and endue them with innocency of life, that they may faithfully serve before him to the glory of his great name and the edification of his Church.

These stated times of ordination occur, as you know, four times each year—in the spring, summer, fall and winter, when, by fasting and prayer, both Clergy and Laity should seek that blessing from above, not only on the Pastors of the Church, both those already in the field, and those about to enter it, but on the flocks themselves, without which the care and labor of the former will be in vain, and the increase, stability and improvement of the latter, are not to be expected. It would be well if every Parish in the Diocese, would observe these days in the way which the Prayer Book prescribes. Several of them have commenced the practice. Their clerical brethren contiguous, unite with them. In this way I trust will spread without any formal action, the observance of the days set apart for Prayer and Fasting, with a view of seeking God's blessing on the ministry of the Church.

I beg to recommend very earnestly, that the Clergy of each county should by some combined action, give attention to the feeble and vacant Parishes around them, and thus by occasional services, revive and encourage their disheartened brethren. For example, in Monroe county there are three parishes now vacant, out of the seven which the county contains. An occasional service at Brockport, Honeoye Falls and Mumford, by the clergy of the other parishes, would encourage and benefit the brethren who long for the services of the Church, and the ministration of the sacraments, and the preaching of the word. This object the employment of Deacons in the larger parishes, would greatly subserve.

The many feeble parishes in the Diocese, fluctuating as our villages are in population, by changes, removals, alterations of business, and varieties of enterprise, present a most affecting demand upon our sympathies, and zeal, and liberality. If I present to you so frequently and earnestly the claims of our Diocesan Missions, the only agency for the sustentation of our weak Parishes, it is not because I do not estimate the claims of exterior objects of benevolence, or that I do not appreciate the necessities and privations of our brethren in the western section of our country; or that I do not commiserate the Pagan millions overwhelmed with the pollutions of idolatry, but because I stand among you, surrounded by weak and tottering Parishes, rendered incapable of self-support by a combination of causes, over which neither they you nor have control; and if I, their spiritual father, turn from my own despondent, weeping and imploring children as they hang upon me, to expend my sympathies, influence and means, inadequate at their fullest extent, to these necessities, upon other and distant objects, however worthy, however urgent, how am I to answer to Him who has committed to me—not other flocks, but this—not the distant heathen—but His family here—not the fading and expiring Churches of the East—but the weak and infant portions of the kingdom among ourselves—not the barren branches of error and corruption abroad—but the feeble sprouts that are here starting forth amid impediments and obstacles where it needs a Paul to plant, and an Apollos to water, and where every one who contemplates our feebleness in labours, in men and means, must admit that it is God that hath given the increase.

From fifteen to twenty missionaries might now, most advantageously for the Church, be employed in this Diocese. But straitened as we are, whence are to come the means that sustain them? Our entire income from every source, is exhausted by the demands already upon us.

the estimation of the Papacy, the Church of England is schismatic. But the charge is disproved by the irrefragable plea that she was a branch of the universal Church, long before the pretension made by a Dominant See, of jurisdiction over all the Churches of Christendom. The effect of the Reformation was the replacing of her on the stand which she had occupied from the time of her first embracing of Christianity." Bishop White's Charge, p. 10.

Hitherto, with the deepest thankfulness to God, let us acknowledge it; we have fulfilled our engagements to our Diocesan Missionaries, beside contributing about $2,000 to exterior objects of benevolence, and the Diocese is not in debt.

While I would not repress in any one a liberal feeling to any object of true Christian benevolence, let me urgently implore you, Brethren of the Clergy and Laity, not to be wanting in the support and aid of your immediate brethren in the Diocese who must look to you, and to you alone, for that missionary assistance, on which, almost every one of your Parishes once has leaned, and without which Churches must be closed, congregations scatter, the sacraments cease to be administered, and the voice of God's ministers no longer be heard invoking sinners to repentance and guiding the people of God in the way of everlasting life.

With that liberality which the Spirit of God inspires, we can rise to the level of the demands which the Church makes upon us, in our respective spheres.

Let us open our hearts to the Spirit, and our hands to the cause of Christ.

And now brethren, I commend you to the grace and guidance of Him whose all-seeing eye is now upon us, and who alone can put into our minds good desires and designs, and enable us to bring the same to good effect; and I earnestly pray that all our consultations and proceedings may be guided to his glory, our spiritual and eternal good, and the true and lasting welfare of his holy Church.

Laying of the Corner Stone of Christ Church, Delaware City.

The erection of an Episcopal Church in Delaware City, has for a long time engaged the interest and prayers of many Churches in Northern Delaware.

During the past year a determination arose among the neighboring Clergy and several of the Laity, to push forward the good work with untiring energy and perseverance. Early in the spring a congregation was organized under very favorable auspices. Ever since that time the services of the Church have been held in the school-house of the village every other Sunday, with most encouraging prospects, and every indication of the materials of a flourishing congregation.

On Tuesday last the corner stone of the Church was laid amid a large and interesting assembly.

The procession proceeded from a private residence in the village to the lot where the Church is being erected, headed by the Rev. Messrs. Billopp, Van Deusen, and Freeman. The service used was one set forth and allowed by the Bishop of the Diocese. It was conducted by the Rev. Thos. F. Billopp, and closed with an appropriate and interesting address by the Rev. E. M. Van Deusen.

The Bible and Prayer Book, together with copies of the general and diocesan conventions, several of the secular papers of the day, and the census of Delaware city, were placed in the corner stone.

Also the following memorandum—"In the name of the Father, and of the Son, and of the Holy Ghost. Amen."

This corner stone of Christ Church, Delaware city, was laid on the 10th day of October 1848, (the Bishop of the Diocese being absent) by the Rev. Thos. F. Billopp, rector of Immanuel Church, Newcastle. The Rev. A. F. Freeman being rector of the Parish. A. S. Pennington, A. V. Culin, F. D. Dunlap, W. H. Thomas, J. A. Barr, Jas. B. Henry, Geo. Cleaver, and Jos. Cleaver, vestrymen. Samuel Stone being the Architect and S. Waters the builder. His Excellency William Thorpe, being Governor of the State of Delaware, and his excellency Jas. K. Polk being President of the United States. "Other foundation can no man lay than that is laid which is Jesus Christ."

The Church is to be of brick, covered with mastic. It will have a tower and steeple, and will be in the Gothic style. There will be buttresses between the windows and at the corners of the Church and tower, surmounted with pinnacles. There will be mullioned windows, and diamond glass, and a pitched roof covered with slate. The dimensions of the Church are 34½ feet by 69. And the cost is $1000.

We sincerely pray that God may put it into the hearts of those interested in the Church, to contribute liberally, according as He hath prospered them—so that when completed man may have no claim upon it, but it may truly be "God's house in the which it pleaseth Him to dwell."

Rev. Mr. Freeman.

The House of Bishops On Scripture and Tradition.—No. 2.

"We are aware of the fact, that the original publishing of the Scriptures, was WITH THE ACCOMPANIMENT OF THE MINISTRY, for the unfolding of its sense, for the impressing of it on the consciences, and for the rendering of it persuasive to the hearts of men."—Pastoral Letter of 1832.

"It has been a question how far—these works of the Fathers are to be resorted to for the ascertaining of Christian doctrine, discipline, and worship." It "is our belief that the only reason for the calling in of that exterior aid, must be its administering to interpretation. Without reference to such authority there are many passages of Scripture from which no reasonable sense can be deduced. Our articles declare the Church to be "the witness and keeper of Holy Writ." THIS IS THE ONLY DEFENSIBLE GROUND, FOR THE AFFIRMING OF THE INTEGRITY OF THE SACRED VOLUME; and it cannot be surrendered without a committing of the subject to the judgments or to the tastes of fallible men, in one shape or in another. Our Church differs from the opinion entertained by some, that a divine character is so impressed on every Book, as to be itself evidence of inspiration. Historic testimony was the guide of the early Fathers, in their establishing of the canon."

"Who can tell to what extent the error (of schism) has been occasioned by a light esteem of what was held universally by Christians, immediately after the age of the apostles." "Be it that the apostolic designation of the three orders of the ministry may be proved from Holy Scripture; still while scriptural authorities receive plausible interpretations, opposed to what we conceive to be their genuine senses, for the justifying of forms of ecclesiastical government, destitute of example during fifteen hundred years from the beginning of the Christian era, it is of consequence on our part, to avail ourselves of writings in our favor, handed down to us during that long tract of time, including the three earliest centuries."—Pastoral Letter, in Gen. Con. 1835.

Diocesan Intelligence.

Western New York.—BISHOP DELANCEY'S VISITATION.—On Monday, October 2d, the Bishop preached and confirmed two persons in St. Paul's Church, Turin, Lewis county. And in the afternoon he preached in St. Paul's Church, Constableville.

On the 3d, in the Union house of worship, at Alder Creek, Oneida county, in the afternoon, the Bishop baptized four children and preached.

On the morning of the 4th the Bishop preached in the Welch Baptist house of worship at Remsen, and afterwards confirmed one sick person in private.

In the afternoon of the same day the Bishop preached at Holland Patent, in St. Paul's Church.

Thursday morning, October 5th, Bishop DeLancey visited Zion Church, Rome, preached and confirmed eight persons.

It will be remembered that the Bishop visited this parish in April last, when three persons were confirmed, making eleven persons within the year.

On the 6th, the Bishop preached in the Methodist Chapel at Cleveland.

In the afternoon, in Trinity Church, Constantia, the Bishop preached and confirmed five persons.

In the evening he preached again in the same Church.

Sunday, October 8th, Bishop DeLancey spent at Camden, preached and confirmed five persons.—Gos. Mess.

Connecticut.—INSTITUTION.—On Saturday the 7th inst., the Bishop of the Diocese administered the rite of Confirmation to sixteen persons in Christ Church, Westport, and instituted the Rev. William H. Frisbie into the Rectorship of that interesting parish; having kindly postponed the services from the Tuesday preceding, on account of the inclemency of the weather. There were present besides the Bishop the following Clergymen: the Rev. Dr. Mead, and the Rev. Messrs. Samuel Nichols, Coit, Cornwall, Short, George W. Nichols, Purves, Wilcoxson, and Betts, and a large congregation of parishioners and others. Morning Prayer was read by Mr. Purves, and the Lessons by Mr. Betts. The Letter of Institution, in the name of the Bishop, was read by Mr. Cornwall, and an appropriate sermon preached by Dr. Mead, from 2 Tim., ii. 15. "Study to show thyself approved unto God." The keys were presented to the Rector by the Senior Warden, the venerable Daniel Nash, Esq. whose liberality has enabled this parish by steady and united efforts, from its organization to support itself in a very exemplary manner, and thus, under God, to insure its own success and prosperity, in the most effectual way. Of this commendable feature in the young parish of Christ Church, as well as of the diligence and fidelity of its former and present Rectors, the latter having labored in the parish for several months past, the interesting class presented to the Bishop for confirmation is an encouraging result.—Calendar.

Maryland.—CONSECRATION OF ST. PHILIP'S CHURCH, LAUREL PRINCE GEORGE COUNTY, MARYLAND.—Thursday last, St. Matthew's day, was appointed for this solemnity, and as the weather proved very favourable, there was nothing to mar the pleasure of the services.

Laurel is a manufacturing village, the growth of a few years of industry and enterprise, and with its well laid out streets, neat fences, highly cultivated fields, and tasteful houses, reminds one much more of New England than of Maryland. It has lately received a great additional ornament in the small and plain but church-like edifice, which has been erected during the past year through the faithful exertions of the excellent rector and a few untiring and liberal hearted co-workers. The church is of stone, found in the vicinity, in the early English style, and consists of a nave, chancel, a vestry room on either side of the chancel, and a tower at the west end of the nave, intended to be hereafter finished with a spire. The plan was kindly furnished by J. H. Alexander, Esq., of Baltimore, and, in the opinion of those well qualified to judge, reflects credit upon his taste and judgment. It was a source of regret to many, that the strict necessity to consult economy had constrained the accomplished designer to omit some of the features of the early English style, but all were agreed in awarding to him the praise of having performed the difficult task of erecting an ecclesiastical looking building, capable of accommodating from two hundred to two hundred and fifty persons, at a less cost than the unmeaning structures so often found in country parishes in Maryland. The features of the interior, which called forth favourable comment, were the open roof, of simple but very striking design, and the position of the altar in its place of due prominence against the East wall. It is intended, that all the windows shall ultimately be filled with stained glass, which will add richness to the internal effect.

The Bishop's sermon was listened to by a devout and attentive congregation. It was from St. John iv. 24, God is a Spirit, and they that worship Him must worship Him in Spirit and in Truth, and consisted, for the most part, of a rebuke of the prevalent low views of worship, which regard it on its human side, as growing out of human wants and weaknesses, and tending to human edification, rather than as a service and duty rendered to God. He exposed and reprobated the common forms of speech, the ordinary demeanor in the house of God, and the prevalent notions concerning the construction and arrangement of churches, which grow out of those low and imperfect views.

After the sermon, the holy rite of confirmation was administered to three persons.

The services of the day were then concluded by the celebration, and reception, of the Holy Eucharist.

In the afternoon, the Bishop and clergy were hospitably entertained by Col. Capron; and they departed to their homes with the recollection of a day of privilege and pleasure, rejoiced and encouraged at the success with which God had crowned the laborious efforts of their faithful and beloved brother.—Church Times.

Virginia.—ORDINATION.—The Rev. E. T. Perkins was admitted to the order of Priests, at Parkersburg, on Wednesday, September 27th, by the Right Rev. Bishop Meade. The ordination sermon was preached by the Rev. William Armstrong of Wheeling, who, with the Rev. S. D. Tompkins of Western Virginia, united in the imposition of hands.

Ohio.—THE SUNDAY AFTER CONVENTION.—The Convention closed its business and adjourned on Saturday evening. On Sunday morning the Bishop held an ordination in Trinity Church and admitted to the order of Presbyters, the Rev. Eli Adams, and the Rev. Rodolphus K. Nash. The candidates were presented by the Rev. George Denison. The Bishop preached the sermon; and administered the communion, assisted by Rev. Messrs. Smallwood and Britton.

The meeting in aid of the cause of Missions and of Education in this diocese, was held in the same Church on Sunday afternoon. Addresses were made by the Bishop, the Rev. Mr. Ufford of Virginia, and the Rev. Messrs. Britton and Denison. At the close of the meeting a collection was taken, amounting to $86 31; and pledges were made to the amount of $1255, to be redeemed in the course of the year.

In the evening, after a sermon by the Rev. Dr. Brooke, a collection was taken in behalf of the Society for the Relief of the Widows and Orphans of deceased Clergymen.—Western Episcopalian.

Missouri.—ST. JOHN'S CHURCH, ST. LOUIS, MISSOURI.—We learn with the utmost satisfaction, by private correspondence, that this flourishing parish is making active preparations for more extended accommodations for its worshippers. "Our vestry, (we quote from a letter recently received:) have purchased a lot whereon to erect a new church edifice, and as you may well suppose, we are kept busily employed. The lot is in a beautiful situation, scarcely to be equalled anywhere in advantages; and the plan on which they have agreed to build, is truly beautiful. Mr. Jackson, a young gentleman who has been for a number of years with Mr. Upjohn, has lately established himself in our city, and is engaged as the architect."

If the plan of building has not been changed, since it was submitted to our inspection, some time since, we can fully vouch for its primitive elegance and architectural beauty. The following is a brief description of it, as communicated to us, by a previous letter.

"Nave 74 by 47 feet; transepts 69 by 26; chancel 21½ by 20; with the tower over the intersection of the nave and transepts; clear story; open roof; stained windows, if we can obtain them; to be built of stone to the top of the cross on the spire which according to the plan, is 150 feet high. It is a great undertaking; but with God's blessing, I hope we shall be able to accomplish it."

The parish of which we speak, commenced, and has grown to its maturity, under the auspices of the Rev. W. Griswold. The advances, which the cause of Catholic Truth has already made in this growing city, under the supervision of the excellent and energetic Bishop of Missouri, are a cause of devout thanksgiving with every lover of the Church. It is an almost incredible fact, that the population of St. Louis is now not far from 60,000, having nearly doubled in eight years. In consideration of this fact, the New York Churchman well remarks, that "what is done for the religious improvement of such western localities, must be done quickly."—Church Times.

CLERICAL CHANGES.—The Rev. William Hodges has been received into this diocese (Connecticut) by Letters Dimissory from the Right Reverend the Bishop of Virginia, and has accepted an invitation to take Charge of Christ Church, Washington Parish, District of Columbia.

The Rev. William H. Bourns has resigned the rectorship of Emmanuel Church, Holmesburgh, in consequence of ill health.

The Rev. James W. Hoskins, Deacon, has been received into the Diocese of Connecticut by Letters Dimissory from the ecclesiastical authority of the Diocese of Mississippi.

The Rev. Richard H. Phillips has taken Letters Dimissory to the Diocese of Virginia, where he has accepted the Principalship of the Female Institute at Staunton.

The Rev. John W. Shackelford having been called to the rectorship of St. John's parish, Cohoes, Albany county, New York, requests that all communications may be addressed to him there.

The Rev. William E. Snowden, desires his letters and papers addressed to Hertford, Perquimans county, North Carolina.

The Rev. Benjamin Wright having been compelled by ill health to resign the charge of Christ's Church, Sackett's Harbour, has removed to St. Augustine, Florida.

The Rev. Azariah Prior, has resigned the Rectorship of St. David's Church, Manayunk, and accepted an invitation to take charge of the old Swedes Church, Wilmington.

The Rev. James W. Hoskins, Deacon, has been received into the Diocese of Maryland by Letters Dimissory from the ecclesiastical authority of the diocese of Mississippi.

* Some of these notices were crowded out of last week's paper.

The Rev. William Hodges has removed to Washington to assume the charge of Christ Church in that city, and requests that his letters and papers may be directed accordingly.

The Rev. S. R. Slack, having taken charge of Buckmountain and St Paul's Churches, Albemarle Co. Va., requests letters and papers addressed to him, to be directed to the "P. O. Mechem's River, Albemarle Co., Va."

A Man Over Niagara Falls.—A Thrilling Scene.

Neither fiction nor fact furnishes an incident of more thrilling interest than one which occurred last evening at the Falls, and is detailed below by our correspondent. There is something terribly appalling, almost sublime, in the struggles for life of a strong, self-possessed man, when drawn into the torrent that, with the speed of a race horse, sweeps him onward to certain destruction. A moment scarcely elapses between entire safety and a most fearful death, yet in that moment what a wealth of life may be compressed. How like lightning must flash through the mind all the pleasant recollections of childhood, the firm resolves of vigorous manhood, the hopes of the future, the endearments of home and friends, repentance for past errors, and prayers for forgiveness in that dread presence to which he is so awfully summoned!

NIAGARA FALLS, Oct. 2d, 1848.

About sundown last evening a man was carried over the Falls. Who he was is not known. From his management of the sail boat in which he came down the river, I think he was not well acquainted with the current or the rapids. His dress and appearance indicated respectability, and after he got into the rapids his self-possession was most extraordinary. His boat was a very good one—decked over on the bow, and I should think would carry three or four tons. From what I learn of a sail boat having been seen below Black Rock, coming down, I think it is from there or Buffalo. No other than a person unacquainted with the current above the rapids would venture so near them.

I was on the head of Goat Island when I first discovered the boat—then near half a mile below the foot of Navy Island, and nearly two miles above the Falls. There seemed to be two in the boat. It was directed towards the American shore—the wind blowing from this shore, and still the sail was standing. Being well acquainted with the river, I regarded the position of the boat as extraordinary and hazardous, and watched it with intense anxiety. Soon I discovered the motion of an oar, and from the changing direction of the boat, concluded it had but one. While constantly approaching nearer and nearer the rapids, I could discover it was gaining the American shore, and by the time it had got near the first fall in the rapids, about half a mile above Goat Island, it was directly above the Island. There it was turned up the river, and for some time the wind kept it nearly stationary. The only hope seemed to be to come directly to Goat Island, and whether I should run half a mile to give alarm, or remain to assist, in the event of the boat attempting to make the Island, was a question of painful doubt. But soon the boat was again turned towards the American shore. Then it was certain it must go down the American rapids. I ran for the bridge—saw and informed a gentleman and lady just leaving the Island, but they seemed unable to reply or move. I rallied a man at the toll gate—we ran to the main bridge in time to see the boat just before it had got to the first large fall in the rapids. Then I saw but one man—he standing at the stern with his oar changing the course of the boat down the current, and as it plunged over, he sat down.

I was astonished to see the boat rise with the mast and sail standing, and the man, again erect directing the boat towards shore. As he came to the next and to each succeeding fall he sat down, and then would rise and apply his oar in the intermediate current.

Still there was hope that he would come near enough to the pier to jump, but in a moment it was gone. Another, that he might jump upon the rock near the bridge, but the current dashed him from it under the bridge, breaking the mast. Again he rose on the opposite side. Taking his oar and pointing his boat towards the main shore, he cried, "had I better jump from the boat?" We could not answer, for either seemed certain destruction. Within a few rods of the Falls, the boat struck a rock—turned over and lodged. He appeared to crawl from under it, and swam with the oar in his hand till he went over the precipice.

Without the power to render any assistance—for half an hour watching a strong man struggling with every nerve for life, yet doomed with almost the certainty of destiny to an immediate and awful death, still hoping with every effort for his deliverance—caused an intensity of excitement I pray God never again to experience.

I write too hurriedly for publication, but I have stated all we have seen or know respecting the man or boat, and from which I hope you will be able to glean so much for publication as will lead to the discovery of the man.—Buffalo Advertiser.

AGE OF ANIMALS.—A bear rarely exceeds 20 years; a dog lives 20 years; a wolf 20, a fox 16. Lions are long lived. Pompey lived to the age of 70. The average of cats is 15; a squirrel, or hare, 7 or 8; rabbits 7. Elephants have been known to live to the age of 400 years. When Alexander the Great had conquered Porus, king of India, he took a large elephant, which had fought valiantly for the king, and naming him Ajax, dedicated him to the sun with this inscription; 'Alexander, the son of Jupiter, has dedicated Ajax to the sun.' He was found with this inscription 350 years afterwards. Pigs have been known to live to the age of 30 years. The rhinoceros to 20. A horse has been known to live to the age of 65, but averages 25 to 30. Camels sometimes live to the age of 100. Stags are long lived. Sheep seldom exceed the age of 10, and cows live about 15 years. Cuvier thinks it probable that whales sometimes live 1000 years. Mr. Mallerion has the skeleton of a swan that attained the age of 200. Pelicans are long lived. A tortoise has been known to live to the great age of 107.

The Song of the Autumn Wind,

BY REV. EDWARD C. JONES.

Did you hear the stern wind as it swept through the woodland,
Whose rich leafy treasures it scattered afar?
Then listen—it speaks to the depths of the Spirit,
And freighted with music the syllables are.

I come like a minstrel the notes to awaken,
And out on Creation the melody fling,
My harp how majestic—the solemn old forest,
And each withered tree shall afford it a string.

Gone—gone are the flowrets—they bloomed but a season,
Imparted their nectar and vanished away,
Like Earth-Joys which ravish the heart of the dreamer,
The morrow entombing the bliss of to-day.

No green on the leaf—it is shrivelled and dusky,
Unheeded it floats on the face of the stream,
A type of the sad one who buffets the tempest,
When anguish succeeds to his halcyon dream.

Since last I awakened the Song of the Forest,
How riches have flown and how friends have betrayed,
How Faith has grown cold and how vows have been broken,
How Vice has entangled and Virtue decayed.

New graves have been hallowed and tears have enriched them,
Such tears as must issue unbribed from the eye,
When they who have twined like the tendrils around us,
Have turned from the hearthstone to sicken and die.

Yet Pilgrim—look up—though the Autumn hath dirges,
Spring beckons thee onward—Elysian Spring,
Where mortals put on the bright crown of the perfect,
And tune to the notes of Redemption the string.

If thy heart have the precepts of Jesus in keeping,
And Faith in the Saviour is making thee strong,
Thy dear ones—now round thee so tranquilly sleeping,
Shall mingle with thee in the Conqueror's Song.

Selections.

The poem below, is from the fourth edition of Dr. Lyons' "CHRISTIAN SONGS," just published by George S. Appleton, 164 Chesnut Street. It will be new to our readers, as it appears in the volume now for the first time.

A Welcome Sacrifice.

BY THE REV. JAMES GILBORNE LYONS, LL. D.

Vain is the blood of rare and spotless herds
Pastur'd in meads where blue Clitumnus shines,
Vain are sweet gums from lands that Indus girds,
Or diamonds sought in deep Brazilian mines,
Vain are Iberian fruits, and perfum'd flowers
Rich as a Grecian sunset's purest dyes,
If deem'd, when worship claims thy secret hours,
For HIM IN HEAVEN fit gift or sacrifice.

The flocks that roam on thrice ten thousand hills,
Each living thing that moves on shore and sea,
The gems and gold which gleam in caves and rills,
Saba's low shrub, and Lebanon's proud tree,
The fragrant tribes that spring on cliff and field,
That flush the stream, or fringe the smooth lake's brim,
Breathe, burn, and bloom, at His high will reveal'd,
And own with joy their Light and Lord in Him.

Our gains are His, and, laid before the Cross,
These must of our oblations form a part,
But oh! the choicest ores and gems are dross,
If brought without that pearl of price—THE HEART.
The poorest serf who fears a tyrant's nod,
Whose inmost soul hard bondage racks and wrings—
That toil-worn slave may send unseen to God
An offering far beyond the wealth of kings.

Come thou with breast from pride and passion freed,
Hands which no stain of guilt has ever soil'd,
Feet swift and strong for every gentle deed,
Faith, hope, and truth, by sordid crowds unspoil'd;
Come with a spirit full of generous love
For all beyond, and all below the skies;
Make ready thou, for Him who reigns above,
The Christian's gift—A LIVING SACRIFICE.

The Catacombs of Rome.

ART. VI.—The Church in the Catacombs: a description of the Primitive Church of Rome, Illustrated by Sepulchral Remains. By CHARLES MAITLAND, M. D. London: 1846.

There is an old Arabian fable, of a City whose inhabitants in an instant were turned to stone. The maiden at the fountain—the guest in the hall—the listless wanderer in the streets—all were arrested without a moment's warning, and in the posture in which the stroke found them, were transmuted at once into marble statues. And there the city stood in the desert, with the stillness of the grave resting on it, every thing unchanged as age after age swept over it. At last came a chance traveller, and for the first time in centuries its deserted streets echoed to the tread of human footsteps, as he wandered on through palace and temple, and hall, with none to answer his summons—none to oppose his entrance—gazing in wonder on the memorials of generations which had lived ages before, to the possession of which none had succeeded, and, therefore, they had remained unaltered.

In our day, the deserted cities of Herculaneum and Pompeii almost furnish a reality to this fable. There, we are at once transported back to the first century of the Christian era. We enter houses which it seems as if the lordly Roman had but just quitted. His paintings and statues, and manuscripts, are about us. The sentinel still stands at the post he dared not leave, even when the burning cinders were raining about him, and the skeleton rattles hollow in his armor—the strigil lies on the pavement of the bath, as the frightened slave dropped it, when he fled—and in the bed-room is the rouge with which the faded beauty of Pompeii once restored her charms. We see on all sides of us, the nature of that now forgotten civilization, which spreads its charm over these gay Campanian cities. The "great gulf" which separates us from the days of Pliny is bridged over. The intervening ages are forgotten. We live among those who for nearly eighteen centuries have been dust—we understand each arrangement of their domestic life—and it requires an effort to recall our minds to the realities of the living present.

What these long buried cities display to us of the social condition of the ancients, the Catacombs reveal with regard to the Church of that day. While we often read in the remains of Pompeii, a commentary on the lines of Juvenal or Horace, in the inscriptions which mark the tombs of the early Christians, we find a confirmation of much that was written by the Fathers of the first three centuries. The same spirit pervades these records graven in the rock, and the earnest words which these leaders of the Church sent forth to cheer their converts in the faith. The two harmonize in tone, and remain to rebuke the changes which after ages gradually brought about.

But the investigations of the Catacombs have been hitherto locked up from the great body of the public. The first publication on this subject was the work of Bosio, who had spent thirty years in its preparation. Yet he died before its completion, and it was edited by Severano, in the year 1632, under the title of Roma Sotterranea. The same work translated into Latin, and still further enlarged, was republished by Arringhi. Fabretti, who held the office of curator of the Catacombs, published a number of Epitaphs, and eighteen years afterwards another folio issued from the hands of his successor, Boldetti, entitled "Osservazioni sopra i cimiterii dei Santi Martiri." The last that appeared was the "Sculture e Pitture" of Bottari, which was devoted more especially to the Christian Arts. These works, however, though abounding in theological and antiquarian information, were written either in Latin or Italian, and of course useless to many who wished information on the subject.

The work we have placed at the head of this article, is the first attempt to bring this matter within the reach of the mere English reader. We confess, however, that we do not think very highly of it. The author seems to have felt very little enthusiasm for his subject; and we cannot conceive how any one, with the rich materials of Arringhi and Bottari before him, could have made so little of his theme. We think that most persons would rise from a perusal of the volume with a feeling of dissatisfaction. In addition to this, it is written too much in the book-making style, filled with discussions, which, although well enough in themselves, are out of place in a work where the subject is so wide that every page is needed to give even an outline. For instance, in treating of the inscriptions on the tombs of the Martyrs, forty-seven pages are used in a discussion of martyrdom in general, with accounts of those sufferings of the early Christians, which are familiar to every reader of Ecclesiastical History. This, in a book of only about three hundred pages is rather too great a waste of space, which might have been much more profitably employed. Dr. Maitland's work might, therefore, be cut down to almost one half its present size and still contain all the information it now does about "the Church in the Catacombs."

We propose as far as the narrow space of this article will admit, to give some account of these burial places of the early disciples of our faith, deriving our materials partly from the works we have enumerated above, and partly from personal recollection. In the struggle for the truth which now is waging—in that controversy we have with Rome, as to which holds the doctrines of the Primitive Church—we can appeal to these enduring inscriptions, written above the dust of the early Martyrs, and show that though dead they still speak as we do, and prove the identity of the faith we hold, with that for which Apostles suffered.

About two miles from the gates of Rome, on that same Appian Way, over whose pavements once the legions of victorious Rome marched on their way to the Capitol, and whose stones were bedewed with the tears of captive Princes, as they were dragged along to swell the glory of the triumph, stands the Church of St. Sebastian. Adjoining is the Monastery of the same name, and around it, far as the eye can reach, stretches the desolate Campagna. Here is the usual entrance to the Catacombs. There is another opening, indeed, at the Church of St. Agatha, but for some reason strangers are seldom permitted to enter it. The writer made many attempts while in Rome; but though several times promised admission by ecclesiastics, he never succeeded in effecting it. And such, he has found, was the testimony of all his friends. The only individual he has met with who was able to inspect the Catacombs of St. Agatha, was the late Thomas Cole, the Artist, from whom he received so interesting an account as to deepen his regret at his own failure. Mr. Cole represented these passages as being much richer in inscriptions and paintings than those of St. Sebastian, fewer having been removed from their original positions to be placed in the Gallery of the Vatican. Perhaps they bear more explicit testimony against the modern practices of Rome, and, therefore, are studiously kept concealed from the view of the curious.

There are also scattered over the Campagna, holes leading into the galleries below, which often prove dangerous to the incautious rider. D'Agincourt on several occasions availed himself of them to enter the passages. As they are all found in the Christian part of the Catacombs, they are probably apertures made for air or light. In the Acts of the Martyrs we find them spoken of as the luminaria cryptæ.

Taking one of the Monks of St. Sebastian for your guide, from a Chapel of the Church you can descend by the well worn stone-steps into the Catacombs below; and the contrast to the dark and damp caves, will be the greater from leaving the balmy Italian atmosphere above. Each member of the party furnished with a light, you follow your guide through intricate passages, which cross and re-cross, until he has gone his usual round and you are again at the foot of the steps. The passages wind around, apparently to follow the direction of the soft rocks, and the intricacy is increased by their generally being constructed in three stories, so that you constantly meet with steps which ascend or descend. They are usually not more than three feet wide, but at times they expand into Chapels, in one of which is still remaining a simple altar with an antique Cross in the rock above it. What solemn services must this spot have witnessed! How earnest the prayers which were here poured forth by men, whose faith was certain because they had received it from the lips of Apostles themselves, and glowed more brightly because they stood in jeopardy every hour! On each side of these passages are the tombs—excavations in the soft rock just large enough to contain a human body, and the cavity closed by a thin slab of marble. Sometimes the sepulchres are single, while in other places children are buried, as if a whole family had been interred on the same spot. Some of these have never yet been opened; but their buried inmates repose as they were laid to their rest in the first ages of our faith. In one case the marble has cracked, and inserting a thin taper, you can look on the mouldering remains of one who perhaps saw our Lord Himself in the flesh. Boldetti relates, that an odor of spices was perceived on opening some of these graves, and in the lateral branches of the Catacombs, he found unfinished sepulchres, or intended ones merely sketched on the walls.

On the slabs which closed the tombs, were cut the Christian emblems, which the early followers of our Lord so much delighted to use, and there too they scrawled the brief epitaphs by which in that age of fear and persecution they marked the resting place of their brethren. Every thing around speaks of the consecration of suffering, and of the simple earnest faith of men with whom the glories of the next world had swallowed up all the pains of their brief mortal pilgrimage. How far these passages extend is not known. They are said by some to reach from sixteen to twenty miles; but a small part only is now shown, in consequence of accidents which have taken place from persons losing their way, or the galleries caving in. Many of the lateral passages about St. Sebastian have been closed, yet still, should a sudden gust of air extinguish the lights of a party, it would not be very easy for them to trace their way out.

We can find allusions to these caves long before the Christian era. The great increase of Rome in the latter days of the Republic, led to the working of quarries in the immediate neighborhood to procure the materials necessary for building. The soil of the Campagna rests on tufa and puzzolana, a volcanic, sandy rock, easily quarried, and from its texture well adapted to the excavation of long galleries, while the Esquiline Hill was undetermined to obtain sand for making cement. Thus the whole sub-soil on one side of the city of the Cæsars, was perforated by a net-work of excavations, stretching out for miles in crypts and galleries. These subterranean works were referred to by Cicero in his oration for Cluentius, when Asinius, a young Roman citizen, was inveigled to the gardens of the Esquiline, and precipitated into one of the sand-pits—"in arenarias quasdam extra Portam Esquilinam." It was too in these caverns, Suetonius tells us. Nero was afterwards advised to conceal himself in his hour of danger! on which occasion he made answer to his freedman Phaon, "that he would not go under the ground while living."

Then came the advent of the Christian faith. The arenarii or sand diggers, and the workmen in the quarries, were persons of the lowest grade, and, from their occupation probably formed a distinct class. There is reason to suppose that Christianity spread very early among them; (were not its first followers everywhere the lowest in the social scale?) for in time of persecution, the converts employed in the subterranean passages not only took refuge there themselves, but also put the whole Church in possession of these otherwise inaccessible retreats. And may we not trace in all this the hand of a protecting Providence? The Church was about to enter the furnace of affliction, and to be encircled by the rage of the adversaries; here, then, had previously been provided a sure refuge, where it could abide until the storm was overpast. This was the cradle of the infant community. And perhaps we may go a step farther, and assert, that while the Church in Rome owed much of the rapidity of its triumph to the protection afforded by the Catacombs, as an impregnable fortress, from which persecution always failed to dislodge it, it was to the preservation of these, its earliest sanctuaries, that it was indebted for its ancient superiority in discipline and manners. That the Catacombs were, throughout, well known to the early Christians, is evident; for every part bears traces of their occupancy. We meet on all sides with tombs and chapels, paintings and inscriptions, and for three hundred years the entire Christian population of Rome found sepulture in these recesses.

St. Jerome speaks of them in the middle of the fourth century. "When I was at Rome"—says the Monk of Palestine—"still a youth, and employed in literary pursuits, I was accustomed, in company with others of my own age, and actuated by the same feelings, to visit on Sundays the sepulchres of the apostles and martyrs, and often to go down into the crypts dug in the heart of the earth, where the walls on either side are lined with the dead; and so intense is the darkness, that we almost realize the words of the Prophet, 'They go down alive into the Hades.' Here and there a scanty aperture, ill deserving the name of a window, admits scarcely light enough to mitigate the gloom which reigns below; and as we advance through the shades with cautious steps, we are forcibly reminded of the words of Virgil, 'Horror on all sides; even the silence terrifies the mind.'"

The Acts of the Martyrs relate many attempts made by the persecutors of the early Christians, to trace them in these retreats. But the entrances were so numerous, scattered for miles over the Campagna, and the labyrinths below so complicated, and blocked up in various places, that pursuit generally was useless. At other times, from above they overwhelmed the galleries with mounds of earth, to destroy those who were concealed within. Occasionally these efforts were successful, and the Catacombs became not only the burial place of the martyrs, but also the scene of their last sufferings. In the time of Cyprian, Xystus, Bishop of Rome, together with Quartus, one of his clergy, poured out their blood on this spot; and Stephen, another Bishop of Rome, was traced by the heathen soldiers to his subterranean Chapel. At the conclusion of the service, he was thrust back into his Episcopal chair, and thus beheaded. We do not take these instances from the ordinary accounts of the martyrologists, where every thing is so often exaggerated. They are found in the letters of the early Christians, given with a simplicity which shows their truth. Even as late as the year 352, during a temporary persecution by the Arians, Liberius, Bishop of Rome, took up his abode in the Cemetery of St. Agnes.

But three centuries passed by, and Christianity emerging, from these recesses, walked boldly on the soil, beneath which she had so long been glad to seek concealment. Yet ere long, the flood of barbarian invasion rolled over Italy, and amid the disorders which ensued, these sanctuaries of the ancient Church were gradually forgotten. It required constant use to preserve a knowledge of their intricate windings, and therefore a few only of the principal entrances were kept open. Even these gradually became neglected and blocked up by rubbish, until the Church scarcely remembered her ancient home. It was not until the sixteenth century that the entire range of the Catacombs was re-opened, after being untouched for more than a thousand years. Then, when the revival of letters enabled the learned to profit by the discovery, investigations commenced, which have been prosecuted to the present day, as the question as been agitated, whether Rome shall be permitted to claim identity in discipline and doctrine with those ancient disciples, who have thus bequeathed to us the memorials of their faith and sufferings.

Such is the history of these Catacombs. Within the last few years, most of the inscriptions have been removed to a Hall of the Vatican—the Lapidarian—where, to the number of more than three thousand, they are fastened to the wall.† Opposite to them are ranged in the same way, the monumental inscriptions of Pagan Rome, gathered from other places. "I have spent"—says Raoul Rochette—"many entire days in this sanctuary of antiquity, where the sacred and profane stand facing each other, in written monuments preserved to us, as in the days when Paganism and Christianity, striving with all their powers, were engaged in mortal conflict. And were it only the treasure of impressions which we receive from this immense collection of Christian epitaphs, taken from the graves of the Catacombs, and now attached to the walls of the Vatican, this alone would be an inexhaustible fund of recollections and enjoyments for a whole life."

It is interesting to mark the difference between the two sides of the gallery. The proud titles of Roman citizenship—the funeral lamentations—the traces of complicated political orders—are all neatly engraved; while the record of the Christians is often contained in an incoherent sentence, or a straggling mis-spelt scrawl, which betrays in its very execution, haste and ignorance. The latinity of these epitaphs would shock a classical reader—the orthography is generally faulty—the letters irregular—and the sense not always obvious. The first glance at the Christian side is enough to show, that, as St. Paul expresses it, "not many mighty, not many noble," were numbered among those, who, in the first age of our faith, were here laid to their rest. Such is the inscription:

τοπος φιλημονης

"The place of Philemon."

Roughly carved upon a slab, over which its letters straggle with no attention to order, it tells plainly that it was placed there by the members of a persecuted and oppressed community.

There is, too, a simplicity in most of these inscriptions, which does not mark the monuments of their adversaries. We copy a few of these:

BIRGINIVS PARVM
STETIT AP. N.

"Virginus remained but a short time with us."

VALERIA DORMIT IN PACE.

"Valeria sleeps in peace."

MARTYRIA
IN PACE.

"Materia in peace."

VIDALIO IN PACHE †

"Vidalio, in the peace of Christ."

But it is in the spirit of these inscriptions that we chiefly mark the contrast of our faith to that old and effete religion which it supplanted. No hope beyond the grave sheds its light over the Pagan monuments. The expression, DOMVS ETERNALIS—"An eternal home"—constantly appears. It is thus that the despair of a mother for her infant child is shown in one of the inscriptions of the Lapidarian Gallery:

ATROXO FORTVNA TRV CIQVAE FVNERE GAVDES
QVID MIHI TAM SVBITO MAXIMVS ERIPITVR.

"O relentless Fortune, who delightest in cruel death, Why is Maximus so early snatched from me?"

Even the noble philosophy of Greece seems to have left no trace in these epitaphs, nor do the glorious dreams of Plato, as he argued on the very verge of truth, seem to have dawned upon the minds of those who, in the Imperial City, thus laid the loved and lost in the tomb. A gloomy stoicism—a forced resignation—is the highest feeling we can discover. They turn to the life which is past, only with Epicurean regret, that its pleasures can be enjoyed no longer. Take, for instance, the anacreontic language in the following:

V. A. N. LVII.

D. M.

TI. CLAVDI. SECVNDI
HIC. SECVM. HABET. OMNIA
BALNEA. VINVM. VENVS
CORRVMPVNT. CORPORA
NOSTRA. SED. VITAM. FACIVNT
B. V. V.

"To the Divine Manes of Titus Claudius Secundus, who lived 57 years. Here he enjoys every thing. Baths, wine, and love ruin our constitutions, but—they make life what it is.

Farewell: farewell."

But no where can we trace any thing but calmness and peace among the inscriptions of the early Christians. Brief as they may be, they evidently look to a life beyond life. A light had risen to dispel the horror of darkness which had hitherto reigned over the grave; and while the first disciples had before them a view of the Eternal City, it is no wonder they were willing even to rush through the gate of martyrdom, that they might enter its starry portals. Death was to them like sinking to a gentle slumber; and often this is the only idea expressed in their short epitaphs.

DORMITIO ELPIDIS

"The sleeping place of Elphis."

VICTORINA DORMIT

"Victorina sleeps."

ZOTICVS HIC AD DORMIENDVM

"Zoticus laid here to sleep."

GEMELLA DORMIT

IN PACE.

"Gemella sleeps in peace."

Sometimes, too, they expressed still more fully their disbelief in the chilling doctrine of the annihilation of the soul, taught by Paganism, or the almost equally cheerless picture of an uncertain Elysium, which was the utmost that creed could teach them. This is a portion of the epitaph which Placas recorded above his wife, Albana, he says:

RELICTIS TVIS IACES IN PACE SOPORE
MERITA RESVRGIS TEMPORALIS TIBI DATA
REQVETIO

* Tableau des Catacombs—p. 10.

"You, well-deserving one, having left your (relations) lie in peace—in sleep. You will arise—a temporary rest is granted you."

With them, too, death was the admission into immediate joy. No visions of a Purgatory clouded the dying gaze of the early Roman Christians. They looked upon the soul as going at once to a place of refreshing, by means of God's presence. Epitaphs like this abound:

NICEFORVS ANIMA
DVLCIS IN REFRIGERIO.

"Neciphorus, a sweet soul, in the place of refreshment."

And is not this the same in its meaning as the following?

ARETVSA
IN DEO.

"Arethusa, in God."

Another, in memory of a child, containing the declaration:

ESSE IAMINTER INNOCNTIS COEPISIT

"You have already begun to be among the innocent ones."

Another employs the following paraphrase to mark the date of the death:

ACCERSITVS AB ANGELIS VII. IDVS IANVA

"Born away by angels on the seventh Ides of January."

And can we suppose that this expression, used by our Lord to describe the passage of Lazarus to the Paradise above, was here intended to imply a conveyance to expiatory flames?

The absence indeed, of every feeling but those of trust and hope, is most remarkable in these epitaphs. No word of bitterness is breathed even against their persecutors, by whom they were doomed to death. We distinguish the tombs of the martyrs, more by the emblems placed over them, than by the words of the inscriptions. We believe there is but a single instance of one representing a man torn in pieces by wild beasts. "To look at the Catacombs alone," says Rochette, "it might be supposed that persecution had there no victims, since Christianity has made no allusion to suffering." And then he goes on to contrast this spirit with that displayed in the adornment of some of the modern churches in Rome. "Perhaps I may be allowed to add, that a series of paintings, like those of St. Stefano in Rotondo, [a church in Rome,] filled with all the scenes of barbarity which the rage of executioners could devise, or the constancy of martyrs support, honors less the faith which inspires such images, or which resisted such trials, than the paintings of the Catacombs, generally so pure, so peaceful in their object and intention, where it seems that the gospel ought to have met with no enemies, appearing so gentle, so ready to forgive."*

Nor was the tone of these epitaphs changed when the days of persecution passed away, and the members of the Church were no longer obliged to eat the bread of life in secret, or drink the water of life mingled with bitter tears. No words of gratulation mark the inscriptions they recorded. They seemed in those solemn places to heed the world as little when it smiled upon them, as they did when suffering from its enmity. The Church was as little elated by triumph, as before it had been depressed by adversity.

The Parson.

PART V.

"I write not these things to shame you, but, as my beloved sons, I warn you."—1 Cor. iv. 14.

"And I beseech you, brethren, to know them which labour among you, and are over you in the Lord, and admonish you; and to esteem them very highly in love for their work's sake."—1 Thess. v. 12, 13.

WHO AND WHAT IS HE?

We showed in last chapter the important benefits which the Parson, in the reading-desk and the pulpit, confers on society and on individuals. Thus we might proceed through every office and duty in which the Parson ministers. Art thou a covenanted member of Christ's Church?—Whose authorized hand in baptism affixed the seal of that covenant ordained by Christ himself,—water, wherein you were baptized according to the command, in the name of the Father, and of the Son, and of the Holy Ghost? And, whose prayers were uttered to the throne of grace, that you might "lead the rest of your life according to this beginning?" The Parson's.

Have you, for this purpose, sought supplies of spiritual strength in the sacrament of the Lord's Supper? Who, as Steward of the Mysteries of Christ, hath invited you to this most comfortable sacrament of the body and blood of Christ, ministered these emblems of grace and love, and joined you in holy communion, and in partaking this spiritual food and sustenance? Who?—The Parson.

Are you wedded? Who blessed the nuptial tie, guarded it by the awful sanctions of religion, led thee, and thy bride, in united prayers for concord and happiness, and, as the minister, and in the name of God, forbade man to put asunder those whom God had joined together? The Parson.

Have you friends and neighbours? Who pours oil upon the waters of worldly strife and interests—and teaches those precepts which alone can unite and protect society? Who, but The Parson.

We have witnessed The Parson often, in his obscure and humble, but important work. We have witnessed him, advising, teaching, consoling, supporting, seeking the cottage of the poor and the afflicted, ministering to their necessities, and departing with their blessings. We have witnessed him, when the cold grave lay open to receive the poor mouldering remains of the earthly tabernacle, which had lately held the soul of one dear to a domestic circle. We have seen the weeping mourners bow and totter round it; we have heard the deep sobs of anguish, and the solemn tones of one announcing the only hope which can reach the soul of the bereaved—the hope that is in Christ Jesus—the resurrection and the life. Would the heart of the mourners then take pleasure, in hearing the scoffer mock “The Parson?”

† It is difficult to say how ancient some of these tombs are. Consular dates have been found, however, as early as A. D. 98, and as late as A. D. 400. During this time at least, the whole Christian population of Rome was interred there. As this period extends nearly a century after the establishment of Christianity under Constantine, the number must of been latterly very great.

We have witnessed “The Parson,” too, beside the sick and the death-bed. We have witnessed him when the sinner has been awakened from his dream of guilt and folly—when laughter has been exchanged for tears, and triumph for trembling—when the strong man has become like the child—when the blasphemer has become the suppliant—and, when he, who once despised, or hated, The Parson, turns to him as a friend, and looks to him for instruction and comfort. Consider this, ye scorers, while there is time; for to this ye may one day come, or to a state worse than this—the death-bed of the impenitent, the callous, the reprobate.

We have witnessed The Parson, too, when God's blessing has seemed to descend, like the dew of heaven, on his ministry, and on the awakened penitent—when new hopes, new thoughts, new faith, new love, seemed to have broken in upon the sinner's mind—when the work of God, in the mouth of the Parson, has brought him peace and joy. We have beheld the scene, when the pangs of disease, and the terrors of death, and the clouds that darkened the entrance to eternity, rolling back before the power of gospel truth and consolation, have proclaimed the sting torn from death, the victory snatched from the grave; and when the sinner's heart and voice have joined in acknowledging Jesus as the Christ, and that “there is none other name under heaven given among men, whereby we must be saved.”

Fearful, surely most fearful is the responsibility of him who rashly impedes the influence of the ministers of religion, and deprives the poor and ignorant of their best hope and consolation. Costly, indeed, will be the momentary triumph—dear bought the idle merriment that trifles with these all-important interests. He that desires to tear from the dying and the penitent the stay of religion—he that would dissolve the bonds of society—he that would raise the hand of every man against his brother—he that would have parents unnatural, and children disobedient, masters and servants at variance, rulers and people disunited, oaths made a mockery; honesty, and justice, and love, contemptible—he that would desire the execrations of man, and the wrath of God—let him—let the slaves and lovers of crime and human misery—but let not the friends of man, the disciple of Jesus, or the child of God—hold up to hatred, scorn or derision, “The Parson.”

The following additional extract from Dr. Nevin's work on “the Spirit of Sect and Schism,” though in type, was crowded out of our columns. It is too good to be lost.

It is a striking, though most sad, illustration of the inward falsehood of the Sect system, as now described, that in most cases the original grounds of separation, with the bodies thus divided, have lost, to a great extent, frequently indeed altogether, the interest which they had in the beginning; while notwithstanding the door remains just as much closed as ever, in each case, against reconciliation and union. Witness the fragments of the Scotch secession, mechanically transplanted to this side of the Atlantic. Witness the old antagonism of Lutheran and Reformed, as still kept up in the American German Church, while yet the Lutheran Confession, for the most part, has utterly surrendered its own original principle, and swung clear over the Calvinistic line itself on the opposite side. Is Methodism any longer faithful to its first idea and design? And then as regards the mass of our more upstart native Sects, how few of them, if they ever had any intelligible, distinctive theory to begin with, can be said to know or seriously care what it was, at the present time? It is the curse of sectarianism indeed that it cannot be truly historical; whilst, at the same time, history is the only enduring form of life; “das Fertige ist das Tote,”—what is done is necessarily also dead. The Sect life, sundering itself from the general consciousness of the Church, (uncatholic,) may start with vast show of spiritual freshness and vigor—like a divergent stream from the Euphrates or Tigris—but only, if it continue in such separate course, to lose itself ultimately in the sand, or settle into some stagnant pool, from which it can never afterwards accomplish its escape. The spirit expires gradually, in the arms of its own letter; the old terminology degenerates into sheer cant; and in place of the living witness that once gave utterance to some divine reality in the denominational creed, we have before us, finally a grim statue, or life-aping automaton at best, that simply parades in dumb show a sense which it has no longer any power to understand. It cannot be concealed, that into this judgment of Lot's wife our Sects, at least in a large part, are fast falling at the present time. And yet all this facilitates not, in the least, their return to any sort of catholic unity. There they stand over against each other, their original meaning for the most part gone, and yet they have no power in the world to come together. The system possesses no principle of cure or help, in its own nature. It has no tendency whatever, however remote, towards true catholicity. It is the very opposite of all organic Christianity. It is absolutely impotent to build up or unite, and mighty only to divide and destroy.

It is perfectly idle, in these circumstances, to remind us of the invisible hand, by which after all the true children of God, in the midst of all these divisions, are secretly drawn together. It is possible, no doubt, for this to prevail to some extent over the difficulty here thrown in its way. We are bound indeed to rejoice in the conviction, that there are at this time among our different denominations, very many truly catholic souls, in which habitually the sense of denominational peculiarity is kept subordinate to the sense of church wholeness, and whose full tendency is towards the great millennium, the “Church of the Future,” in which our existing captivity shall come finally to an end. But it is altogether plain, at the same time, that the exercise of such catholicity, as things now stand, is by no means easy; it runs against the natural bent of the Sect system itself, and can be maintained only with much self-discipline and prayer. And it is equally plain, that it has no place whatever in the mass of our Sect religion. It will not do to say: See how these Sects love one another, in the face of all their rivalry and outward separation! The “invisible” unity, we are told, is something deeper and stronger, than the denominational lines and landmarks that challenge the eye of sense. But if it be so, why should it not have force to make itself visible? Or is it only that which is comparatively weak and partial, in our interior life, that can be expected thus to clothe itself with corporeity and outward form? Alas, there is palpable contradiction, and gross hypocrisy, in the whole pretence. It is not possible for a true Church consciousness to exist, as the real ground-feeling of our religious life, the whole, of which all other forms of this life are only parts, without struggling at least towards a corresponding revelation of itself in an objective and visible form. To make the One, Holy, Catholic Church, a sheer invisibility, is just to convert it into an idealistic, Gnostic abstraction. Why not remand the Sect consciousness itself, into the same shadowy realm? Why not give us an invisible Lutheranism, Presbyterianism, Methodism, as well as an invisible Church Catholic?

It will not hold. Our sects, as such, do not love each other, and are not inwardly bound together as the case requires, by a force that is deeper and stronger than that which keeps them apart. With all of them, the Sect consciousness is something deeper than the Church consciousness, the sense of the universal is overpowered by the sense of the particular. An occasional shaking of hands fraternally on the platform of a Bible Society, or a melting season of promiscuous communion now and then around the sacramental board, fall short immeasurably of the true idea of catholic unity. There may be no open controversy. That belongs only to the first stage of the process; the heat of which after a short time, is found to cool down into a comparatively quiet form of hard, stiff tradition. But this want of controversy is itself, in such case, a sign commonly, that all real communion has come to an end, between the now mutually tolerant bodies. They have entered into different theological and ecclesiastical worlds, in which each has lost the power, to a great extent, of understanding the rest, or taking any interest in their affairs. Look at the “organs,” as they are called, the religious papers and reviews, of the several denominations, which represent and rule at the same time, the various currents of their life. What a melancholy isolation of interest, in each case more or less, to the one narrow island which measures the horizon of the single sect. Some reference there may be occasionally to foreign ecclesiastical facts, in the way of passing news. But how little of broad generous sympathy, with the affairs of God's kingdom as a whole. How little concern or power apparently, to forsake at any time the simply sectarian stand-point, and enter with hearty zeal into the cause of the universal Church, as a reality of infinitely more account than any fragment of it under a denominational form. Our Sects acknowledge one another indeed, for the most part, as true churches; a virtual confession, of course, that no one of them is complete by itself, and that they must flow together in some way, to be all that is comprehended in the idea of Christianity. But practically, all this is every day denied again and forgotten. Each affects, in fact, a measure of self-sufficiency and self-satisfaction, that leaves nothing to be sought or expected, in the way of complement, from abroad. All its thinking and working are conducted on the principle, that its mission is simply to carry out perpetually the sense and purpose of its own separate organization; precisely as though this were the true wholeness of Christianity, that must in the end swallow up the entire Church; without the least concern, as it would seem, to have the several confessional tendencies reconciled and united in a higher life, which may be found to be thus the universal truth of them all. The relation is one of mutual repulsion only, and exclusion.

How indeed should it be otherwise? The sect life must affect to be a full Church life, and cannot possibly prosecute its own supposed mission, in this form, with any sort of earnest zeal, without becoming in some way exclusive and aggressive. Here, for instance, is a new village of a thousand or fifteen hundred souls, in the far West. A single church and one faithful pastor, would be amply sufficient for all its spiritual wants. It has already perhaps two distinct congregations, acknowledging each other as evangelical and true churches. But there is a portion of “material,” that does not exactly belong to either; and soon accordingly, we have an effort to establish two or three additional chapels, each floating a new sectarian banner, brought thither by missionary activity on the part of so many different ecclesiastical bodies, which feel themselves bound in consistency, to push their own denominational “interest” into every nook and corner of the land. The five Sects thus struggling to keep foot on ground, broad enough only for the use of one, can never abide in true amity and love. Each is doomed, by inward necessity, to resist and undermine as much as possible all the rest. Alas, how fares it with all the sweet graces of the real Christian life, in such a case? Need we carry out the picture, in order to make it felt in the full measure of its unloveliness? But now that western village is only a naked revelation of the necessary working of the Sect spirit, latent if not overt, all the world over. Its natural and legitimate fruits, are those of the flesh only, and not those of the Spirit. Talk of its incidental advantages, its unhallowed rivalries and emulations overruled of God for good! The very thought, if employed to palliate the abomination, is profane. It belongs to the slang of the same ecclesiastical radicalism, which under a still lower form of thinking, would persuade us that temperance societies, mutual insurance fraternities, and other such schemes of moral utilitarianism, may safely be trusted to do the high work of Christ's one, Holy, Catholic Church. Worst of all, in this way, the sense of religion is itself blunted and its whole theory converted into falsehood. An unchurchly theology can never be rich and deep; and it lies in the very nature of the case also, that an unchurchly piety must be always more or less unsymmetrical and unfree, if not absolutely a harsh parody upon its own name. Sect religion can show itself pure and strong, only by rising with inward effort above its proper native sphere. Remaining in this sphere, its tendency is always to run into hypocrisy and cant.

The First Birth, the First Minister, &c.

The first white child born in North America was Virginia, daughter of Ananias and Eleanor Dare, and granddaughter of Governor John White. She was born on the 18th of August, 1587, in Roanoke, North Carolina. Her parents were of the expedition sent out by Sir Walter Raleigh, in that year. There is no record of her history, save that of her birth.

The first minister who preached the gospel in North America was Robert Hunt, of the Church of England, an exemplary man, who came out in the same company with Capt. John Smith, in the year 1607. He was much esteemed as a man of peace, and was in many ways useful to the colony.—There is no record of his death, or of his returning to England; he most probably died at Jamestown. He had a good library, which was burnt, with all his other property, in the burning of Jamestown, the next winter after he came out.

The first females who came to Virginia proper, were Mrs. Forest, and her maid, Anne Burras, in the expedition of Newport, 1608.

The first marriage in Virginia was in the same year—John Laydon to Anne Burras. The ceremony was probably by the same “good Master Hunt.”

The first intermarriage between the whites and Indians was John Rolfe to Pocahontas, in April, 1613. Pocahontas was also the first of the Virginia Indians that embraced Christianity and was baptized.

The first Legislative Assembly in Virginia met in July, 1649, at the summons of Governor George Yeardley. One month later, negroes were first brought into the colony by a Dutch man-of-war.

The first Periodical in North America was the Boston News Letter, which made its appearance in August, 1705. The first in the Old Dominion was The Virginia Gazette, published at Williamsburgh, by William Parks, weekly, at fifteen shillings. It appeared in 1736, and was long the only paper published in the colony. Slavery preceded the periodical press by 147 years.

The Blue Ridge was first crossed by whites in 1714. The first Iron Furnace erected in North America was by Governor Spotswood in 1830, in Spottsylvania county, Virginia.

These items are taken from Charles Campbell's History of Virginia, a book which more abundantly in matters of fact, and in which there are fewer inaccuracies, than any history our country has produced.—Watchman and Observer.

FESTIVAL OF CORPUS CHRISTI AT MONTREAL. The Witness, in the course of remarks upon an article in the Melanges Religieux, gives the following particulars:—“In accordance with this piece of bravado, and in direct contrast with the quiet manner in which they were allowing the procession of the Fete Dieu to dwindle away for two or three years past, great preparations were made for the show of yesterday. Green boughs and flags lined the streets, triumphal arches and huge crosses of the same were here and there conspicuous, and altogether appearances indicated great activity through the previous night. But lo! when all things were now ready, and the hour for forming the procession had come, the rain began to pour down from heaven in torrents, as if for the express purpose of hindering the daring impiety which pretends to place the Creator and Ruler of the universe under the charge of a priest, and this lasted all the time that the procession usually occupies. In former years, in case of rain, the procession was held within the church, from which, by the by, it ought never to emerge; and we fondly thought that in this case also the city would be spared from the gigantic Sabbath desecration, but the priests were not to be balked in this way. The afternoon proving fine, they fulfilled their original intention, and such a multitude has seldom been witnessed in our usually quiet streets. The thoroughfares were completely crammed with the procession and its hangers-on, and the cross streets were crowded with the latter running from one point to another in order to obtain a more favourable view, whilst all the bells jangled and pealed with more than ordinary energy.”

ITALY.—Pius IX. and Protestantism in Italy.—In consequence of an attempt recently made to introduce Protestantism into Italy, and even into Rome itself, the Pope has taken the opportunity of the centenary of the death of St. Joseph Calasanzio, founder of the Fathers of the Ecoles Pies, to make a public declaration of Anti-Protestantism to the following effect:—“It is distressing to see that in our day men have been found audacious enough to attempt to introduce, by thousands and tens of thousands of accomplices, Protestantism into all Catholic Italy, yeas, even into the centre of Christendom itself. Whilst professing the most ardent love for Italian nationality, they employ in its service an abominable means, directly calculated to destroy it. At the moment when Germany, animated by a similar spirit, confesses that religious differences are the greatest obstacle to the attainment of the end in view, so much so that the very Protestants form projects of union, there are in Italy men who, not afraid to cause an immense religious scandal, as well as political danger pretend to aim at National Unity by means of the pestilential seed of separation from the unity of the faith. Such is the blindness of passion. Let us pray God to dispel this darkness, and confiding in the divine promises, let us bear in mind that the gates of hell shall not prevail against the Church.”

“To admire a preacher, is such a reward of his pains and worth, as if you should crown a conqueror with a garland of roses, or a bride with laurel.”

How much pain have those evils cost us that have never happened.

A KEY TO THE PRAYER BOOK. Such is, in part, the title of a work set forth as "their first publication, by the executive committee of the Protestant Episcopal Society for the promotion of evangelical knowledge." Although this re-publication had been sent to us for notice, yet, acting upon an anxious desire to avoid needless controversy, we had resolved to let it pass for what it is worth, leaving those who saw fit to read it to form their own opinions of its merits.

But a careful examination has impressed us with the conviction, that it is our duty to point out some of the peculiar teachings of this work, to put those on their guard who may be misled by the seeming authority with which its contradictions and errors are endorsed.

This republication, in itself of little consequence, derives a fictitious importance from the fact that it is the "first publication" of the Society whose initials are impressed upon its cover. This Society itself challenges our unwilling notice because it sets itself up in the Church, not only as the sole Teacher of evangelical truth, but as the Condemner of all who dissent from its peculiar views. Its first publication is something more, therefore, than "a Key to the Prayer Book," it is also a key to the opinions and doctrines maintained by the Society under whose auspices it is issued. This becomes more evident from the fact that the American publishers occasionally differ from the English author. In some cases where the English book is particularly weak there the American editors have still more diluted it. An instance of this appears in the 15th and 16th pages. The author says:

"A Church is a society of professing Christians,* who have the pure word of God preached among them, and the ordinances of divine appointment duly administered. Such is the definition of a Church, as given in our Articles and authorized standards; and it agrees in the main, with the views held on this subject by the Fathers of the Reformation. It is the lowest idea we can form of a Christian Church, consistently with scripture truth; and is obviously framed on the enlarged and liberal design of comprehending all those bodies of Christians, which worship God in an orderly manner, use the outward form of the sacraments, and hold by the fundamental principles of the Christian faith.

"These are recognized by us as true Churches of Christ, so far as that their administration of Baptism is held by our Church to be valid, and is therefore never repeated; whatever errors in doctrine or discipline, not subverting the fundamentals of Christianity, they may have fallen into. We receive them, as far as they appear to us to have received the scriptural model of a Church, and to have been with our ourselves received by Christ. But all such societies are not held to be true Churches of Christ in the fullest sense of the word, so that we may safely hold communion with them; some being erroneous in one respect, and some in another."

Upon which the American editors make the following contradictory note:

* "The visible Church of Christ is a congregation of faithful men."—Art. xix. "A certain multitude of men."—Nowell's Catechism. "The true Church is an universal congregation or fellowship of God's faithful and elect people."—Hom. xxviii. 2. "A Church is a Society; that is, a number of men belonging unto some Christian fellowship, the place and limits whereof are certain."—Hooker, Ecc. Pol. iii. 1 (14.) "A Religious Society," v. 68, (6)."

"The author is not understood here as asserting, that some of these societies are not true churches in the fullest sense of the word. Respecting those that hold 'the fundamentals of Christianity,' but differ from us in ecclesiastical order—it would, no doubt, correspond with his views to acknowledge them as fully true churches, but yet not to regard them as holding the same amount of Scriptural truth with ourselves, nor as having equally excellent institutions."

It is not our intention to indulge at present in any extended remarks, but rather to point out a few of the discrepancies, leaving our intelligent readers to judge for themselves.

On page 23 the author says, "It is a fearful thing to divide Christ's Church into parties, and to separate ourselves from its unity," and then saves his American editors the trouble of qualification by adding, "yet we dare not on the other hand, confine this unity to our own communion." This sounds to us very much like "a bull," not Papal, but Hibernian! How there can be "unity" without "communion" we are puzzled to understand.

Upon page 48, chapter 3rd, we were delighted to read the following admirable remarks of this Evangelical Teacher upon "the daily service"—

"The first service in our Prayer Book is 'the order for daily Morning and Evening prayer.'"

"The reason of a daily service is founded upon the order of nature, which seems daily to present a fresh call to acknowledge God's providential mercies—'They are new every morning.' The ancient people of God daily offered their morning and evening sacrifice; and while we are so far before them in religious privileges, shall we come short of them in grateful and devout acknowledgment? If their typical offerings were a 'sweet savour' unto the Lord, so that on these occasions He promised to 'meet with the children of Israel,' by a peculiar manifestation of his 'glory,' how much more assuredly shall our 'spiritual sacrifices' of prayer and praise be 'acceptable to God' through the atonement of Christ? David teaches us to regard prayer as a daily service, when he says, 'Let my prayer be set forth before thee as incense; and the lifting up of my hands as the evening sacrifice.' Though driven from the courts of the Lord, he purposed to be as regular at his devotional services, as the Priests were in offering their sacrifices and burning incense before Him. In like manner, our blessed Lord, in the form of prayer which He taught his disciples, evidently implied a daily repetition of it, in the words, 'Give us this day our daily bread.'"

"Nor will it suffice, in all cases, to perform our morning and evening devotions in private. 'No Christian,' says Bishop Hall, 'will think it enough to pray alone.' The first disciples 'continued daily with one accord in the temple,' doubtless attending its appointed services, at the accustomed hours of prayer. And St. Paul exhorts the Hebrew Christians 'not to forsake the assembling of themselves together,' in public worship, even at a time when such meetings might expose them to reproach and danger from cruel persecutors. Thus we find that the Primitive Church regularly kept up her public services, first on the Lord's Day, and afterwards on every day of the week.

"Surely it is reasonable, that, as we daily receive common mercies, so we should daily acknowledge them in Common Prayer. And, as we daily need fresh supplies both temporal and spiritual, for our public as well as private wants, we should daily approach the 'Throne of Grace' together, through our Great High Priest. And as there are special promises joined to Public Prayer, and special advantages attendant upon it, so by its habitual neglect, we inflict injury upon others as well as upon ourselves.† But although this service of our Church was designed to be used daily in public worship, where circumstances would admit of it; it does not appear that it was ever intended to supersede the use either of Private or Family Prayer. And though it was appointed for every day in the week, yet suitable additions are provided for the Sabbath service; thus marking off that day, which is emphatically the Lord's, so as to distinguish it from all the rest."

Now, thought we, this important question is settled in the church. A Christian may now be found daily in the Temple at the hour of Prayer without thereby exciting doubts of his evangelical character! But our pleasure soon received a painful check when we found the English evangelical author condemned by his American evangelical editors, in the following terms:

"[With such an advocate of daily public service as our Author, the Committee feel that, in sentiment, they have scarcely any, and that in practice they would have no disagreement. In the present condition of society, few, who will duly follow the Author's judicious advice—never to allow attendance on public worship in the week to encroach upon domestic and private religious duties—would be able to engage in the daily service of the Church. 'It may be doubted whether it is practicable to restore the daily public worship of God.' Still, the fear seems authorized, that a praiseworthy admiration of our Church institutions may have led our Author here to advocate that, which if the ecclesiastical authorities ever contemplated, they at least left optional, and which has been unprofitable in its use, and is becoming partizan in its character. All that the heading of the Morning and Evening Prayer would seem to imply, is that, whenever public worship happened to held on any day, the following service was prescribed. Custom, too, has sanctioned this construction; and a wide observation leads to the fear that, excellent as the Liturgy is in itself, yet its habitual use, when unaccompanied by the preached word, is apt to degenerate into formality.

† Hooker judiciously remarks:—"The good which we do by public prayer, is more than in private can be done, for that besides the benefit which is here, is no less procured to ourselves, the whole Church is much bettered by our good example; and consequently, whereas secret neglect of our duty in this kind is but only our own hurt, one man's contempt of the Common Prayer of the Church, may be, and oftentimes is, most hurtful unto many."—Ecc. Pol. v. 24.(2).

"Nor will our Author's Scriptural proofs bear scrutiny. St. Paul's exhortation to the Hebrews, 'not to forsake the assembling of themselves together,' will scarcely be regarded as requiring daily meetings. And the first disciples 'continuing daily in the temple,' under extraordinary circumstances, and under great religious excitement, cannot be pleaded as an example of every-day life. If so, they who advocate the phalantery and a community of goods, will not be without Scripture warrant. (See Acts ii. 44—46.) Indeed, our Author admits, and Bingham proves, that the daily service was not set up until the third century, when inspiration had ceased, and when error and form had too much displaced the truth and power of the Spirit.

"While, however, the Committee in this connection, express themselves thus, they cannot but regret that such weekday services as the condition of society allows, are not more common, and better attended. With all that pray for the peace and prosperity of Jerusalem, too, they would look forward with hope to that millennial state, when the curse of labor being at least partially removed, we can perpetually spend our time in the temple, beholding the fair beauty of God."

We were surprised to find after this the following note on page 62, taken from another "Key" i. e. the Preface to the English Prayer Book.

2 Tim. iii. 15. "They (the ancient Fathers) so ordered the matter, that all the whole Bible, (or the greatest part thereof,) should be read over once every year; intending thereby, that the clergy, and especially such as were ministers in the congregation, should (by often reading, and meditation in God's word) be stirred up to godliness themselves, and be more able to exhort others by wholesome doctrine, and to confute them that were adversaries to the truth; and further, that the people, (by daily hearing of Holy Scripture read in the Church) might continually profit more and more in the knowledge of God, and be more inflamed with the love of his true religion."—Preface to Prayer-Book.

On page 52 we find the following American dilution of the author's plainer English. The words in brackets were interpolated by the Committee:

"That [species of] forgiveness is authoritatively declared by the Priest, in the following Absolution, which was 'directly levelled against Popery,' though, to some ears, it may carry a Popish sound. For, while the deluded votaries of Rome are taught to believe that the Priest has power to forgive sins; our Church here proclaims to all her members that she owns no other power than that which Christ bestowed upon his ministers, 'to declare and pronounce to his people, being penitent, the Absolution and Remission of their sins.'"

On page 104 we find the following in reference to the observance of the Saints' days as expressly ordered by the Church in the Prayer Book. Such "a Key" would certainly open a wide door in the church's appointed services!

"If then the observance of Saints' Days in our Church has fallen into neglect, considering the tendency there is in some quarters to an indiscreet, if not superstitious, attachment to human ordinances, we are not anxious to see any forcible attempts made to restore their regular and uniform observance. But, at the same time, we cannot join in an idle clamour against those who, in compliance with the Rubric, observe these days in due order, and endeavour to improve them by a suitable and scriptural application of sound doctrine."

This weak text the American editors dilute with the following note:

"A unanimous voice exists in our Church, in favor of commemorating the leading facts in our Saviour's history, and of considering the fundamental doctrines of the Gospel, upon set days. But of however strong a defence the permission to her members by our Church to celebrate the lives and characters of a few Scriptural saints upon appointed festivals, may be susceptible, it yet seems to be a partial selection among a host of equals, and would appear, among its observers, to be a custom not desirable in its practical effects."

We are obliged to reserve for the next Banner, two or three remarkable extracts, upon most important points, as they call for more extended remarks than our present space will allow. We were surprised to find that the doctrine of baptismal regeneration is freely admitted to be the teaching of the Prayer Book, but our astonishment became much greater when we found "Calvinism" supplying the "Key" to unlock this mystery. Yet we were affected with still greater surprise when we found, as we shall show our readers, that the whole ground is given up, on which the proof of Episcopacy rests, in a work published by a "Protestant Episcopal Society."

"FLOATING CHURCH MISSION."

"The anniversary of the 'Churchmen's Missionary Association for Seamen of the Port of Philadelphia,' was held on Tuesday the 24th inst., in St. James' Church."

In the absence of the Bishop, who takes a lively interest in this important Mission, the Rev. Dr. Dorr presided. This office fully devolved upon the Rector of Christ Church, as this old and noble parish has the chief honor of beginning and carrying on this blessed enterprise.

The annual report, and it was a very interesting one, was read by J. C. Booth, Esq. After this an address was delivered by the Rev. Mr. Parker, the Minister of the floating church of our Saviour in New York. The zeal and earnestness of this Reverend gentleman, and the interesting facts produced by him to show the hopefulness of the cause, secured the deep attention of the large congregation, and excited a feeling in behalf of sailors which, we trust, may be permanent.

The Rev. Dr. Coleman next addressed the meeting, and his eloquent remarks made a deep impression upon the audience.

The Rev. Mr. Parker was called upon to give some account of the daring and noble acts of humanity of Frederick Jerome, the sailor who saved the lives of fifteen fellow beings from the burning wreck of "the Ocean Monarch" at the imminent risk of his own. The presence of this noble specimen of a sailor, who happened to be in the city, gave deeper interest to the meeting. At the close crowds pressed round him to shake hands with him. He seems not in the least spoiled by praise, another proof that he is, what he has shown himself to be, a man of noble heart.

During the collection, the Managers for the ensuing year were elected, and the Annual Report ordered to be printed.

A very large congregation were present, and altogether the meeting was a most successful one, and, we hope, has excited an interest in the spiritual welfare of seamen which must have a blessed result.

The collection amounted to $200. In addition to this, the Treasurer acknowledges the receipt of $50, from Christ Church. Will not other churches contribute towards the $2000, still needed to pay for the Floating Church?

Nashotah.

THE FOURTH HUNDRED DOLLARS PROMISED, SIX HUNDRED MORE ONLY WANTING.

We have great pleasure in publishing the following note

EDITOR OF THE BANNER, SIR:—

A MEMBER OF TRINITY CHURCH, CLEVELAND, OHIO, will see forthcoming the Fourth one hundred dollars of the one thousand dollars proposed to be raised for Nashotah, by your correspondent "W. I. K.," provided the remainder be contributed.

If any of our readers are disturbed by our frequent references to this matter, we can put them in the way of quieting the subject. We confess that our designs are venal, and our silence can only be obtained by money! Still we are not seeking for ourselves. Let six more unite in the proffer of one hundred each, and not another word, but expressions of deep and grateful feelings, shall be heard.

We feel deeply the importance of the case, yet not too deeply for the sacred interests concerned. Lest any should thus judge, we beg to lay before them, some of the facts of the case.

We will state, in the first place, that the appeals made in the Banner have not been prompted by any one immediately concerned in Nashotah. The Reverend Principal and his fellow-laborers have rather desired to go on quietly in their noble work. We have the pleasure of assuring those who have willingly contributed their means, that the temporary difficulty, for which their aid was asked, has been relieved by their bounty.

The object now in view is to enlarge this important institution, and to give it greater capacity for usefulness. A plan of building is now preparing which will be admirably adapted for a Mission of this nature. The plan admits of a series of buildings, costing each $1000, enabling them to erect a permanent part of a whole for every thousand dollars, all in keeping with architectural rules. It is for the first of this series we are soliciting contributions.

The Institution is now chartered, and an admirable Act of Incorporation has been given to it by the Legislature of Wisconsin, conferring upon Nashotah all the powers of a University. This Missionary College consists of Four departments, viz: The Theological; the Collegiate; the Academical and the Primary; which last is equivalent to a Parochial School. The first is self-supporting, and it alone admits of labour, manual or by teaching. There are thirty Divinity Students now in the Theological School, and at this moment others are expected, and they have no place for them. But this department distinct from the others (as the others are to be from one another) in location and government, is absolutely self-supporting at the $25 per year, when clothing is furnished from abroad, or at $75 per year, when it is furnished by the Institution—thus at this moment Wisconsin could readily support fifty Divinity Students. The fourth, or the primary, has been for some time in active operation, and counting forty children from the surrounding country. This school is taught by the Divinity Students, and supports itself and teachers by the payment required for tuition. The Academical Department has as yet no building. Many others have applied to enter from New York and South Carolina, but for the want of buildings have been discouraged. There are sixteen youths from abroad, who are boarding in families living upon or near the Mission grounds. These for the present attend the instructions given to them at the Primary school. This is a pay school, and by this several of the young men in the Divinity Department having a taste for teaching, and possessing the art of governing youth, will be employed, and thereby support themselves. Thus by the first Department they hope to accomplish in a yet greater degree that which has been so successfully begun.—The Plan is to educate and train for the church, the little child, the youth and the young man, employing the Divinity Students to effect that, which would otherwise require a number of paid teachers to do, and yet the Divinity Student is effecting for himself that which he could not apart from the system. Some can teach, others can exercise a supervision, and the school itself, (situated at some distance from the Divinity grounds,) at all times look up to the Theological Department, whose influence has already drawn the secular students into its own ranks. Thus, they wisely hope, by the continued blessing of Almighty God upon their efforts to raise up a happy instrument for the spread of true Christianity throughout the wild and far extended west.

Who will not desire to aid so wise and good a plan?

AN OLD DOCUMENT.—A friend has kindly shown us the original of the following certificate. We have thought it worthy of record not only because of its historical interest, but as recalling to mind an excellent practice of good old times. How few merchants think now of travelling with such a letter of credit? And would it not extend the just influence of our holy religion, and bring its divine power to bear more upon the concerns of life, if Christian merchants sought such certificates as the strongest and best evidence of character? And would there not be less deception if men, in dealing with strangers, required such passports to their confidence as the following?

We the Rector, Assistant Ministers, and Church-Wardens, of the United Episcopal Churches of Christ Church and St. Peter's, in the city of Philadelphia, do hereby certify that the bearer Mr. —, Merchant, is a respectable member of our Church, that he has resided several years amongst us, and that his whole conduct, so far as it has come under our notice, has been that of a sober, honest and virtuous citizen, and a serious and exemplary Christian.

Signed, JACOB DUCHE, Rector.

THE RETREAT, A BOARDING AND DAY SCHOOL FOR YOUNG LADIES. This institution, which is under the supervision of the Bishop of Pennsylvania, will open for the next term, on the 1st of November. The particulars will be found in the advertisement.

This school has the advantages of a beautiful and healthy situation, and is, we are informed by good authority, under the control of excellent discipline, and enjoys the instruction of well qualified teachers.

It is, moreover, situated in the Parish of St. James the Less, and the pupils have the benefit of attending service in that simple and beautiful church.

CHURCH OF THE CRUCIFIXION.—We noticed a short time ago this interesting Mission. We now give the particulars, of its operations and its wants. We trust that the urgent necessities, temporal and spiritual, of these destitute people will call forth the charity of our citizens. The dreary wilds of Africa cannot present more fearful destitution, than that which shrouds in the darkness of vice and irreligion in large population in the very heart of this Christian City.

The Church of the Crucifixion originated in an effort made by some pious laymen, in the winter of 1846, in behalf of the coloured population in the Southern part of the city. They first organized a Bible Class, at which there was an average attendance of about 16 persons; and this may be said to be the commencement of the Sunday School now in operation. Soon after this a Mission was commenced, and the service of several of the city clergy procured. To give greater efficiency to the undertaking, it was placed under the charge of the Rev. Mr. Jones, whose labours were of much service in establishing the Mission. From the 1st of January 1848 to the following June, the Mission was without the regular services of the Church; but the Sunday School has been continued without intermission from its commencement to the present time, and now numbers about 60 scholars. In June last the Rev. Mr. Shannon accepted a call from the vestry, and is now engaged in the work.

The Mission is in a very flourishing condition, and affords much encouragement to those engaged in this good work. At our last communion 8 persons, the fruit of our effort, partook of the holy sacrament, and we hope that when this season next arrives, several more will be added to this number. A more suitable building, than that now used, is needed, and an effort will soon be made to procure funds to erect a Church.

By the kindness of our friends, we were enabled last winter to provide clothing and some of the necessities of life for a large number of persons adjacent to the Mission, and thus secure their attendance at the Sunday School and the stated services of the Church. To the same kindness we now appeal, and we trust that our appeal may not be in vain. Any donations of money, goods, or groceries, or cast off clothing for men, women, or children, will be faithfully applied. Contributions may be sent to

New Publications.

We have received a neat pamphlet containing THREE ADDRESSES, DELIVERED AT THE COMMENCEMENTS OF THE COLLEGE OF ST. JAMES, MARYLAND, by John B. Kerfoot, A. M. Rector, &c. We shall notice this pamphlet more fully. At present we can only acknowledge its receipt, as well as that of the JOURNAL OF THE SIXTY-FOURTH CONVENTION of the Diocese of NEW YORK, and some beautiful books for children from Mr. George S. Appleton, corner of Chesnut and Seventh sts.

Foreign Intelligence.

We are always struck with the brief and admirable summaries of general news, setting forth the condition of the various nations, which is found every week in the columns of the English Churchman. We take the following from the number last received.

The greater part of the continent of Europe is still in a very feverish and unsettled state. In Prussia, the regal authority is almost at an end, and Austria is even in a worse position. What with the revolution in Lombardy, the dissensions between the Hungarians and Croats, and the Republicans in Vienna, the Emperor is nearly powerless.

The revolution in Baden has been put down, only to show fresh symptoms of breaking out in Wurtemberg and Bavaria. Russia is striving to turn the disturbances in Moldavia and Wallachia to her own advantage.

The armistice continues in the North of Italy; and in the South the King of Naples, after accepting the Anglo-Gallican mediation, is trying to re-conquer the island of Sicily.

The question of the Presidency is causing great excitement in France. As it is almost certain to be decided that the President shall be elected by Universal Suffrage, and as such an election would be likely to cause an outbreak, the Government are striving to put off the evil day as much as possible. In the meantime, General Cavaignac will remain in power, and the state of siege will continue in Paris.

The Duchess of Montpensier has presented the Spaniards with an heiress presumptive to the throne. This event will only cause the ruin of Isabella and of the whole Christina clique. The majority of Spaniards, especially the Basques, will never submit to French domination; and ultimately Don Carlos will be restored to his rights. The secret is the fucros. By these fucros every Province in the North of Spain is, in fact, a little Republic under a nominal King; and the people know King Stork too well to take him for King Log. It would be amusing to see Espartero and Narvaez, Isabella and Montpensier, Louis Philippe and Louis Blanc, all here together. Yet this is quite possible; and perhaps Cavaignac and Louis Napoleon may complete the party.

In short Europe is in a transition state. The spread of cheap publications has taught the Proletaire class that they ought to act a different part in society. They will be hewers of wood and drawers of water no longer. But, alas! the cheap press has not taught them how to act their part, nor has it taught their superiors how to meet the crisis. The only safety for the Aristocracy at present is to put the millions in a more easy and comfortable position. But in France and Germany they are keeping up the debts and taxes; and, whilst these last, peace cannot be. All sorts of absurd theories will continue to be broached, and Communists and Red Republicans throw society into ultimate anarchy. Neither party seems to have sense to see either the real root of the evil, or its practical cure; and until they do, anarchy of mind and of rule must prevail. The Jew Banker Fould, and Raspail, the Quack Doctor, are true types of the delusions now prevalent.

In England, the Chartists have been found guilty, and sentenced to transportation for life. This by some has been considered too severe a punishment, no doubt from feelings of consideration for O'Brien and the other Irish rebels, whose trials are now proceeding.

WHITEHALL, SEPT. 27.—The Queen has been pleased to grant to the Rev. Samuel Hinds, Doctor in Divinity, the dignity of the Dean of the Cathedral Church of Carlisle, void by the death of the Rev. Dr. John Antony Cramer, late Dean thereof.—Gazette of Friday.

Dr. Hinds has been for some time, Rector of Castlenock near Dublin and Chaplain to Lord Clarendon.

We take the following rather amusing "item" from the (London) Guardian. They have evidently seen nothing and heard nothing of the Bishop's five hundred dollar shield.

Dr. Hughes, the Roman Catholic Bishop of New York, has strongly censured many of his flock for partaking in the late meetings expressive of sympathy with the Irish rebels.

The following is an abstract of the important topics discussed in the Bishop of Oxford's late charge. We have also, in the Guardian, a Report of the charge itself, and as some parts are of General interest, we shall give them in a future paper.

The Lord Bishop of Oxford commenced his Primary Visitation last week, and delivered his Charge; but as we have not seen any report of this document which appears to us to do justice to the eloquent and nervous language for which his Lordship is so distinguished, we shall await the not very distant publication of the authorized version before we present any extracts to our readers. Meanwhile, we may mention the principal topics to which his Lordship adverted:—

1. The office and work of a Bishop, and his intercourse with the Clergy and Laity of his Diocese. His Lordship announced his intention of systematically attending the Services of the several Churches, so as to promote this intercourse, and also of inviting the Clergy of the Rural Deaneries to his residence, for mutual prayer and counsel.

2. The Correction of Clerks' Bill, and the proposed New Test of Heresy, which latter his Lordship expressed his belief would not be carried.

3. The Education of the people, and the Management Clauses. Diocesan Training Schools. The importance of diligent Clerical superintendence of Parochial Schools.

4. The rite of Confirmation, and the duties of the Clergy in connection with it. Fitness for that rite, and an intention of becoming Communicants immediately on its administration, would be regarded by him irrespective of mere age.

5. Controversy. Baptismal Regeneration, upon which, if the report be essentially correct, we fear his Lordship was not sufficiently clear and decisive, he being, apparently, more anxious to stop both parties, than to decide which or what was right.

6. The Clergy and their flocks, especially the poor. Pews. Churchwardens. Frequent (if practicable, daily) Public Services. Catechising. Holy Communion.

7. Sports and worldly amusements which his Lordship considered were inconsistent with the Clerical character, and with beneficial influence among the people.

8. St. Augustine's College, and other hopeful signs in the Church.

OHIO CONVENTION.—We have already given in part, the proceedings of this Convention.

The following Committees were elected.

Standing Committee.—Rev. M. T. C. Wing, Rev. S. A. Bronson, D.D., Rev. J. T. Brooke, D.D., C. Delano, M. W. Stamp, H. L. Thrall.

Trustees of the Episcopate Fund.—William K. Bond, David K. Este, Salmon P. Chase.

Sunday School Committee.—Rev. G. D. Gillespie, Rev. G. W. Dubois, Rev. A. Blake, William Wood, W. Van Hamm, J. R. Swan.

Missionary and Education Committee.—Rev. M. T. C. Wing, Rev. S. A. Bronson, D.D., Rev. N. Badger, Rev. T. M. Smith, E. Alling, M. W. Stamp, H. L. Thrall, M. White.

The following resolutions were adopted in relation to the sale of the lands of Kenyon College. It is a matter upon which there seemed to be much difference of opinion. A correspondent of the "Western Episcopalian" complains that it was "pushed through the Convention without sufficient discussion."

Whereas, The property of the Theological Seminary and Kenyon College remains burdened with a debt, the interest of which by diminishing the annual income, seriously interferes with the regular payment of the present limited salaries of College officers, and prevents such repairs as are indispensable to the due preservation of the College edifice and other buildings; and whereas, an assessment during the past year of five hundred dollars for taxes on the said property, has greatly increased these embarrassments; and whereas, the Board of Trustees of the said Institution, in their efforts to meet this exigency, have asked the advice of this Convention respecting the propriety of changing a portion of the investment of said Corporation from real to other estate: therefore

1st. Resolved, That it is essential to the present efficiency and ultimate welfare of the Institution, that its debts be liquidated as soon as practicable.

2d. Resolved, That it is inexpedient to attempt to obtain donations in the Diocese or in the church at large for the payment of said debts; and that there appears to be no way of relieving the Institution but by selling the whole or a part of its real estate.

3d. Resolved, That it is desirable to retain so large a portion of the land as will enable the Institution to test by further experience that part of the plan of its venerable founder, which contemplated a domain of sufficient extent to keep off from its immediate vicinity establishments for the sale of spirituous liquors, and all other like moral nuisances.

4th. Resolved, That the sale of about a fourth part of the land of the Corporation, consisting of one thousand acres more or less, and lying on the south-west side of Vernon river, would, without materially interfering with the above plan of its founder, relieve the Institution from its present embarrassments: therefore

5th. Resolved, That the Board of Trustees be and they are hereby advised to sell the above described tract of land, and apply the proceeds of the sale thereof, as fast as they are received to the payment of the debts of the Institution:—Provided that before any sales shall take place, the said Board shall be satisfied by the opinion of such counsel learned in the laws as they may think proper to consult, that they have a full and clear legal authority to make such sale.

A division of the resolutions being called for, at the request of five members the vote was directed to be taken by Orders. The Chair declined voting upon any of the resolutions, and Rev. Messrs. Muenschner and Burr declined voting on the present. The vote stood as follows;

Affirmative.—Clergy 19. Laity 22. Total 41.

Negative.—Clergy 10. Laity 21. Total 28.

The third resolution was carried unanimously.

On the fourth resolution, the Rev. J. A. Brayton asked and obtained leave to be excused. The vote was as follows:

Affirmative.—Clergy 21. Laity 24. Total 45.

Negative.—Clergy 9. Laity 19. Total 28.

On the fifth resolution, the vote was as follows:

Affirmative.—Clergy 19. Laity 18. Total 37.

Negative.—Clergy 12. Laity 23. Total 35.

The President then put the question on agreeing to the whole Document introduced by the Rev. Dr. Brooke, and it was carried in the affirmative by the following vote:

Affirmative.—Clergy 19. Laity 19. Total 38.

Negative.—Clergy 10. Laity 22. Total 32.

The Committee in the case of St. Peter's Parish, Ashtabula, having reconsidered their Report, presented it as amended in accordance with the instructions of the Convention. The Convention directed that all that part of the Report which precedes the resolutions should be omitted in the printing of the Journal. The following are the resolutions:

1st. Resolved, That the conduct of the Parish of St. Peter's Church, Ashtabula, towards its Diocesan, meets with the decided and emphatic condemnation of this Convention.

2d. Resolved, That the Convention approve of the determination understood to have been already adopted by the Bishop, to abstain from all visitation of said Parish, until its authorities shall give him an assurance that the Easter-Monday pamphlet mentioned in this Report, has never been entered on their records, and will never be, or else has been or shall be removed therefrom; and until they recall the communication to him, wherein his first Address is spoken of as "unofficial," and further until they take back the charges contained in the paper called the "Remonstrance," especially that of untruth—all to the satisfaction of the Convention of this Diocese.

The following remarks of a secular Journal, upon "the proprieties of public worship," have been sent to us for republication. It will be seen that the observations were not made in reference to our Churches. Still there are hints by which we may profit. It is of great consequence that the solemnity of Public Worship should not be disturbed, by anything which may withdraw the mind from the great and single purpose which should engage it in the House of God. Notices of any kind should be as few as possible, and none should be given which do not immediately concern religious duties. Advertisements should be sent to the newspapers, not to the House of Prayer. Those who cannot stay in the House of God for an hour and a half, should stay out. The running in and out of children, the perambulations of sextons, the opening and shutting of doors, when frequent, distract the devout attention of worshippers and hearers. We have known the effect of the most impressive application of a sermon destroyed by the impatient exit of a new pair of shoes.

And the solemn influence of the Benediction, and the tranquillizing power of the Peace-bestowing blessing are often nullified by the noisy haste of a bustling sexton, hurrying to open every door, that the congregation may escape as soon as possible from the House of God!

THE PROPRIETIES OF PUBLIC WORSHIP.—The experience of several Sabbaths has suggested the expression of a few thoughts upon the propriety and decorum which we think ought to be observed in the public worship of the Almighty in His sanctuaries. It has before been intimated in our columns that there is danger, while reducing divine worship to its simplest form, of forgetting the awful majesty of the Being worshipped and the sacredness of the place where He deigns to commune with His creatures. This is by no means a necessary consequence of the absence of imposing forms in the services of the sanctuary, and when it is manifested is an evidence of the tendency of the human mind to go to extremes. And the feeling almost insensibly creeps over minds which, in the solitude of retirement, stand in awe of the Most High, and would bow both body and soul in reverence at his footstool.

We cannot but think that many church officers unintentionally do much to cause a forgetfulness of the sacredness of the place and hour of divine worship.—We refer to the practice, very common in some churches, of frequently passing from one part of the building to another, of conversing with each other during or immediately preceding the services, and the frequent handing up of notices to the minister after he has entered upon his solemn engagements; and we may add beckoning up to the pulpit the sextons or others, by the minister. These things we think ought to be avoided wherever they can be. Whatever the subject of such communication may be, the movements have too much the appearance of business arrangements to be in keeping with the occasion and the hallowed duties of the hour. We would advise that both clergyman and office bearer in the Church set their faces against this kind of communication, which necessarily distracts the attention of the congregation and diverts the thoughts from God to man.

We believe part of this evil arises from not having vestry rooms to the churches. It seems desirable that what of business must be transacted, in connection with divine worship, should be kept out of sight; that all notices for publication should be given to the minister, and all other arrangements made, before he proceeds to the desk, and that when once men have entered the house of the Lord, to pay their vows unto the Most High, intercourse with each other should, for the time, absolutely cease. And hence we think that the abolition of the vestry or ante-room to church edifices has proved an evil without any qualifying or redeeming benefit.

Another impropriety, which however is not general, but is principally confined to certain churches, is the frequent going out of the hearers during service. The parties who thus outrage propriety are generally beyond the influence of remonstrance or reproof. We allude to a class of young men who seem to attend church only for the purpose of "whiling away an hour, or as the appointed place for meeting some companion, and failing in this, abruptly and noisily leave during the sermon. They generally occupy seats which command a view of the whole church, and disturb all when they retire. A church in consequence suffers not a little from this annoyance. We believe any minister who would be bold enough to make an example of such, by turning attention to them as they retire, would be supported by public sentiment, and the annoyance might thus be put down.

At a Meeting of the Society for the Propagation of the Gospel (Oct. 3rd) the following most interesting statement was made by the Bishop of Madras.

The Lord Bishop of Madras then rose to address the meeting. His Lordship, who appeared to be in a weak state of health, delivered only part of his speech standing, requested to be excused for sitting down. His Lordship first referred to Mr. Vernon's speech, which he designated an eloquent and faithful defence of the Society; possibly it might be objected to that defence, that Mr. Vernon was the Society's agent. It could not however be said of him (the Bishop) that he had any connection of the kind. He had known and been connected with the Society ten years, and could therefore speak with confidence of it. He would affirm that the Society upheld no views of a peculiar nature. It maintained no other views but those of the Church. He himself had ordained eight men who had been Dissenting Ministers. If he thought that the Society held, or maintained opinions contrary to the truth, he would not remain connected with it for a single moment. He himself supported the Church Missionary Society, and often met the noble lord in the chair at the meetings of that Society. The Society whose claims he now advocated was certainly the oldest Missionary Society of the English Church; but in saying this he meant not to depreciate the Church Missionary Society. In India, there were no divisions, such as distract the Church in England. He could say with confidence that the Missionaries of both Societies were faithful, energetic, devoted men. His Lordship then entered on the subject of the actual labours of the Missionaries. He drew a striking picture of the vast extent of our Indian possessions, and briefly adverted to the political view of the subject. This however, dwindled into nothing when contrasted with the religious view of the subject. India is peopled by 120 millions of—all except a few thousands of Christians—Idolaters, or Atheists, for the Mahomedans though they profess to believe in God, yet in works deny Him, and are beyond comparison, the most irreligious, vicious, and contemptible people on earth. Now these are the enemies with whom the Society have to contend, 120 millions of Idolaters and Atheists. God has certainly blessed the labours of the Church, as he could assure the meeting from actual knowledge. Another enemy to be encountered was Popery. His Lordship said he had no fears about England, but he confessed he had fears for the cause of truth abroad, when he saw the vast efforts made by the Church of Rome. The number of Romish Bishops and Clergy was very great, as compared with our own Clergy. Rome reckons 800,000 Converts, our Church only 80,000.

His Lordship then referred to the steadfastness of the converts, amongst whom he positively asserted there were none who had fallen away from the faith. He spoke of the little pains bestowed on Catechumens by the Romish Church, whereas the utmost pains was taken by our Clergy to instruct the converts. The Bishop then referred to the interesting works carrying on at Tinnevely, where he had very recently ordained five Missionaries for the Church Missionary Society. The time had not come for employing native Missionaries alone, we must therefore look to England for a supply of labourers. His Lordship commended the efforts of the converts themselves, who were unwearied in their endeavours to spread the Gospel, related how, on some occasions of his laying the first stone of new Churches, the converts came and threw their former idols upon the foundation stones. His Lordship concluded with a very affecting appeal in behalf of the Society's cause.

Mr. Vores next spoke: He observed that such speeches as that of the Bishop would produce unity at home. A dispensation of the Gospel was committed to the nation and Church; which are now on their trial. How is it that this Society is so badly supported in Hastings? The Church Missionary Society gets 400% or 500% per annum, the former only 100%. He confessed that he had a preference, as we all had our preference:—He preferred the Church Missionary Society; but wished well to the other Society. He urged the friends of the latter to redouble their energy on behalf of the cause of Missions.

The Rev. Mr. Southard, Rector of Calvary Church, New York, has addressed the following Pastoral Letter to his Parishioners.

A PASTORAL FROM THE RECTOR TO THE PARISHIONERS OF CALVARY CHURCH, NEW YORK.

The Rector affectionately asks the attention of all his parishioners to the rules and suggestions which follow. They are drawn up in accordance with the laws of the Church, and in the hope that they may promote the order and decency of the affairs of the parish. In all circumstances, to which they refer, let your conduct be governed by them. Then, you will not only hold fast the faith of the Saints, but will act in minor concerns—but things which are still of importance—"as becometh the household of God." And for the rewards of such conduct, your Pastor will fervently pray.

In the form of a printed tract, he can counsel you far more minutely than in a written discourse. And his suggestions, so placed in the possession of all, can be better remembered, and consulted at pleasure.

Be patient. Be docile. Be not "high-minded;" but willing to learn.

I. THE MINISTRY.—You should look on the ministry as divinely appointed: to rule over, and teach you: to preach the Gospel, "as this Church hath received the same;" and give you the means of grace. Not as agents of man, or your agents:—supported, but not hired. Not to be directed by you, but to instruct you. Your security is, that "they watch for your souls, as they that must give account."

They are also responsible to the law of the Church;—not to individual opinion.

Never speak against them, without compulsion. If you differ from your Pastors in opinion, be content to differ without words. Receive what you can of profit from their ministrations, and be still. If they err in judgment, pray for them. While you remain in a parish, never cause a division of the people. And always remember that more must be yielded to the judgments of your Pastors, than is due to your own;—it is their province;—and theirs is the responsibility.

Remember, also, that the infirmities of the Priest cannot prevent the usefulness of the sacraments, nor their effect. This for your comfort.

The connexion of the clergy and people in spiritual things is nearer than any relation on earth. There is no tie so near—of friendship, or of blood. Never think of desiring any other than your Pastor to perform any act which a Priest can perform. It is his unquestionable right, and ought to be your pleasure.

II. SELECTION OF CHURCHES, &c.—Removals from parish to parish are to be avoided, if possible:—never change, from whim or caprice: never altogether from taste. Let God's providence, for the most part, decide. In changing your residence, have an eye to proximity to a Church, before all things but health;—and, as a general rule, go to the Church which is nearest. There worship, in quietness;—and be fitted for heaven.

Never leave any parish, without asking a letter of dismission;—and always present it to the Priest of the Church you would join. If you ought to leave, you will obtain it: if denied, make the case known to the Bishop. If you come with good motives, and are lovers of peace, the Priest whose Church you would join will receive you with gladness—but, surely, he ought not to wish you to come to disturb the peace of his fold.

III. ATTENDANCE ON WORSHIP.—Be in time, as a matter of conscience, as well as of courtesy and respect.

If unavoidably late, never enter while the people of God are in the midst of a prayer, or of praise—but wait for a pause in the service. If late, you know not how much you have lost.

Be exact and reverential in your postures during the worship. Never look round you at others, but be engaged in your own salvation. Keep your eyes on the hope set before you.

Till you have retired beyond the boundaries of the Church, remember that you are in the Temple of God.

Always, unless from a conscientious excuse, attend service and worship in your own parish Church. Be content with the services *th*ere. They will be enough for your soul;—more than you will improve. If you fancy you need more of nourishment than you receive, apply to your Priest—but never stray off to seek it yourself. You know your own pastures;—but you may eat garlic elsewhere. Your shepherd, whoever, in the Providence of God, he may be, is the shepherd for you.

Itching ears are one of the heaviest judgments of God,—and mere curiosity, in religious affairs, may be a sin.

Sheep, who wander from pasture to pasture to try every shepherd, will be cared for by none, and may meet the wolf on the way.

Endeavor always to be present at the public catechizing of the children—to encourage them—and to learn yourselves.

Strive to be present, as often as may be, at Daily Prayer. Observe the Holy Days of the Church.

IV. BAPTISMS.—The law of the Church is express—that all baptisms, both adult and infant, should be in the Church, after the second lesson, except in cases of necessity, and dangerous illness. Never ask for it in private, in health. The sponsors should be always Church people;—if possible, communicants; for only such have kept their own vows. Comply with the Rubric, as to time, as often as may be. The earlier children are brought to the water of regeneration, the better. Never leave it beyond the first going out of the mother.

The theory of the Church is, that the sponsors, not the parents, unless they are admitted as sponsors, present the child at the font.

Be sure that you have been baptized "by a lawful minister." All private baptisms, performed at any time, should be "certified" in Church.

V. CONFIRMATION.—This rite is not merely convenient, but essential. Let all seek it;—and all who have at any time been admitted to the Communion without it, anywhere, embrace the first opportunity.

None should come forward without the knowledge and consent of the Priest—whether belonging to his own congregation, or coming from another. It is for the gift of the Holy Ghost.

VI. COMMUNION.—None are to come, but "such as have been confirmed, or are ready and anxious to be confirmed." Therefore, a wilful neglect, or contempt of the rite, which prevents its reception, disqualifies for the Holy Communion.

None should come for the first time without the consent of the Priest.

None should come, who have elsewhere communed, and have moved into the parish, without presenting their letter, or telling the Priest of the same.

Visitors, who are entitled to the Holy Communion at home, in their own parish, are welcome at all times;—but, if opportunity serve, should apprise the Priest of their wish, or intention. It is well that we should know how many, and who, will commune.

Always, when possible, commune in your own parish Church. Receive the bread in the palm of the hand, without gloves. Remain, after service, till the elements are consumed, according to law.

Never neglect an opportunity to receive it.

It is advisable that children should be allowed to come to the Communion as soon as they feel its obligations, and are duly prepared.

VII. VISITATION OF THE SICK.—Do not wait for the minister to hear of your sickness; but, if you desire to see him, send word at once.

Prepare yourself for his visit, to join in the office the Church has provided.

Do not wait till you may suppose you are dying, to ask for the prayers of the Church;—they are meant, and are ready, for the beginning, as well as the end. Almost any sickness which is enough to keep you from Church, is grievous enough for you to ask for the prayers.

Never fail to return thanks. It is one of the best tests of a Christian,—and evidence of a grateful heart.

Never be ashamed to acknowledge with thanks, the blessings of God.

Let women, who have been confined, never fail to be Church-ed,—as soon as they can come to the Temple. The greater the blessing, the greater the cause for thanksgiving.

VIII. MARRIAGES.—If possible, let them take place in the Church.

Never marry the relation of a deceased wife, in any nearer degree than your own.

You should never marry out of the faith; especially a woman—who, thereby, becomes subject to "the law of her husband," who may keep her away from the Church.

Better never to marry, than to make shipwreck of the faith. Whoever he may be, you should be married by your own parish Priest.

The legislation of man may annul the civil contract of marriage;—but, from the religious obligation, no human court can divorce you. A man shall put away his wife, and a wife shall put away her husband, only "for the cause of fornication."

IX. DOMESTIC DUTIES.—If you can get them, have servants who belong to your own branch of the Church. Have family prayer, at morning and evening. Let the head of the family ask a blessing at Table; and never fail to return thanks when you have done.

Do not "oppress the hireling in his wages." Be careful that the regulations and hours at home do not keep you from any of the services of the Church.

When you can, let your servants go with you—and remember, that "there is no respect of persons" in Church.

Bring your children to be catechised, at every public appointment by your Priest.

Use hospitality. Be careful to entertain strangers;—and especially the ministry of God. A clergyman should never be left at an Inn.

X. ALMSGIVING.—This is but little appreciated, and as little understood. It is a means of grace, as much as prayer. Scripture ascribes to it a tremendous influence, upon the soul, and on its destiny. You cannot give too much unless you impoverish your own. You cannot give too much for your own good. The more you give away, on earth, with motives which are right, the more you will have in heaven.

"Do good unto all men;—and especially unto them that are of the household of faith." Give, first, to your own parish poor; and, then, to the rest of the poor of your Church; and then, scatter abroad.

The scriptural rule, which was created by God, has not been repealed;—to give a tenth of one's income. If we are lost, through want of charity, we shall wish we had given it all.

As much as you can give in that way, contribute in Church, offering it up on the Altar of God.

Make almoners of the Clergy.

The oftener you give, the more open your heart will remain.

XI. BURIALS.—Whenever it is possible, the funeral should be published, and appointed, to take place from the Church. It will save time, and inconvenience, at the house. It will enable the Priest to comply with Church law.

Whenever it is practicable, the Priest should go to the grave, and consign the body to the ground.

Always see the Priest who is to officiate, before the announcement of the time;—and never let a private matter, of any kind, interfere with an appointed public service of the Church.

The Priest should meet the body at the Church. He can visit the afflicted at other times.

The fashion of none but males attending funerals, especially at the Church, is to be strongly condemned. Let it be broken up at once.

Bury if possible, in consecrated ground. The dust of saints is holy,—and shall live again in the Church triumphant.

Be sure that you are in the Church, before you die, if you desire that when dead, the Church shall bury you.

XII. CONCLUSION.—Dear Brethren, these rules and suggestions will help you, if you will observe them. They are not unreasonable—but are given in conscience and in love.

If unusual, or not familiar to any of you, do not condemn them; but remember, they are given by one whose whole mind is bent on your welfare; who loves you; and has a right to instruct you. There is a great want of instruction in the points of which I have treated. I have endeavored to stem the tide of erroneous practice, for your sakes, above all; for, I would have you set to others an example; and "shine, as lights, in the world."

"Beloved, let us love one another,"
In faith, and in affection, Your Pastor, in The Church, And your servant for Christ's sake, SAMUEL L. SOUTHARD.

Diocesan Intelligence.

New York.—The Rev. Hugh Smith, D. D., has resigned the Rectorship of St Peter's Church, in this city, in consequence of ill health. The resolutions of the Vestry render no more than a fitting tribute to the many amiable and sterling qualities of head and heart that have won for Dr. Smith the love and esteem, not only of his congregation, but of a wide circle of friends in the Church. We trust that relaxation from ministerial duties will have a happy influence upon the state of his health, and that he may yet be spared many years for continued usefulness in the Church.—Churchman.

Western New York.—BISHOP DeLANCEY'S VISITATION.—On the 9th of October Bishop DeLancey officiated for St. James' Church, Pulaski, in the Baptist house of worship. The Rev. Mr. DeZeng, the Missionary of the station, administered the sacrament of Baptism to one adult and two children, and the Bishop preached. In the afternoon of the same day, in the village of Mexico, in the Presbyterian house of worship the Bishop preached. The Bishop visited Christ Church, Oswego, on the 10th, preached and confirmed fourteen persons. In the evening the Bishop preached.

On the 11th the Bishop preached and confirmed four persons in Zion Church, Fulton, Oswego county. In the afternoon, in St. Luke's Church, West Granby, the Bishop preached and confirmed three persons. On the 12th, in Christ Church, Jordan, Onondaga county, the Bishop preached and confirmed eleven persons, including one from St. Peter's Church, Auburn. In the afternoon the Bishop preached in the Presbyterian house of worship at Camillus.

A summary of Bishop DeLancey's duties as performed during his tour in this and the neighbouring diocese, from August 22d to October 12th, is as follows:

Baptized one adult and 11 infants.
Administered the holy communion 7 times.
Consecrated 5 Churches. Preached 57 times.
Confirmed 350 persons, 126 being of the diocese of Western New York, and travelled 1,350 miles.

Virginia.—LAYING OF A CORNER-STONE.—On Wednesday, October 4th, the corner-stone of a Church to be called "St. Bartholomew's," was laid at Leetown, Jefferson county, by the Rev. George D. Cummins, Rector of Christ Church, Norfolk, in the absence, and acting with the consent of the Rector of the Parish, the Rev. R. J. Brown.

This Church when completed will be the first ever erected in this immediate vicinity.—More than a quarter of a century since the Rev. Benjamin Allen officiated in a log dwelling near, but since his day until within the past two years, no services of our Church have been held. The present Rector has succeeded in gathering an interesting and increasing congregation.

It should be mentioned that this neighborhood is indebted for this Church to the disinterested and zealous efforts of the Rev. Lewis P. W. Balch, Rector of St. Bartholomew's Church, New York, who, with the assistance of his congregation, has supplied the greater part of the funds necessary for its erection.

The site of the building is within the border of a beautiful forest, and has been given by L. P. W. Balch, Esq.—Sou. Chur.

Kentucky.—ORDINATION.—An ordination was held by Bishop Smith in the Church of the Nativity, Maysville Ky., when the Rev. J. S. Chadbourne and Mr. R. McMurdy were admitted, the former to the Priesthood and the latter to the Diaconate. The Bishop preached a most impressive sermon, appropriate to the occasion from 2 Cor. 5: 20. "Now then we are ambassadors for Christ, as though God did beseech you by us; we pray you in Christ's stead be ye reconciled to God." The candidate for Deacon's orders was presented by the Rev. Erastus Burr, Rector of All Saints Church, Portsmouth, O., the one for Priest's orders by the Rev. G. G. Moore, Rector of Trinity Church, Covington, Ky. Mr Chadbourne is Rector of the new Parish at Maysville, where the prospects of building up a substantial church and bringing many into the fold of Christ are very flattering. Our young brother is called to hard and self-denying labor, yet we trust that, sowing in tears, he will reap in joy.

The Rev. Mr. McMurdy is engaged in the work of Education at Washington, Mason county, about three and a half miles from Maysville, where he has recently founded a Seminary for the Education of Young Ladies.—Western Episcopalian.

CLERICAL CHANGES.—The Rev. John Alden Spooner having accepted a call to the Rectorship of St. Mary's Church, Brooklyn, L. I., desires all communications to him to be addressed accordingly.

"The Rev. J. Brinton Smith having accepted a call to St. James Church, Kingessing, has removed from Sussex co. Del., and requests his letters and papers to be directed to Darby, Pa."

MARRIAGE REGISTRY.—Preponderance of the Church in English Society.—The Ninth Annual Report of the Registrar General of Births, Deaths, and Marriages, just issued, gives some information on the subject of Marriages within and without the pale, respectively, of the Church of England, which is thus forcibly remarked upon by the Morning Herald:—"The discriminating table of marriages according to the rites of the Established Church," and "not according" to those rites: the facts contained in this table are such as these:—

"In the year ending 31st Dec., 1846, the marriages were thus celebrated:—

In Established Church.	130,509
In dissenting chapels.	7,669
In Romish chapels.	3,027
In Register's office.	4,167

"Ten years having now elapsed since the commencement of the present system—and there being scarcely a Dissenting meeting-house in the realm not duly 'licensed to celebrate marriages'—we may conclude that these facts give us a just idea of the respective strength of these various bodies. In every 1452 of our population, therefore, we find, professedly attached to

The Church of England	1,305
Dissenters	76
Romanists	30
Socialists &c.	41

"Doubtless this view is more favorable to the Church than truth would warrant. Many have married 'according to the rites of the Church,' who were not sincerely attached to that communion. Old habit, and the want of any preference for Dissent, induced many to go to the church to be married, who never entered the church on any other occasion. Still the preponderance of the Church is so great, that, after allowing largely for these indifferent adherents, there will yet remain or apportion of ten or twelve to one!"—Ch. and State Gaz.

Extract from the address of the Bishop of Pennsylvania to the Convention of 1848.

"The female school, known as the Retreat, in School-house Lane, near Germantown, has been signally favored not only by the smiles of Divine Providence, but also with the influence of the Divine Spirit. Considerably more than a third of all the resident or boarding pupils have within the last two months been confirmed, and have also become communicants, under circumstances which have inspired me with the most lively hopes in respect to their future character and influence as Christian women. The order and spirit prevailing throughout the school have been excellent: the discipline is quiet, effective, and eminently domestic: the position of the buildings and grounds is alike beautiful and healthy; and the patronage bestowed upon it most encouraging."

St. Matthew's Hall,

Port Cadden, Warren County, New Jersey.

This Institution is beautifully located in the mountainous district of New Jersey, and the experience of four years has proved the situation to be remarkably healthy. The buildings, which have recently been improved, are large, convenient, and airy. Boys are received from five and six years old and upwards. The merits of this school are now well known, and speak for themselves. The Rector regards his pupils as his children, and gives his special attention to the formation of their correct moral and physical, as well as mental habits. Parents and guardians sending their sons and wards to the Hall, may rely on the faithfulness of the Rector and his assistants, in the discharge of their duties towards all committed to their care.

The terms, for Tuition, Board, Washing, &c., are $150 per year, or $75 per session of five months, payable always in advance. Books, French, German, Spanish, Music, Drawing and Painting, extra, at moderate charges.

The Winter Session opens on the first of November. For the admission of pupils, or further information, apply to the Rector,

FROM REV. H. E. MONTGOMERY,

Rector of All Saints' Church.

I perceive by your advertisement that you have opened a Female Seminary at Mantua. From a knowledge of you personally for several years, I cheerfully subscribe my testimony to your ability and excellence as an instructor of the young. Since we were at the University together, where you took a distinguished stand, I have received many evidences that you were peculiarly fitted for the career on which you entered so early, and to which I am glad, all things considered, that you have returned, and believe that you will fully justify the confidence that parents may repose in you by entrusting to you the education of their children.

FROM REV. DR. CLAY,

Rector of Gloria Dei Church.

I cordially concur in the sentiments expressed above in relation to the school you have opened in the village of Mantua. I believe you to be peculiarly fitted for the education of youth, and feel assured that parents who entrust their daughters to your care, will have them well and efficiently instructed.

Men's Judgment.

BY MRS. JOSEPH C. NEAL.

Who art thou, that judgest another?—James 4: 12.

Uncurl that look of scornful pride;
Unbend that haughty brow!
The censor's part, though bravely played,
Doth ill become thee now.
What hast thou heard? A tale of want
And mournful wretchedness,
Of one who yielded in that hour
Of hopeless—wild distress.

There came to him in friendly guise
But with a sophist's art,
One who appealed to every chord
Of that poor, bruised heart;
And in the twilight of despair
Confounding wrong with right,
He ceased to pray for strength to cope
With fell temptation's might.

And he hath erred,—past hope of Heaven,
So thou hast rashly said,
A sentence of dark banishment
Pronouncing—in God's stead.
Faith, Hope may be thy guiding stars,
But Charity is kind,—
And her sweet influence is not felt
On thy relentless mind.

Through all thy life, hath every fault
Been checked by strong control?
Forgettest thou the sins which lie
So heavy on thy soul?
There is one Judge who knows no sin,
Let Him the guilt decree;
He may absolve the erring one,
While He condemneth thee.

Selections.

Abram La Fort.

We gave in our last an obituary of this distinguished Chief of the Onondaga Tribe of Indians, and as there is much to interest the feelings of benevolent and intelligent people in relation to the Sons of the Forest, we presume our readers will be gratified to see the following account of his funeral, which we take from the Syracuse Star.

There is a mournful sensation accompanying the contemplation of the wasting away of the proud and brave people who regarded themselves as the rightful owners, and surely at one time the sole and undisputed possessors, of these waste domains, now held by stronger hands. It is melancholy to observe the scattered fragments of the tribes of the six nations, amongst whom the Onondagas bore high rank, as they are now "scattered and peeled" as we see them in their primitive costume at our railway depots, loitering through our streets, seeking a scanty support from the sale of their simple and rude fabrics, and evincing, with their high personal bearing, the degradation of their condition.

We are in anxious expectation of the work lately announced as in the progress of publication in relation especially to the Indians of Onondaga county. From our knowledge of the writer and his diligence and accuracy in collecting materials, we doubt not that his will be a very interesting production. May God dispose our General and State Governments seriously to consider and discharge their duty to this depressed, but once brave and powerful people.

BURIAL OF THE HEAD CHIEF OF THE ONONDAGAS, ABRAM LA FORT.—After a sudden and short illness of only two days, this worthy and respected Chief departed for his future hunting grounds, Thursday morning last at 5 o'clock. He had served in his capacity twenty years, during which he was ever beloved by his tribe, and respected for his talent and friendship by the whites. He was well educated and intelligent; a social and good neighbor, but averse to his tribe selling their timber to the whites, desiring to have it remain on their lands. He had seven children, (five sons and two daughters,) two of whom (sons,) died suddenly a day or so before him. They were on a visit from a school in New York, where they were sent by La Fort, though against the will of the mother, who ever has appeared to choose their own uncivilized state, to the whites. During the short sickness of La Fort, bloody matter issued from his mouth, accompanied with great pain in the stomach and groins. It is supposed he was poisoned; but whether this has any foundation,

I know not, unless by the sudden and strange manner in which he died. At the time of his death the Six Nations were in council at Tonawanda, and when the sad news was laid before them, great was the unexpected sorrow evinced. Harry Webster, (who now officiates in the capacity of Chief till another is appointed next year,) with several others from this tribe, immediately set off and arrived in time to officiate at his burial, which was on Sunday last.—During the forenoon he lay in his coffin within the house, the lid upraised for those to gaze upon him who wished. The coffin was of elegant mahogany, and cost fifty dollars. Attached to it was a silver plate on which was inscribed—

"ABRAM LAFORT,
HEAD CHIEF OF THE ONONDAGA TRIBE,
Died October 5th, 1848,
Aged 54 years.

At 11 o'clock the people began to assemble from different parts in carriages and on foot; at half past, the funeral horn was blown, and at 12 the procession formed and proceeded to the Council House, the bier borne on the shoulders of four Indians. After the lapse of some thirty minutes, and the people were principally assembled, Harry Webster arose with the council beads* in his hands and commenced his Indian harangue. He spoke three-fourths of an hour, at which expiration he presented the beads to John Jones, who spoke about forty minutes. They sat opposite sides of the room, and each responded while the other was speaking, in low, guttural sounds. Webster again spoke briefly when the coffin was opened for a few moments, when they proceeded to the grave, which was about fifteen rods from the Council House. From the time we first arrived, through the whole of the proceedings, the Indians were much affected, more especially the women, who gave vent to their sorrow by a continual sort of wail, and among whom the deepest mourner to all appearance was his wife. At the grave the plate on which was the inscription before mentioned, was removed to be preserved in remembrance of one who had been a Chief and a Father. The coffin lid was again raised, and the agony there at the last glance was deeply manifested, and his wife so weakened by the excitement, had to be assisted home. As the coffin was lowered into the grave and the earth partly thrown over it, the people began to disperse, some few of its mourners who lingered to the last. Of the people assembled, there were about two hundred and fifty whites and about eighty Indians; and why more Indians were not present, I could not conjecture. I noticed the Hutchinsons were there, having an eye for curiosity as well as others, perhaps and perchance can cast a more vivid reflection while singing the "Indian Hunter" back upon the state to which the "Poor Indian" has been brought. Of this tribe there is now about 400, and we understand are decreasing yearly. The Reservation consists of 700 acres, and their cultivation chiefly corn. I observed as we passed along this side of the castle, poorly taking care of, and corn slim, and was informed that the women were the principal laborers among it. Beyond the castle, crops had a better appearance, cultivated more by whites, who exchange works with them. The history of this tribe is, without doubt, the most interesting of the Six Nations, and we probably shall soon be gratified with its perusal in the work now progressing to that effect.

PIERRE.

"A Scene in the Nineteenth Century."

To the Editor of the Montreal Morning Courier.

Sir,—Such was the heading of a paragraph which appeared about a year ago in the columns of the Montreal Herald, which described a ceremony which was, on Sunday last, repeated in the Roman Catholic Cathedral of this city, in broad daylight, and in the presence of assembled thousands. Never, in my opinion, was a satire upon the age in which we live more justly, more forcibly, and emphatically expressed, than that contained in the few simple words, "A Scene in the Nineteenth Century."

That scene it was, on Sunday last, ordained that I should witness, and I shall now endeavor to give the public an exact, though a feeble, description of it, for it is one of those extraordinary occurrences in life which proves that truth is stranger than fiction.

On Sunday last, at half-past three, P. M., the time appointed for the Christening of the Monster Bell in the Roman Catholic Cathedral, I proceeded to the Church, and having secured a position which would command a complete view of the intended ceremony, I awaited with impatience the conclusion of the devout chanting of the Latin Vespers and the delivery of an oration, which was introductory to, or apologetic, I can't say which, of the proposed Baptism of the Brass Bell.

The whole pomp of that very pompous body was displayed,

* They were composed of four strings about seven inches in length, two of the strings blue, and the other two blue and white.

and the Church presented to the eyes of the faithful its most fascinating appearance. The Monster Bell had, at great cost and labour, been brought into the Church and placed at the foot of the Altar in the centre of the nave, a scaffolding had been raised to support it, and it was thereby elevated about three or four feet from the floor, suspended by a rope fixed at the top of the frame. Within the Altar rails, and at about ten feet from the Bell, stood a small table containing all the paraphernalia to be used on such occasions, and consisting of a large silver vase filled with holy water, a silver sprinkler, two silver dishes, a huge bouquet, a number of towels, and a variety of other articles. The Bishop was seated within the Altar, on the right hand, invested with a robe of purple and gold—the benches on both sides of the Tabernacle were filled with Priests and other Ecclesiastics.

At four o'clock precisely the very sacred rite was introduced by a pious and appropriate Waltz, played by a Brass Band placed in the Choir. A door at the left of the Tabernacle shortly opened, and about eight or ten Priests issued fourth, clothed in all the colours of the rainbow, and bearing, one, the mitre, another, a bundle of robes, and a third, a book; two or three others with lighted wax tapers, &c., &c.; having crossed the space within the Altar, and bowed down and worshipped (vide the 2nd Commandment) the contents of the Tabernacle, they approached the Bishop, before whom they simultaneously bent their knees. The centre Priest then approached his Lordship and devoutly kissed his ring. The ceremony of undressing and dressing the Bishop, which is practised on all extraordinary occasions, then commenced. His Lordship divested himself of a species of scarf, called, I believe, a chape, which he first kissed, and then delivered it to the Priest in question, who also kissed it, and handed it over to an attendant; the same process of unrobing and kissing having taken place with regard to several other vestments, the officiating Priests then produced those they intended to substitute, and which consisted of an embroidered muslin shirt, made like that of a lady's dress or petticoat, and was put on him in a similar manner, viz., by throwing it over his head, and then tying it round his waist by a scarlet riband. A short muslin surplice was then thrown over his shoulders, and over that a species of cloak of cloth of gold, lined with crimson satin—altogether a most gorgeous dress, and well calculated to make an impression upon the minds of those who are taught to consider such things as conductive, if not essential, to salvation.

The mitre having been placed upon his Lordship's head, he advanced in all pomp between two Priests, who held out to the fullest extent the corners of his cloak, and surrounded by several who acted as his supporters, into the centre of the dais, and, having prostrated themselves before the Tabernacle, turned towards the table containing the Holy Water, &c. Here a few Latin verses were chanted, and the bouquet having been placed in the Bishop's hand, he descended the steps of the Altar, dipped it into the vase of Holy Water, held by an attendant, and proceeded to wash the Bell by passing the bouquet up and down its outward sides in a perpendicular line, repeating, all the while, some unintelligible Latin sentences; he then gave the bouquet to one of his supporters, who completed the ablution by washing every part of the Bell. The process of drying it was precisely the same—the Bishop first using the towel and then giving it over to his attendant to wipe every part of it. The same ceremony of washing and drying was performed for the inside of the Bell, the Bishop and Priests getting under it for that purpose.

The object of all this attention was then anointed with what is called the Holy Cream, contained in a small silver box, and apparently very precious; this was done by rubbing it on particular parts of the Bell, which were pointed out to his Lordship by his principal attendant. Holy Salt, invariably used in the baptism of infants, was also applied, and I heard a member of that Church state that it was also anointed with Holy Oil, but I cannot positively say that it was, or how the oil was applied.

I should have stated before that the bell was honoured by having twelve god-fathers and twelve god-mothers, selected (with a view which will presently become apparent) from among the wealthiest of that creed in this city, and of whom the Attorney-General for Lower Canada and his lady were the principal. They had taken their seats in the centre of the nave, and immediately fronting the bell.

After the washing, wiping, and anointing were concluded, and the bell, by the addition of the oil, cream, and salt, had been treated like a salad, the Bishop advanced a few paces and enquired of the Sponsors the name they intended bestowing on their brazen god-child. "Saint Jean Baptiste" was, of course, the reply, and, forthwith some further crossing, or sprinkling, of the Bell took place, which I could not well comprehend.

The ceremony of dressing the bell then commenced by the production of an enormous white satin petticoat, which was thrown completely over its fair proportions, this was then covered by a most gorgeous robe of crimson silk-velvet, trimmed with rich lace and gold, which, with the peculiar form of the bell gave to it the appearance of a gigantic lady, without a head, suspended in the centre of the Church.

The Bishop and Priests then ranged themselves on each side of the Saint Jean Baptiste, and a crimson rope having been made fast to the tongue of the bell, the Sponsors were individually invited to ring it. A lady and gentleman then advanced and held the rope while a sturdy beadle gave the necessary impetus to the tongue, and produced (in a double sense) the first toll; for a large silver plate having been placed in a very conspicuous position near the bell, the privilege of ringing it was compensated by a deposit of money, by way of toll, by each successive candidate for the distinction.

The sponsors retired after having enjoyed, and liberally paid for, this privilege, which was then thrown open to promiscuous competition on the same terms, and I am informed the ringing continued to a late hour, and the toll-fund was swelled of course in proportion. After the Sponsors had concluded their part of the performances, the Bishop retired to his seat, where a similar process of unrobing, robing, and kissing the vestments terminated this very apostolic and Christian ceremony.

Family Prayer.*

"As for me and my house, we will serve the Lord." This should be the plain, the avowed, the steadfast resolution of every one who bears rule in a house; of every master of a household; of every father, of every mother of a family. When God ordains that any one should be the master or the mistress of a household, he likewise ordains that they should take care of those who are under their authority, and should look upon them as committed to their special charge. In like manner, when he is pleased to grant any one the blessing of being a father or a mother, he links this blessing with the duty of taking care of the children, of bringing them up, of providing for them. Now these duties, whether of parents toward their children, or of masters and mistresses toward their servants, so far as relates merely to earthly things, cannot well be grossly neglected; and few do so neglect them. Even those who have no higher principle for their conduct, those who merely wear the harness of custom, and are driven along by the lash of self-interest, will take care of their children and of their servants; will see that they have a roof over their heads, that they are duly fed and clothed; nay, will wish, and even try, in a manner, to make them cleanly and orderly and sober and honest and industrious. All this is right: all this is a part of a Christian master's, of a Christian parent's duty; but it is not the whole of that duty, nor the highest part of it. The reason, too, why most people fail so lamentably in the discharge of this part is, because they cut it off from the remainder, and try to discharge it by itself. Cut a bunch of grapes off from the vine: will it ripen? You may hold it before the fire till you scorch it: but it has no living juice in it; and, when it is cut off from the vine, none can flow into it. Or should it be already ripe, it will soon shrivel, or grow mouldy; or some accident will mash it. The master and mistress of a household, the father and mother of a family, have not only, the low, earth-born, downward-looking duty of providing for the temporal well-being of those committed to their charge: they have also the high, glorious, heaven-sprung, heaven-seeking duty of providing for their spiritual well-being. This duty of helping the helpless onward along their road to heaven is indeed a glorious one. It is a privilege we ought to prize and to be thankful for. It is a privilege we ought to rejoice in, even as a candle rejoices in the privilege of being allowed to give light, and lifts up its bright flame on high, and gladly wastes its own life in fulfilling its noble duty of standing in the stead of the sun. So too should all we, whom Christ has appointed to stand in his stead—so should we, poor candles as we are, whom he has chosen to keep up his light among such as would otherwise be sitting in darkness—so should we rejoice that we are permitted to give light, and gladly spend our lives in doing so, burning clearly and steadily until we have burnt away. Glorious, however, as this duty is, it is a duty for which we shall have to give account; and we may neglect it, or cast it aside, except at our grievous peril. We shall have to give account, not only for our own souls, but also more or less, for the souls of those whom God has committed to our charge.

Let this then be your watchword, my brethren, every one of you, who have any souls in any way dependent upon you, and entrusted to your management and care; let this be your watchword, and the rule of your life: "As for me and my house, I will serve the Lord." It is not enough for you to say, "As for me, I will serve the Lord." A grape never stands alone: it is always part of a cluster. In truth, no one can feel any hearty desire to serve the Lord himself, without being at the same time anxious that others also, that his friends and neighbours—above all, that the members of his own household should bear their part in this godly service. And one of the ways in which it behoves you to provide that your house shall serve the Lord, is by setting up his worship in your house; by taking care that you and your whole house join day by day in serving him with prayer and thanksgiving and praise.

Some among you may, perhaps, tell me that you cannot well manage to gather you families together of a morning. Be it so. It would not take up much time indeed. After a few days' trial, you would probably find that you met together for prayers just as easily and as naturally as for meals; and, when you had spent a few minutes in prayer, and had called down God's blessing on your labour, how differently, with how much lighter heart, would you go forth to your labour, instead of going forth as you do now, with no other thought than that of the wearisome burden of the day! Or, if the father of the family goes out too early, the mother may gather her children together, and offer up a prayer in the midst of them, before she sends them to school. Of an evening too, at any rate, you have plenty of time on your hands. Every evening, before you lie down to take your rest beneath the shelter of the same roof, before you close your eyes and fold up your thoughts in sleep, you may kneel down together, and pray to God to shelter you and yours with the over-shadowing wings of his love, and to watch over you with his all-seeing eye, while you are unable to watch over yourselves. Every evening you may pray that God will forgive whatever he has seen amiss in you and yours during the past day, and that he will give you understanding to know his will, and grace to keep it; and that he will bless you with refreshing and comfortable sleep, and be with you in your down-lying and in your up-rising. Surely this is little to ask of you. This, however, is the very least that can be asked; a mere grain of dust in comparison with the pearl above all price which you are seeking thereby, namely, that once a day at the least you gather your family together (they who can do so twice a day are without excuse if they do not), and that you offer up some simple prayer, with one voice and one heart, to God. You who are married, and have nothing but infant children, should do so along with your wives; for remember, so gracious is our Lord, his promise is to be with those who are gathered together in his name, even if there are but two of them. You should pray to God, along with your wives, to sanctify and bless your marriage, and to enable you to bring up your children in his faith and to his glory. You, who have children old enough to understand what you say, should make them kneel down along with you, that they may be trained from their childhood to behold their parents daily kneeling in the presence of the living God, and seeking the communion of his Son. Then may you truly hope that they will be like olive branches about your table, emblems of peace like olive branches, and flowing with the oil of gladness. You, again, who have servants, should call them to share in your prayers. It is such a burden for a man to, have to command—to have to be waited on by another. Let there at least be one moment in the day when this burden is cast off, when the difference is lost sight of, and you all kneel down together as brethren in sin and brethren in grace, praying each for the other, and that each may discharge his duty to the other. Surely, if we will not do thus much, we can never have said in our hearts, "As for me and my house, we will serve the Lord."

The First Ragged School.*

Many years ago—perhaps nearly seventy—there was a poor boy in Portsmouth who met with a sad accident, which disabled him for life. His name was John Pounds; and his father was a sawyer in the royal dock-yard. John was about fifteen when he became a cripple; and he most probably felt very sorrowful when he thought of the future, and feared that he should never be able to work for his living. But this very accident was the means of his doing a great deal of good, because it gave him the time and the opportunity to benefit others. John could not follow his father's trade; so he learned to mend shoes, and became a cobbler. During the greater part of his life he resided in a small weather-boarded dwelling, where he might be seen every day carrying on his humble occupation.

John was very fond of rearing singing-birds and parrots, which he trained with such skill and kindness that they lived harmoniously together with his cats and Guinea-pigs; and he would often sit with a canary perched upon one shoulder and a cat upon the other.

Poor as he was, and entirely dependent upon the hard labour of his hands, he adopted a little crippled nephew, whom he educated and cared for as if he had been his own son, and afterwards established him comfortably in life. It was having the charge of this little boy that gave rise to his school. He thought, while teaching the child his lessons, that he would learn better if he had a companion of his own age; so he obtained one—the son of a wretchedly poor mother; then another, and another, was added; and he found so much pleasure in his employment, and did, through it, so much good, that in the end the number of his scholars amounted to forty, including about a dozen little girls.

The children whom he thus gathered around him were some of the worst, as well as the poorest, he could meet with; for he felt that they stood in the most need of instruction. He would frequently follow miserable-looking boys in the street, and offer them the bribe of a roasted potato if they would come to his school.

His humble workshop was a good-sized room; and in the midst of it John used to sit mending his shoes and attending at the same time to the studies of his pupils. He was a very pleasant and cheerful teacher, and tried to amuse as well as instruct his rough scholars, that he might induce them to come again. He very soon acquired great influence over them; and the ragged and dirty boys became both tidy and tractable. They were taught to read and write, and also to mend their shoes; and when they were ill, John always visited them, and did all he could for them. Many hundred persons, now living usefully and creditably in the world, owe, by the blessing of God, the whole formation of their character to him.

John Pounds died suddenly, on New Year's-day, 1859, at the age of seventy-two. The children wept sadly on hearing of their loss, and for a long time were overwhelmed with sorrow and dismay. They, indeed, had lost a friend and benefactor, whose place could not easily be supplied.

Who can calculate the good which has been accomplished by the means of ragged schools? Numbers of poor children, whose outward wretchedness was but a true type of the misery within, have by them been reclaimed from the paths of sin and temptation, and rendered a blessing instead of a curse to society. Those forsaken and degraded little ones have been taught to "remember their Creator in the days of their youth," and to love that Saviour who died for them, and who invites the most sinful to come to him.

And who that reads the history of John Pounds will say that any are too poor or too insignificant to be useful? Think of the great good which the poor lame cobbler effected! The mender of shoes was the instructor of the ignorant, the guide of the wayward and neglected, and the friend of the distressed. Look at his daily toils and his self-denying labours, and learn a lesson of industry and usefulness. The humblest individual may benefit others, if he is only willing and anxious to do so. Do not forget this, my dear children. Many kind actions can be performed without money; many noble deeds have been done by very poor people.

How much better it is to be useful than rich! John Pounds was more highly honoured in being the founder of ragged schools than if he had accumulated a large fortune. The great object of life is to glorify God, and to do good to our fellow-creatures. Let us strive to keep that object constantly in view. "The night cometh, when no man can work." Happy will it be for each of us, if our lives will bear the simple but important testimony, "She hath done what she could."

Public Meeting in New York.

A copy of the accompanying sketch, was largely circulated by the Committee of the city councils, among the immense crowd collected at the Mariner's church in Rosevelt street on Friday evening, Sept. 29, to witness the presentation of the Freedom of the city of New York, to FREDERIC JEROME, the humble sailor, of the ship New World, who, by swimming to the burning ship "OCEAN MONARCH," when all hope of rescuing more lives had been relinquished, climbed up a rope from the sea to the end of the bowsprit with a line, and lowered into the boat of Mr. Bragden, the mate of the Ocean Monarch, 15 helpless women and children. The ceremonies on the occasion were of an intensely interesting character, and on this account we shall give an extended report of them. Notice had been given in the public papers under the signature of the Committee of both Boards, that Mayor Havemeyer would preside at the ceremony, and that Alderman Franklin would deliver the address and present the gold box to Jerome, together with an engrossed copy, in a gilt frame, of the resolutions passed in the City Councils respecting his services on board the ship Henry Clay, and to the sufferers on board the burning ship Ocean Monarch, on the 24th of August, 1848. Only about one person in every four who desired it were able to obtain admittance into the house, which was filled to overflowing at an early hour. The crews of the two rescuing boats of the New World were desired to take seats on the stage with the mayor and committee, while next to Jerome, on the side opposite, was Rev. Mr. Parker of the floating church, New York, and Capt. Knight. A chair or two was left vacant, which Rev. Mr. Chase from the pulpit, requested Miss Mary Cook, one of the female passengers of the Ocean Monarch, then among the congregation, to occupy, who, with her sister's child, a beautiful little girl, 3 years old, had been saved from the burning ship, and were brought into New York by her preservers, in the ship New World.

At half past 7 o'clock, Alderman De Forest announced his honor Mayor Havemeyer as chairman of the meeting. Prayer was then offered by the Rev. Mr. Chase, pastor of the Rosevelt Mariner's church, after which Mayor Havemeyer explained the object of the meeting in a few appropriate remarks.

Alderman Morris Franklin, the President of the Board of Aldermen, then came forward with the gold box, and addressed Jerome, the sailor.

On receiving the box, Jerome returned to his seat, when Rev. Mr. Parker rose and responded for him in the following manner:

Your Honor, the Mayor, and honorable Chairman and Members of the Committee of both Boards of the City Councils of New York:

"Gentlemen:—I am requested by my brother, only an humble sailor, foremost hand on board the ship New World, Capt. Knight, of New York, to make for him a reply to the address that has just been made to him by the distinguished Chairman of the Board of Aldermen, and the expression of honorable notice that has been here taken of him. My honest brother wishes me first to speak of his shipmates, in both the boats of the New World, before he will venture to have any reply made for himself. He wishes that justice may be publicly done to them, rather than arrogate to himself all the merit, if there was any, in the successful effort to save life, to which you have alluded. He did not leave the deck of the New World alone. Seven of his shipmates and two officers were with him. He went to the burning ship in obedience to the orders of Capt. Knight, who no sooner saw that the Ocean Monarch was on fire, six miles off, than he instantly tacked his ship, and bore down, and put on board, with a press of sail, towards her. The sea was then running high, with a considerable rolling. He reached the ship, then three miles off, with the other boat, after they were lowered down into the water, with some hard rowing. When they reached her, they had dangers and difficulties to encounter, in which both the boat's crew and every man of them as largely participated as himself. They were in danger of being carried by the wind and tide close under the bows of the burning ship, that was pitching deep, as she hung in that heavy sea at her anchors. Here would have been immediate destruction. During their frequent visits back to the burning ship, after repeatedly carrying on board the Brazilian frigate and English steamboat all their boat could hold at one time, whom they had taken out of the sea, they were only on one occasion able to keep their position on their return by holding on with a boat-hook to the hawser by which the frigate had connected herself with the Ocean Monarch. But the swaying of that line up and down, as it was taunted by the pitching of both ships, was near lifting them out of their boats. Most of the time, therefore, they were obliged to hold their position by hard rowing, while picking up the perishing from the water. They were, besides, constantly in danger of being overwhelmed by the shrieking passengers jumping from the end of the burning bowsprit and overloading them; of their boats being crushed into the sea and overset by the chain cables of the burning ship heaving in and out of the water; or of the ship suddenly sinking and drawing them into her wake; or of the bowsprit, which was burnt off at the heel, being held on only by the gammoning, falling upon them. They were unable to approach the side of the ship where the perishing were to be reached, in consequence of the spars and masts, which had fallen overboard, still hanging to her hull, and lumbering the surface of the dashing sea. Many poor sufferers were here bruised and killed before help could reach them. These dangers and the hard toil in keeping the boat in position to do any good, were shared by the others in common with himself; and also the perils of swamping while taking the perishing on board from out of the water. And while they were so instrumental in saving many lives, it would be an injustice of which no honest sailor would wish to be guilty to arrogate to himself alone the credit. In this most perilous part of their enterprise, so much incredible coolness, perseverance and indomitable courage was exhibited by those who were with him, that it ought to be extensively known what they suffered, and dared and achieved. The Hon. Mayor and City Councils, and this large audience, have now before them, brought into this port last Saturday, by Capt. Knight in the New World, and present this evening in this house, two persons saved from the bowsprit of the burning wreck by Mr. Baalham, the third mate, and his boat's crew, William Strand, George W. Rossiter, William Grove and Edward H. Cole, who now but for them would be at the bottom of the sea. They are this estimable lady and her sister's beautiful child, three years old; and towards these men their hearts must beat with gratitude, while memory shall retain the faintest traces of their noble daring and perils on their behalf. They saved them from the feet of the figure head, when the fire was scorching their very clothes. This lady has come here to-night, not to thank him (Jerome), for he did nothing for her or the child, but for the great pleasure of once more beholding the face of her preservers. (Great cheering.) And there were many other hearts now again on the English shore still warm and beating with emotions of gratitude to these same persons, and to Mr. Forbes, the boatswain of the ship, and Henry Curtis, Edward Dugdale and William Johnson, who belonged with himself to his boat's crew. Yes, many hearts feel thankful to these men, for it should be stated on this side of the water, that the many persons they rescued from the waters around and off of the burning ship, were carried by them and left on board the Brazilian frigate and the English steamer, who in the English accounts are set down as having been saved by the boats of those vessels, when they had been received on board from the boats of the New York packet-ship New World.

"With regard to himself, gentlemen, and the prominence you have been pleased to give to his own exertions, Jerome feels himself too much overwhelmed by his position to make any suitable reply. When he proposed to try to save those who were left on the burning bowsprit, after passing into the Ocean Monarch's boat, he stripped himself and jumped into the sea. He knew there was danger in swimming under the bows of the ship, pitching as she did in the heavy sea, with a strong wind and tide against her, but he could in no other way get hold of a line, and the boat did not approach near enough for the purpose, and could not properly have done so without certain destruction. He was thinking then only of saving the lives of those unable to help themselves, not of honors or distinction. It was the thought of leaving them to perish, without another effort, which animated him, and he feels that he did no more than many of his ship mates would have done had they had the like opportunity. He lays claim to no superior courage, and would attribute his success only to the help of God. He feels thankful that the Almighty God has been pleased to make him an instrument, in His own hands, in saving the lives of some of his perishing fellow-men; and that he has been sufficiently rewarded by the success with which his exertions have been attended, without any other notice. He thanks you most humbly, but sincerely for the distinction of citizenship you have been pleased to bestow upon him, a poor sailor before the mast in one of your ships, and the honorable testimonial of your approbation with which it is accompanied. He hopes that his future life may exhibit an honest endeavor to serve his Maker, and on every occasion where it is in his power, to be useful to his fellow-men. He accepts, gentlemen, with the greatest alacrity, the distinction with which you have been pleased to notice him, for the services which the Almighty, in His merciful goodness, has enabled him to perform in the discharge of only his duty, because that, not only on these shores, but through every mart of the world, it will be felt by sailors that while they are driving the keels of commerce through the dark waters, public approbation as well as private gratitude, will not pass over in silence their humble exertions in the cause of humanity."

Alderman Franklin then, by request of one of the audience, read the inscription on the box, which he received back from Jerome for that purpose, and held up to view, and also the resolutions of the City Councils, engrossed very beautifully, and enclosed in a richly gilt frame.

Communications.

For the Banner of the Cross.

The story of the two Culdee Missionaries published in a late Banner has induced your Correspondent to send you a notice of the famous Missionary establishment of the Culdees on the island of Iona, collected out of a Scotch work to which I suppose none of your readers have had access.

The island is known to the native Highlander by four names. —The Isle of the Druids; The Island, by way of eminence; The Isle of Colum of the Celler Cemetery, in allusion to its having become, in process of time, a famous burying-place; Iona, the blessed or sacred isle.

Iona is about three miles in length and one and a half in breadth. Its eastern coast is separated from the south west of Mull by a narrow sound of probably about half a mile. The surface of the island is low, rising into numerous irregular elevations which seldom exceed 100 feet; its highest hill may be about 400 feet.

Mr. Pennant, who wrote in the year 1769, gives the following description, which we have condensed. He first visited the ruin of the nunnery; the Church was 58 feet by 20; the roof of the east end entire, a pretty vault made of very thin stones, bound together by four ribs, meeting in the centre. On advancing from hence along a broad paved way which continued in a line from the nunnery, he came to the Cathedral; on this road was a large and elegant cross, one of 360 that were standing on this island at the reformation. He next arrived at the great Cemetery, where reposed, according to Scottish chronicles, 48 crowned Kings of Scotia, 4 Kings of Ireland, and Kings of Norway, who once ruled over the Isle of Man. These kings reposed in tombs, built in form of little chapels, of which there are now scarcely any remaining. The place was filled with grave-stones, which covered lords and nobles of every isle—for all were ambitious of lying in this holy spot. The chapel of St. Oran also stands in this place, which legend reports to have been the first building attempted by St. Columba. This Chapel abounds in tombstones with inscriptions. About 70 feet south of the chapel is a red unpolished stone; beneath which lies a nameless King of France. The Cathedral, before mentioned, lies a little north of this enclosure; it is in the form of a cross. The length from east to west is 115 feet; the breadth 23 feet; the length of the transept 70. Over the centre is a handsome tower, on each side of which is a window, with stone work of different forms in every one. On the south side of the chancel are some Gothic arches supported by pillars 9 feet 8 inches high, including the capitals; and 8 feet 9 inches in circumference. The capitals are quite peculiar, carved round with various figures. The altar was of white marble veined with grey, 6 feet by 4. The monastery lies behind the Cathedral, in a most ruinous state. North of the monastery are the remains of the Bishop's house. To the west of the convent is the Abbot's mount overlooking the whole. Beneath seem to have been the gardens once well cultivated. Beyond the mount is a square, containing a cairn and surrounded with a stone dike. This is called a burial-place; it must have been in very early times, contemporary with other ruins, perhaps, in the days of Druidism. For, the sect of the Druids had a college in this island for time immemorial, till expelled by St. Columba. Hence the most ancient name of the island, mentioned above. These Druids were the priests of the Celts. The word means a magician, and it is used in the Gaelic Bible for the magi who came from the East to Jerusalem to worship the Holy child Jesus. They worshiped the Unseen Spirit under the image of the Sun—which fact identifies their idolatry with that of the Persian Magi. The Druids had their high places and groves—their "circle of Loda" and "stone of power"—their high feasts and fiery ordeal. The Arch-Druid wore his "magic wand." The whole Druidical mystery was committed to memory, but never to writing, and it took one about 20 years to finish his course of studies. They believed in the immortality of the soul—Their heaven was called Flath-Innis, the island of the brave—the common term for heaven to this day in the Gaelic. The ffurin or hell of the Druids, which is the only word in the Gaelic Bible still for Hell, signifies the island of sorrow.

Such is a brief sketch of the Druidical religion which Columba and his companions overthrew in Scotland. In the year 563, he set out from Ireland, with a crew consisting of 12. Upon his landing at Iona some Druids, in the habit of monks, approached him, and pretended that they also were come to preach the gospel, and therefore requested him and his followers to give way; but Columba discovered the imposture. Having procured a grant of Iona, he founded that monastery which for centuries continued to be the first seminary in Europe. Spottiswood says, that even in Columba's own lifetime, he founded 100 monasteries, and 365 Churches, and ordained 3000 priests. These monks or priests were termed Gille-an-de, i. e. the servants of God perverted into Culdees. It is repeatedly noticeable in the after history of the Culdees, that they sent out, in their Missionary Colonization, an Episcopal Leader, with his twelve disciples! Thus Aidan, Bishop of the Northumbrian Episcopate, the pious Culdee of the story in the "Banner," was sent out, we read, with twelve companions. Columba originally had landed on the island, with twelve. After Aidan's death, the college of Iona consecrated and sent out Finan to succeed him, who also carried with him twelve, among whom were, Cedda, Adda, &c. A mission was made out also to the Continent of Europe, at the head of which was Columbanus educated under the Abbot of Iona, with twelve disciples, as usual; among these twelve was Giles who became famous in Switzerland.

During the controversy about the worship of Images, the primitive sons of Iona wrote against the proceedings of the Council of Nice and against image worship, as set forth by that Council.

I have before me a chronicle of events connected with Iona, translated from the Gaelic of the four Masters. I extract the following dates with their events—

- A. D. 563. St. Columba arrived in Iona, on Pentecost Eve.
- 572. Connal, King of the Scots, who granted Iona, died.
- 574. St. Columba made Primate of all the Irish Churches.

- 1126. The first Legate (John of Crema) comes to Scotland. (The first trace of papal power here.)

My authority states, with a fling at the Romish monks, that the "honest Culdees, held, as every man ought, celibacy in dishonour."

We shall conclude this sketch with further notices of St. Columba.—In his character, talents, learning, and a constant application to study, made a very conspicuous figure, but a still more striking part of it, is an early, uniform and strong spirit of piety. Columba, well aware of the importance of early piety, paid particular attention to the young: Hence, when the Saint made his appearance, the little children rejoiced to see him and ran to meet him to receive his benediction. If only the elder children of the family were presented to him, he would say: "Have you not some that are younger than these?" Peace, a fruit of the Spirit, was a remarkable feature in the life of Columba. He reconciled princes, and, at the great council of Birncest the succession to the throne was left to his arbitration. Like every one who lives under the sense of the presence of a righteous God, Columba was faithful in his rebuke of vice. Aidan, King of Ireland, asked him once, whether he thought he, should be saved? "You have little chance for that," said Columba, "unless you expiate the errors of your past life by a speedy and sincere turning to God." Tenderness to the poor was highly characteristic of the Apostle. On a certain winter-day which was excessively cold, he was observed to be in great distress, and even to weep like a child. When he was asked the cause, he replied, "It is not without reason, that I am sad; my monks at Durrough are, at this inclement season, sadly oppressed by Larrain who keeps them at hard labour." He was merciful to the brute creation, as well as toward his fellow-man—as the following anecdote shows: a heron had one day ventured a flight from some of the remote islands to Iona; by the time it reached the shore, it was so far exhausted that it alighted in the water. Columba ordered one of his monks to its succour. "Bring it," said he, "to the nearest house; feed it and take all the care you can of it for three days, till it recovers its strength and be able to cross the sea again."

Farewell Iona! sure the Genius of Religion hovers still over thy awful tombs!

Brotherly Love.

"Be kindly affectioned one to another with brotherly love; in honour preferring one another." Romans xii. 10.

Love should ever be the spring of Christian action. It dictated the mission of mercy to a lost and ruined world, and is declared by Him who "so loved us" to be the "fulfilment of the Law."

The Apostle styles it the "greatest" of Christian attainments, and our Saviour commands us to "love one another." Yet alas! how often do we find among the professed followers of the "meek and lowly Jesus," even when engaged in works of benevolence, jealousy and strife. Shall difference of opinion, displace from our hearts this cardinal virtue, and prevent cordial co-operation in extending the Redeemer's Kingdom?

If it be true that

"Satan finds some mischief still For idle hands to do," equally true it is that he will by engendering strife endeavor to paralyze our labors of love.

It is said that "jealousy cannot exist without love," but when reigning in the human heart, like ashes, it preserves only to conceal and confine its warmth—Let us rather pray that the blessed Spirit as "a rushing mighty wind" may scatter the ashes that enclose and cause it to glow in our hearts, and thence irradiate in acts of Charity. "O Lord, who hast taught us that all our doings without charity are nothing worth; send thy Holy Ghost, and pour into our hearts that most excellent gift of Charity, the very bond of peace, and of all virtues; without which, whosoever liveth is counted dead before thee: Grant this for thine only son Jesus Christ's sake. Amen." S.

Three Plain Answers to the Question "Why are You a Member of the Church of England?"

"Founded in truth: by blood of martyrdom Commented: by the hands of wisdom reared."

WORDSWORTH.

I. Because she is a true branch of the "one catholic and apostolic church."

By her creeds, her liturgy, and her ministers, she sets forth the one and only way by which a sinner can draw near to God (John xvi. 6); maintains inviolate the doctrine of the "Trinity in unity"; gives to the people the scriptures; administers the two sacraments; and declares in her articles that the scriptures contain all things necessary for the salvation of man, viz., how he lost the image of God (Gen. iii. 24), and how that image may be restored (1 Cor. xv. 21, 22; and Rom. v. 19).

II. Because in the visible church of Christ there has ever been a succession of men, appointed by Christ himself, to preach the gospel and administer the two sacraments. This succession of men the church of England possesses (in her three orders of bishops, priests, and deacons—see the preface to the ordination service), and believes to be necessary for the observation and conservation of God's word and sacraments, as well as for the proper maintenance of "unity, peace, and concord," which members of Christ will ever earnestly seek for (1 Cor. xii.; Eph. iv. 1-16).

III. Because, originally independent of the Roman see for 600 years, though she gradually became subject to it; yet, by the grace of God, in the sixteenth century, she manfully threw off that terrible yoke; and now (in connexion with the state, which connexion may she long retain) stands forward as the firm supporter (in England) of catholic and apostolic truth—on the one hand against the abominable corruptions of the church of Rome, and, on the other, against the no less fearful machinations of dissent, rationalism, and infidelity.

SATURDAY, NOVEMBER 4, 1848.

To Agents and Subscribers.

AGENTS OF THE BANNER, who may have made collections, are respectfully requested to remit the amount to us by mail. Notes of any specie-paying Banks will be received.

SUBSCRIBERS, who have received bills, will especially oblige us by emitting to us the amounts respectively due. We solicit early attention to them.

The terms of the Paper are Two Dollars and Fifty Cents a year, payable in advance; or Three Dollars if not paid before the end of the year. The advance price will be charged when we are obliged to collect the bills through a travelling agent.

Any person remitting Ten Dollars, will be entitled to receive five copies for one year.

Communications for the Editor may be addressed to the Rev. Frederick Ogilby, and for the publisher to James S. Newbold, both, No. 16 south Seventh street, Philadelphia.

Office of the Banner of the Cross

The office of this paper has been removed from No. 89 South Fifth street, to the Book store of Mr. R. S. H. George, No. 16 South Seventh street, between Market and Chestnut streets.

Mr. George will act as Agent for the receipt of subscriptions, etc.

A KEY TO THE PRAYER BOOK, &c.—We continue from the last Banner, our brief remarks, accompanied with extracts from the work, upon this "first publication" of "the Executive Committee of the Protestant Episcopal Society for the promotion of Evangelical Knowledge."

We have shown some important particulars, wherein the English Evangelical Author and the American Evangelical Editors differ in their views. We now propose to exhibit both Author and Editors as agreeing in setting forth teachings, which we think to be as plainly repugnant to evangelical truth, revealed in God's Word, as they are contrary to the standards of the Church contained in the Prayer Book whereof this publication professes to be "a Key."

We must begin by acknowledging that the general views, set forth in this work, upon the nature and character of the christian Sacraments, both gratified and surprised us. They are, for the most part, the views which, though opposed by the Evangelical Party are held to by those who really acknowledge Evangelical Truth, in the church.

In a chapter, which begins rather strangely with placing "the celebration of the Lord's Supper," among "occasional offices" distinguished from "regular services," we find the following definition and note.

By the word Sacrament we mean a sacred sign, or representation of some spiritual thing, which, when received as from God, by faith, truly conveys to us, in a spiritual manner, that grace of which it is the symbol.* We call the Sacraments "holy mysteries," not as if they were able to work upon us as charms, in a miraculous manner; but because, being ordained by Christ himself, they form a very solemn and important part of the mystery of our salvation; operating invisibly on the hearts of God's children, assuring them of His grace and favour, and thus "sealing their souls to the day of redemption."

It vividly represents to believers the interest which they have in His death, thus enjoying the communion of his body broken, and his blood shed for them. Upon these they feed spiritually in the exercise of a realizing faith; the bread and wine becoming to them, as it were, the very flesh and blood of the Son of God. They feel that they are united to Christ indeed; that He is present with them, if not in a more real, yet in a more sensible manner, than in the bare hearing of the word, or the other exercises of devotion; and without presumption or superstition, they gladly confess with the Apostle;—"The cup of blessing which we bless, is it not the communion (participation) of the blood of Christ? the bread which we break, is it not the communion of the body of Christ?"

In notes placed in the Appendix, (pages 184 and 185,) we find the following.

Justin Martyr, speaking of the Lord's Supper says—"We do not receive them as common bread and wine (κοινὰ); but as Jesus our Saviour being made flesh by the Word of God, had both Flesh and Blood for our salvation, so we are taught that the food which has been consecrated (ευχαρισθεὶς τροφήν) by the prayer (made) in the words (received) from him, by which (food) our flesh and blood by change (into their substance) are nourished, is (spiritually) the flesh and blood of the incarnate Jesus." Apol. i. 86.

This was written about fifty years after the book of Revelation, and seems precisely similar to the statement in the Church Catechism:—"The Body and Blood of Christ, which are verily and indeed taken and received by the faithful in the Lord's Supper,"—under the "outward and visible signs" of "Bread and wine."

"Thus much we must be sure to hold, that in the Supper of the Lord there is no vain ceremony, no bare sign, no untrue figure of a thing absent; but as the Scripture saith, the table of the Lord, yea, the communion of body and blood of the Lord, in a marvellous incorporation, which by the operation of the Holy Ghost, the very bond of our conjunction with Christ, is through faith wrought in the souls of the faithful." Hom. xxvii. 1. The first part of this Homily well deserves the reader's, not only perusal, but prayerful study.

Archbishop Sandys well observes—"In the Eucharist, our corporal tasting of the visible elements sheweth the heavenly nourishing of our souls unto life by the mystical participation of the glorious body and blood of Christ. For inasmuch as he saith of one of these sacred elements, 'This is my body' . . . He giveth us plainly to understand, that all the graces which may flow from the body and blood of Christ Jesus, are in a mystery here not represented only, but presented unto us." Sermons, Park. Soc. Ed. p. 308. The whole discourse will repay a diligent perusal. See also Abp. Cranmer on the Lord's Supper. Park. Soc. Ed. pp. 136, 148, 161, &c.

We might take exceptions to some things found in the chapter upon "the communion," but we pass to that on "Baptism," as containing objectionable matter of graver importance. This subject, like many others in the Book, is treated in the beginning in such a manner as leads one to hope for a favourable issue. But the end is not as the beginning. For example, the chapter opens with these words, "The Holy Ordinance of Baptism—the sacramental beginning of our Christian life, &c." And on pages 190 and 191, are the following statements.

Thus our Lord, in his remarkable discourse with Nicodemus, the Jewish ruler, alluded to this rite under the terms "born of water;" a phrase which, though misunderstood by the carnal-minded Israelite, plainly conveyed the idea of making a disciple by means of Baptism.*

John, indeed, was the first of whom we read in Scripture, who used this rite in a symbolical manner. From his frequent use of it, he was called "the Baptist;" and he thus, by a "visible sign of an invisible grace," taught the need of that "Repentance" which he was specially commissioned to preach, as the forerunner of our Lord; whose peculiar province it was to bestow the "Remission of sins," of which Baptism was an especial emblem and pledge †

But since true Christianity is not a mere name, or empty distinction, but consists in an inward change of heart, which is called in Scripture Regeneration, or a new birth; it follows that Baptism itself (as our Church declares), "Is not only a sign of profession, and mark of difference, whereby Christian men are discerned from others that be not christened; but it is also a sign of regeneration, or new birth, whereby, as by an instrument, they that receive Baptism rightly, are grafted into the Church; the promises of forgiveness of sin, and of our adoption to be the sons of God by the Holy Ghost are visibly signed and sealed; faith is confirmed, and grace increased by virtue of prayer unto God."

We find the doctrine of baptismal regeneration clearly expressed and defined, in the following remarks upon the opening exhortation of the service. (Chapter VII. page 196.)

"Forasmuch as all men are conceived and born in sin; and that our Saviour Christ saith, None can enter into the kingdom of God, except he be regenerate and born anew of Water and the Holy Ghost." Here, we see, Regeneration is clearly connected with Baptism; for although, as Hooker says, "All receive not the grace of God which receive the Sacraments of his grace: Neither is it ordinarily his will to bestow the grace of Sacraments on any but by the Sacraments." But, as he adds in the same place, "which grace, they that receive by Sacraments or with Sacraments, receive it from him, and not from them;" so our Church calls upon us to use the appointed means with earnest prayer for a Divine blessing. "I beseech you to call upon God," &c. It is not any outward or nominal Regeneration, as some have argued, for which the Church pleads so earnestly with God. Not a change of State only, but of nature. This is forcibly taught by the words which follow: "That of his bounteous mercy he will grant to this child that thing which by nature he cannot have; that he may be baptized" not only with water, but "with the Holy Ghost;" and so "received into Christ's Holy Church, and be made a lively member of the same."

* John iii. 5. On this passage Hooker judiciously observes: "I hold it for a most infallible rule in expositions of Sacred Scripture, that where a literal construction will stand, the furthest from the letter is commonly the worst;" and further adds, "Of all the ancients there is not one to be named that ever did otherwise either expound or allege the place, than as implying external baptism."—Eccles. Pol. B. v. 59. (2.) (3.) Keble's Ed.

† Mark i. 4. "for (marg. unto) the remission of sins," that was to come after. Comp. Matt. iii. 11. Melancthon thus distinguishes "between the baptism of John and Christ's baptism; that in the former the remission of sins was not expressed, which is expressed by the latter." See "Annotations" in John i. and Matt. iii.

We find also the following in the Appendix, page 229.

It is of much importance that we should form a right estimate of the spiritual benefits to be derived from the ordinance of Baptism, both on account of the neglect of this Divine institution by too many at the present day, the abuse of it by others, and the exaggeration of its influence by a numerous party both in and out of the Church.

We have seen that our Church defines this Sacrament to be a "sign" of regeneration, and "seal" of the promises, and a means, when "rightly received," of spiritual union with Christ, thus making us partakers of all the benefits of His redemption.

That Baptism is a sign and seal, few persons will be inclined to doubt; but that it is also a means of grace, a channel along which, as by the Word of God, so by His Sacrament, also, the blessings of salvation flow, and are derived to man, is a point which has been much controverted. But that it is a view strictly scriptural we may collect from such passages as the following.

Baptism is spoken of as a means of obtaining remission of sins. "Repent, and be baptized every one of you in the name of Jesus Christ for the remission of sins." (Acts ii. 38.) "Arise, and be baptized, and wash away thy sins" (xxii. 16.) As a means of receiving the Holy Ghost, "Be baptized and ye shall receive the gift of the Holy Ghost" (ii. 38.) As a means of regeneration and sanctification, "Except a man be born again, he cannot see the kingdom of God" (John iii. 3.) Explained and unfolded (v. 5.) "Except a man be born of water and of the Spirit." "Christ loved the Church, and gave himself for it; that he might sanctify and cleanse it by the washing of water by the word" (Eph. v. 25, 26.) "The washing of regeneration" (Tit. iii. 5.) As a means of union with Christ, and consequent death unto sin; "Know ye not, that so many of us as were baptized into Jesus Christ, were baptized into his death? Therefore we are buried with him by baptism into death" (Rom. vi. 3, 4.) "Buried with him in Baptism" (Col. ii. 12.) "As many of you as have been baptized into Christ have put on Christ" (Gal. iii. 27.) And lastly, as a means of salvation; "He that believeth and is baptized shall be saved" (Mark xvi. 16.) "Baptism doth now save us, not the putting away the filth of the flesh" (1 Pet. ii. 21.) "He hath saved us by the washing of regeneration" (Titus iii. 6.)

And in reference to the "Thanksgiving after the Baptism," the author says, the child being now, by Baptism, "regenerate" and grafted into the body of Christ's Church." Thus far we gladly follow this author; and no further. Here the scene changes, as rapidly as we have beheld some bright and sunny day, when earth rejoiced in the sweet smile of heaven, darkened by threatening clouds, and blackened with the horrors of an impending tempest. Thus is that blessed sacrament, which revealed a gracious Father smiling in mercy upon our children turned into a dark and forbidding mockery, veiling, beneath its thin guise, the frown of a predetermined decree of wrath and condemnation. And fond parents, who bring their children to a Saviour's arms, may only place them in the hands of an inexorable Judge. On page 207 the following question and answer occur.

"But here we are frequently met with the objection, 'How can we give thanks for that which is, at best, uncertain?' We answer, because we believe that God always hears the prayers of His people, if consistent with His own glory and their good; and as we know of no hindrance in this case, we confidently hope that our petitions are answered. The Church has provided a spiritual service for her children, to be used in a spiritual manner; and if we have endeavoured, by God's help, to follow her guidance, though with unequal footsteps, we cannot do less than give thanks for His grace and mercy thus visibly signed and sealed. This is the language of Faith and Hope, and is it not that of Charity also? At the same time, we protest earnestly against the error of those, (however great their names, or high their reputation as divines,) who hold that the Church intended to declare, what we conceive to be equally unscriptural and dangerous, the actual regeneration of every baptized infant. We would fully concur in Abp. Usher's statement. 'Some have the outward sign, and not the inward grace: some have the inward grace, and not the outward sign. We must not commit idolatry, by deifying the outward element.'"

Holding, as Hooker and our earliest and greatest Reformed Divines ever held, "the certainty and perpetuity of faith in the elect" of God,—we cannot think that so many children have been born again in their infancy, and have since wholly departed from God in their childhood, without giving any proof of a change of nature."

* So writes that luminary of the Irish Church. Abp. Usher, "What say you of infants baptized? Doth the inward grace in their baptism always attend upon the outward sign? Surely no. The sacrament of baptism is effectual in infants, only to those and to all those who belong unto the election of grace. Which thing, though we, in the judgment of charity, do judge of every particular infant; yet we have no ground to judge so of all in general; or, if we should judge so, it is not any judgment of certainty; we may be mistaken." Body of Divinity, p. 396. Compare Faber's Prim. Doct. of Regeneration, B. iv. c. 2, pp. 330—340, who calls this statement an "Official Generic Declaration." See also Dean Milner's Life, ch. 16, who calls it, (pp. 326, 397, &c.) "An hypothesis, a charitable assumption of repentance and faith on the part of the infant." See also Bishop Burnet on Art. xxvii. p. 383.

† Body of Divinity, p. 396. See also Abp. Leighton on 1 Peter iii. 21.

The passages here quoted from Archbishop Usher's "Body of Divinity," are probably, but not certainly his own. See Dr. Robinson's Preface, p. xiii. and Table of Extracts. These remarks are applicable also to note 1 p. 232.

* See Church Catechism, Art. xxv. and Hom. xxi. where the nature of a sacrament is thus defined. "As for the number of the sacraments, if they should be considered according to the exact signification of a sacrament—namely, for the visible signs expressly commanded in the New Testament, whereunto is annexed the promise of free forgiveness of our sins, and of our holiness and joining to Christ—there be but two; namely, Baptism, and the Supper of the Lord." But it is added,—"In a general acceptance, the name of a sacrament may be attributed to anything whereby a holy thing is signified. In which understanding of the word, the ancient writers have given this name, not only to the other five, (Romish sacraments,) but also to divers other ceremonies." See a so Hooker, Ecc. Pol. v. 50. (1.)

This strange view is further elucidated in the Appendix, p. 233.

"Either then, Baptismal Regeneration is, as Augustine seems to have occasionally suggested, a merely external change; an opinion quite unsupported by the language of the service which we have been considering; or, it is the peculiar privilege of those who are "sanctified by the Holy Ghost," viz. "all the elect people of God." Taking this principle as our key, we shall find the whole of our authorized formularies, to harmonize with each other, and with Scripture, and, in particular, we shall have, in this Divine ordinance, "an outward and visible sign of an inward and spiritual grace;" a sure warrant for faith to rest upon, not an "opus operatum" for superstitious ignorance and presumption to fortify themselves with.

The view is simply this. As the promises of God are effectual only to those who are (calvinistically) elect, so, while the church's service really asserts the doctrine of baptismal regeneration, it is "the peculiar privilege" only of such infants as are numbered among "the few chosen." The reprobate do not receive baptismal grace, for this is indefectible, and once received, they cannot fall from it. Thus a portion of baptized infants receive the form of baptism, while others by the decision of a God of mercy receive the reality, and these are truly regenerate!

Is this, we ask solemnly, Evangelical teaching? Is this the gospel of that Saviour who says of our hearts' dear treasures, "suffer them to come unto Me and forbid them not," and who taught His Apostle to say "Arise and be baptised every one of you in the name of Jesus Christ, for the remission of sins, and ye shall receive the gift of the Holy Ghost. For the promise is to you, and to your children, and to all that are afar off, even as many as the Lord our God shall call?" Is not this teaching directly contrary to the XVI. and XXVII. articles of the church? Nay, does it not charge the Church with open deception and falsehood when she says those comfortable words to Christian parents, as they bear their offspring, in trembling hope, to lay them at a Saviour's feet—"doubt ye not, therefore, but earnestly believe, that He will likewise favourably receive these present infants, that He will embrace them with His arms of mercy; that He will give unto them the blessing of eternal life, and make them partakers of His everlasting kingdom?"

We said, in our former article, that this work, published by a "Protestant Episcopal Society for the promotion of Evangelical Knowledge," gives up the strong proof upon which the argument rests for the Episcopacy, as a Divine Institution. This is a grave charge, we admit, and, if true, of itself proves these setters forth of strange doctrine to be unworthy of the confidence of the members of a church "built upon the foundation of the Apostles and Prophets, Jesus Christ Himself being the chief corner stone."

The proof of this charge is found first on page 307.

Thus we have traced the origin of a threefold order of Ministers in the Church of Christ, even in the days of the Apostles, and from the simple testimony of Scripture. It is nevertheless true that this order was not uniformly established in the Churches at that early period, as it appears to have been shortly afterwards. In some Christian Churches, there were only Presbyter-Bishops† and Deacons, while in others, as at Corinth, for any thing we know to the contrary, there seem to have been no presiding Ministers; but the Church was indebted to the extraordinary gifts of its numerous Prophets, for the administration, irregular and disorderly as it was, of the means of grace.‡

But a much stronger proof is found in the Appendix, on page 334.

"How early we are to date the general establishment of a settled Episcopacy, is a difficult question, respecting which very different opinions have been held. Most moderate writers agree with Hooker in thinking, that a College of Presbyters was the first form of Church-government established by the Apostles. But, while some, with him, suppose that they shortly afterwards superadded the order of fixed Presidents, or "Bishops by restraint," as he calls those whom we should term Diocesan Bishops, others, supporting themselves by the authority of Jerome, attribute the origin of a localized Episcopacy, to a "custom of the Church," supposed to have been generally adopted as "a remedy against schism," about the date A. D. 140.

It must be allowed to be rather remarkable that, in some of the most ancient and valuable monuments of antiquity, that have come down to our times, little or no reference is made to this order; such, at least as would afford any positive proof of its distinct and peculiar character. Thus Clement of Rome, in his Epistle to the Corinthians, speaks of "Rulers" (ῥητορας) and "Bishops" (ἐπισκοποι) but always in the plural number;

† Compare Acts xx. 17, and 28, where the same persons are called "elders," or "presbyters," and "overseers," or "bishops." See also Titus i. 5-7, and Phil. i. 1, and Whitby on these texts. Ecc. Pol. vii. 5, 9, (3) and notes.

‡ See Whitby on 2 Cor. ii. 6. There seem, however, to have been Presbyters at Corinth in the Apostolic age; for Clement of Rome speaks of some who had been deposed after an honorable ministry at Corinth, who were appointed by the Apostles, and of others who had died. Ep. ad Corinth, i. § 44. The presbyterial government seems to have continued there till his time; for he uses the words Bishop and Presbyter synonymously. Comp. § 42 with § 44.

and the three orders are nowhere to be found in juxtaposition. We must not, however, rashly conclude from this circumstance, that there were no bishops in the age of Clement:—for we have ground for believing that he was himself Bishop of Rome, at this very time, though it is remarkable that he makes no allusion to the subject. Nor does Ignatius allude to it in his Epistle to the Romans. Again, Justin Martyr, in his first Apology, speaks of a "President" (πρεσβυτης) administering the Eucharist, and performing other acts of public worship, assisted by his "Deacons." Two orders only. Tertullian, also, in his account of the discipline of Christian Churches in his own time, says, that "approved elders preside." Probably Bishops were intended, but they are not distinguished from Presbyters; perhaps, because in most cases, they were overseers of their respective flocks, rather than of the clergy;—few or no Presbyters being placed under them. We must not forget, however, that, on other occasions, Tertullian expressly notices the distinction between the three orders;—as where he says that "the right of baptizing belongs to the chief priest, who is the bishop; and after him to presbyters and deacons, yet not without the authority of the Bishop." As yet however, the Church seems to have been in a transition state, her rudimental government, in some places, exhibiting only two orders of the Christian ministry, in others, the whole three complete."

This teaching will certainly suit Presbyterians, and agree with their ideas of "Evangelical knowledge," but, we believe, few in the church will assent to it. If the constitution of the Ministry was not from the beginning Episcopal, then the claims of our church are absurd and preposterous. If Episcopacy cannot be "tested by scripture," and sustained by the practice of Apostolic times, then we, who make so much of it, are deserving of all the reproach we thus receive, and the church asserts in her standards a downright untruth, when she says, "It is evident unto all men, diligently reading Holy Scripture and ancient authors, that from the Apostle's time there have been these orders of Ministers in Christ's Church,—Bishops, Priests, and Deacons."

We are not about to argue the case as with the advocates of parity, and show the truth of the Church's standards in opposition to the teachings of this Society. We are merely showing that its "first publication" is not in conformity with "Evangelical knowledge," as our Church professes it. And we charge this publication not only with the error of abandoning scriptural grounds, and the testimony of the Apostolic age, but we must also add that it sustains this position by incorrectly quoting the opinion of a great Writer. It says "most moderate writers agree with Hooker in thinking, that a College of Presbyters was the first form of church-government established by the Apostles." Hooker never thought so, and if he did, he does not express it in Book VII. Chap. V. We refer our readers to the place, if a copy of Hooker is in their possession. Hooker does indeed speak of "a college of ecclesiastical persons" termed "sometimes Presbyters, sometimes Bishops," but he shows that as "the laity or people were subject unto" these, so these were under the rule of some Apostle. He cites the example of Ephesus, and says "these persons ecclesiastical being termed as then, Presbyters and Bishops both, were all subject unto Paul as to an higher governor appointed of God to be over them." To which he adds this note—"as appeareth by his sending to call the Presbyters of Ephesus before him as far as to Miletum, (Acts xx. 17.) which was almost fifty miles, and by his leaving Timothy in his place, with his authority, and instructions for ordaining of ministers there (1 Tim. v. 22,) and for proportioning their maintenance (ver. 17, 18) and for holding them in an uniformity of doctrine (ch. i. 3.)" He then shows that "as the Apostles could not themselves be present in all churches" and difficulties grew out of their absence, "there could be no sufficient remedy provided, except according to the order of Jerusalem already begun, some one were endued with episcopal authority over the rest, which one being resident might keep them in order"—"This one president or governor amongst the rest, had his known authority established a long time before that settled difference of name and title took place, whereby such alone were called Bishops. And therefore in the Book of St. John's Revelation, we find that they are entitled Angels."

He proceeds in these very words "Nor was this order peculiar unto some few churches, but the whole world universally became subject thereunto; inasmuch as they did not account it to be a church which was not subject unto a Bishop. It was the general received persuasion of the ancient christian world, that ecclesia est in episcopo, 'the outward being of a church consisteth in the having of a Bishop.' That where Colleges of Presbyters were, there was at the first equality amongst them, St. Jerome thinketh it a matter clear: but when the rest were thus equal, so that no one of them could command any other as inferior unto him, they all were controllable by the Apostles, who had that Episcopal authority abiding at the first in themselves, which they afterwards derived unto others." Ecc. Pol. vii. 5.

This is the passage referred to, by this "Protestant Episcopal Society's" "first publication," to sustain an argument in favour of Presbyterianism! Upon this very passage, designated in the note, is based the remarkable assertion "most moderate writers agree with Hooker in thinking that a College of Presbyters was the first form of church government established by the Apostles!"

We leave our readers to judge whether such teaching is likely to promote evangelical knowledge. The length of this article forbids further comment. We have sought to speak plainly, but not harshly, the truth, as it appears to us, concerning the first publication of a society which has set itself up as a standard of evangelical truth in the church. This publication may well excite the fears of those who would see no changes in the old truth of the gospel, whereof the church has been the witness and keeper "through the ages all along."

And we believe that every sound-minded churchman, who reads this new "Key to the Prayer Book," will devoutly wish, if such are to be the works published, that these who have put this forth as "their first publication" may very soon give us their last.

P. S.—Since the above article was in type, we have learned that this Work has been "suppressed" by the Society, at its late anniversary meeting in this City, and "the Key" is itself locked up! The Society may suppress their edition, they may allow the two editions, printed beforehand to supply the expected demand, to rot upon their shelves in hidden obscurity, but they cannot suppress, they cannot hide from the Church the fact, that this Book was published by their own Executive Committee, at a great cost to the Society, and with the following declaration in "the Preface" to the Society's edition.

The Committee think themselves happy in being able to present to the friends of the Society the following work, as their first publication. Years would have been required in the preparation of such "a Key" as is here, in the good Providence of God, supplied them by the piety, discernment, and industry of a Clergyman of the Church of England. They would, therefore, thankfully adopt and publish this volume as, in the main, a correct exponent of their views, and as a book every way suitable for instruction and edification.

We have shown that the Evangelical Author, and the Evangelical Committee, did not agree as to the details of "Evangelical Knowledge." Now we have the additional fact that the "Evangelical Society" agrees with neither. This melancholy truth we deduce from the whole, that, according to some, Evangelical Knowledge is a very uncertain thing. And we would earnestly advise those who set themselves up in the Church as its only teachers, first to settle among themselves what it is, and what it is not.

THE CHURCH OF ST. JAMES THE LESS.—We enjoyed the privilege of attending divine worship, in this holy and beautiful Sanctuary, on an occasion of week-day service. It was upon one of those warm and sunny days which give peculiar richness to the brilliant hues of Autumn. The site of this Church is peculiarly well chosen, so that it may well claim, as appropriate a part of the Scriptural description of Zion—"beautiful for situation." This we esteem a matter to which attention should always be given in the country. The scenery around a church should always, if possible, harmonize with the external and internal beauty of the edifice, so that nature and art may conspire to lend attractiveness to the place which should be "the joy of the whole earth." This double effect is, we think, attained in the position and architecture of St. James the Less. No one who has stood upon the eminence, whereon this noble specimen of a rural church has been reared, and gazed upon the beautiful outlines of meadow and hill, stretching around, studded with noble trees, can deny that the site is peculiarly well chosen.

Our object in this notice is not so much to give a faithful description of this Church as to excite a desire on the part of our readers to go and see for themselves. We confess that the building itself produced a pleasurable feeling, which no description, however accurate, could give. This effect was caused by the conviction that every thing about this edifice is real. There is no pretence, no deception about it. Neither paint nor plaster detract from the character of the place of which it should ever be said, "Jerusalem shall be called a city of truth." The stone is stone, the oak is oak! The stone, from which it is built, is a species of gray granite from a neighbouring quarry. The high pitched roofs, the well-defined chancel of unusual depth, the beautiful south porch, the prominent buttresses, and the symmetrical bell gable, with four bells exposed to view, present lines of varied beauty, and compose a picture which, instead of wearying the eye with its dull monotony, grows upon the sight. Each of the gables is surmounted with an ornamental stone cross. The style is early English, and carrying the mind back to former days, assures those who enter its ancient-looking porch that they are entering the sanctuary of a Church not of yesterday, and answers the question, "Where was your Church before Luther?"

The mind is most easily affected through the eye, and there is an influence in the style of church architecture stronger than is commonly supposed. We do not deny that the old faith may enter the unsightly door of a modern four cornered Meeting House, but we should fear that the good old feeling sometimes escapes through the wide gaping square windows.

If the exterior of the Church of St. James the Less pleased us, the interior effect was still more impressive. There is a remarkable union of cheerfulness and solemnity, produced by well selected colours, and well disposed light and shade. The gray colour of the granite, the sober hue of the oak, and the grave, but not sombre shade of the stained windows, which are deeply set in the solid walls, combine to throw over the interior a light, which is as far removed from a painful glare, as from a false gloom. The eastern triplet, lighting the deep chancel, is peculiarly effective. The west window is also very graceful in shape, and makes the view from the chancel most pleasing. The windows are all filled with flowered quarries of various patterns. The floors are laid with encaustic tiles of black and red, those of the chancel being of a richer colouring. The reredos is of blue buff, and red tiles. There are ten stalls in the chancel, from one of which prayers are said. There is outside the chancel a Lectern, from which the Lessons are read and the Sermon preached, with a Litany desk beside it. The font, placed opposite the south porch, is a massive one, cut out of Connecticut sand stone. This and the Lectern and Litany desk are from designs in the Instrumenta Ecclesiastica. The Bishop's seat, of very appropriate design, and the credence table are in niches of the chancel, near the altar. These all, together with the chime of bells, the stone cross over the chancel, and a rood screen (not yet in its place) were all contributed, in specific donations, by individuals. The seats are all of carved oak, the standards of those in the aisles being surmounted with poppy heads. They are all free. The roofs are open, and of oak.

We have purposely abstained, as far as possible, from the use of technical terms in this imperfect description. The day, we hope, will come when these will be familiar words to every intelligent churchman.

The ground-plan of the church consists of a deep chancel, with a robing room at the north side, a nave and north and south aisles. The roofs of the Nave and Aisles are supported by chaste granite columns, of solid cut stone, and these, marking the divisions of the church, have a very good effect. The most marked, and we may add most criticised feature in the plan of this church is the very deep chancel. We must confess that a view of the reality, and reflection upon its effect have satisfied us that there is a good answer to be given to the ready question of this utilitarian age, "Cui bono?" "What's the use?" Is not so deep a chancel a waste of space, of stone and mortar, and of money, yes, awful sin! of money! This depends entirely upon a previous question. For what use and end are churches built? If for man alone, to afford him a comfortable meeting house, then every inch that is not occupied with sittings, every dollar that is bestowed upon chancel room, &c., instead of being applied to soft and easy sofa seats, &c., is a clear waste! But if, on the other hand, we are building a House of God, wherein His Holy Presence is to be sought and realised, then let the glorious truth be evident. If you can, set apart a portion of each Temple, and that not a mean corner, or a narrow enclosure, visibly separate from the part occupied by man. And let this be so large a part that it may suggest the question, why is this space unoccupied, and the answer will occur to every mind, "This is the house of God." And to no better, more profitable, or more worthy use could a portion of it be devoted, than to proclaim this glorious truth, and to impress its influence upon every worshipper.

The attractive subject has led us to greater length in these remarks than we intended. We cannot conclude without advising our readers not to form an opinion of this church upon hearsay evidence. Let them look and judge for themselves. And if possible, that they may see it to the best advantage, let them go there, not to criticise, but on an occasion of service, to worship and fall down and kneel before the Lord their Maker. And, if they enter this church with the right spirit, they will return from it saying with Jacob of old, "This is none other but the House of God."

Besides the usual services on Sunday at half past 10, A. M., and 4 P. M., the church is open for prayers every Wednesday morning, at 9, and every Friday afternoon, at 4 o'clock, and on other Holy Days in the morning.

We take the following from "the Protestant Churchman." We wish our brother editor a prosperous voyage, and hope that it may have a beneficial effect.

"The Rev. JOHN W. BROWN, in consequence of the state of his health, has been recommended to take a voyage to Europe, and accordingly sailed for Europe on the 20th inst. During his absence, the paper will be under the management of several of the clergy and laity. Communications are to be addressed as heretofore, to the Editor of the Protestant Churchman."

Foreign Intelligence.

The English Churchman publishes, at length, our reply to the sweeping charge, made by that paper, of hostility, shown by American Journals and public men, against Great Britain. To this are appended the following courteous remarks.

"We can assure our indignant contemporaries that we never dreamt of including them, or any of the other Church papers, in what we readily admit to have been too sweeping a charge; for, while they continue to devote so much space as they do to extracts from the English Church periodicals, it would be foolish as well as ungrateful to deny, or doubt, their sympathy with, and appreciation of, the English Church and nation. Consequently, it is a far more pleasing, as well as a more graceful act, to entirely withdraw, and even apologize for, the paragraph in question, than to attempt to discuss with our friendly contemporaries the relative proportion of truth and exaggeration which it contains."

In return for this graceful apology, we protest against the term, "indignant contemporaries." Our indignation, if we had any, was virtuous, and it fulfilled the Apostolic injunction—"Be ye angry and sin not. Let not the sun go down upon your wrath." We design no quarrel with any "English Churchman," especially with one so well conducted as our respected and amiable contemporary.

The most important news from England, is the conviction of Smith O'Brien. We are happy to see that both the English Churchman and the Guardian, express a decided opinion that the recommendation of mercy, on the part of the jury, will be acceded to. The English Churchman says:

"In Ireland, the first State prosecution has ended in the conviction of O'Brien, with a recommendation from the jury, that his life should be spared. This, of course, will be done."

We regret to learn that there is no doubt of the existence of the Cholera in England. We take the following from the "Guardian."

"There seems little doubt, we regret to say, that cases of cholera in excess of the usual average at this period of the year have appeared in Edinburgh, and that some special instances have also appeared at Sunderland and Hull. There have also been a few in the hulks at Woolwich, and some, it is said, in the metropolis, in addition to the two or three cases which occurred a fortnight back, and were then noticed in the Guardian. It seems unlikely, however, we may hope, that the disease will occur in any strength at this period of the year, the probability being that its progress will be checked, as in the autumn of 1831, by the approach of the cold weather."

In this connection we give the following from "the English Churchman."

We trust that in the mercy of God, this scourge will not revisit our land. But it is well to be prepared. And we would hint, in the name of the publisher, that there are other maladies, besides Cholera, which may be prevented by attention to the "suggestion, No. 4."

PREVENTION OF THE CHOLERA.

To the Editor of the English Churchman.

SIR,—As "prevention is better than cure," will you allow me to suggest two or three simple means by which much may be done to prevent attacks of cholera.

1. By wearing a broad bandage of new flannel round the body, and especially across the whole of the stomach, by day and by night; taking care to have ready another bandage well aired, to replace the first when it is removed.

2. To give away any cast off, or superfluous, warm clothing, to those about us, who cannot afford to buy such.

3. To read, and make brief and plain notes of the official suggestions, for the benefit of our households, and dependents; and to inquire particularly into their diet and habits, taking care not to overwork them, nor underpay, or underfeed them.

4. To make a special point of paying our tradesmen's bills as speedily as possible, so that we may not be the means of adding to their difficulties and anxieties at a time when it may prove fatal to them; for all parties concur in the opinion that peace of mind is a most essential feature in the case. Many a man is harassed almost to death, and to the entire ruin of his prospects or business, because parties who can afford to pay, simply neglect to "settle his little account."

I am, &c.,

AN ENGLISHMAN.

[We especially recommend the suggestion, No. 4, to the attention of those of our subscribers whose accounts due at Midsummer last, and previous dates, are still unpaid.—Ed. E. C.]

ST. MARY'S HALL AND BURLINGTON COLLEGE.—The Winter Term of these Institutions commences on the First day of November.

—"DEALING EQUAL MEASURE TO PUSEYISM AND RADICALISM."

Our readers will, perhaps, remember an article, thus headed and signed, "A," published lately in the Banner. This article was sent to us, after its insertion had been refused by "the Western Episcopalian." As we could not find even one good reason against publishing it, we placed the article, as requested, in our columns.

In justice to "the Western Episcopalian," we publish their remarks appended to this article printed from the Banner. We advise our readers to compare this article itself with the following editorial remarks that they may judge, for themselves, the force of the five "reasons."

Our reasons for not inserting the above communication were given in the following paragraph:—

"To CORRESPONDENTS. We decline publishing the communication of 'A,' for the following reasons:—1st. Because it contains a personality. 2d. Because its alleged statistics are indefinite and unproved. 3d. Because it employs leading terms in a sense in which the writer to whom he replies never dreamed of. 4th. Because it is in reply to a piece written more than three months ago—and 5thly. Because for these reasons, as well as others, it would lead to unprofitable controversy."

Now let the reader, with such helps as we shall give him between brackets, judge of the validity of these reasons:—

"1st. Because it contains a personality." [This was our smallest reason or objection, and after the manner of good rhetoricians we put it first.] "2dly. Because its alleged statistics are indefinite and unproved." ["Indefinite"—let the reader judge—"unproved"—where is the proof that the six clergymen in Ohio went down to "rationalism and radicalism?" Some of them, we understand, were displayed for immoralities. And where is the proof that the sixty clergymen in the United States went down to "rationalism and radicalism." Does "A." include under these terms every species of sin? So it appeared to us—and hence our third reason against publishing his piece. 3dly. Because it employs leading terms in a sense in which the writer to whom he replies never dreamed of." [i. e. it includes under the terms "radicalism and rationalism" all the wickedness of all creation!—viz: "Infidelity, irreverence, indifference, insubordination,"—"agencies to level our holy religion," &c., "all the enemies of God and all the powers of hell combined," &c.—all this united torrent our good brother calls "the rapid, the fearful progress of rationalism," and asks, "Is not rationalism a far, far greater evil than Puseyism?" Most undoubtedly, if our "good brother" includes in the term all these evils. We assure him that in using the word we never "dreamed of" a tinge of them. His dictionary must teach very differently from ours.] "4thly. Because it is in reply to a piece written more than three months ago." [Undeniable.] "5thly. Because for these reasons as well as others, it would lead to an unprofitable controversy." [Let the reader judge from the present beginning as a specimen.]

The idea of our "good brother," that six of the seven American perverts to Rome, first took the fever of Popery in the climate of "Dissent," and then matured it so very—very—rapidly in the regions of ultra-churchism and Puseyism, ought to give him even a more dreadful idea of the atmosphere of those semi-Romish regions, than he seems to think we have. True, our illustration of the matter differs from his, but we think ours is the better.

It is rather odd to find with what gravity our good brother takes Ohio! as an illustration of the comparative progress of Puseyism in the whole church! It is like taking the quantity of ice to be found in some tropical region, as data from which to calculate how much there is on the whole globe. Puseyism here, like ice there, can only exist in small quantities carefully wrapped up and hidden away in a few underground places. And although our brother may think us more than a little mad, on this subject of Puseyism, we can assure him that for one we shall do our utmost always to keep our Diocese too hot to hold any such material.

THE CHURCH'S CARE FOR SEAMEN.—We gave lately an account of the Floating Church for Seamen which is soon to be moored in the Port of Philadelphia. We gave last week a brief account of the interesting anniversary meeting held in St. James's Church. We append some remarks on the subject from the Christian Witness.

In this connection we would state that we have put in our columns, by particular request, an account of the meeting held in New York to give a suitable Testimonial, on the part of the City Authorities, to Frederick Jerome, the seaman who braved the flood and fire to save so many fellow beings from destruction. Those who heard Mr. Parker's graphic account of this perilous achievement will readily own that too much honor cannot be given to this brave and magnanimous sailor. But, we have heard some say, he will be spoiled by so much notice! Why? Because he is a poor Sailor! No fear of spoiling your successful Generals, whose achievements are stained with blood, no danger of spoiling your popular Politicians, your eloquent orators who, unlike this poor man, gain their renown by what they say rather than by what they do. Shout, parade, weave garlands, let the deafening cannon roar, to welcome your Soldiers from battle, your Candidates from the arena of political strife, but oh, be very careful how you praise or honor the bravery and magnanimity of the poor sailor, whose deeds of mercy have a brightness which outshines the glory won in the council or the field! Take care, you may spoil him! But for all this, you will have no easy task to spoil Frederick Jerome, the heroic Christian Sailor.

THE CAUSE OF SEAMEN.—We are truly thankful that the Church has at length been aroused to consider the condition of our brethren of the ocean, and in four of our maritime cities to secure to them her services, "without money and without price." Five years since, a few Churchmen, in the city of New York, turned their attention to the maritime field, and already the interest awakened by them may be seen in the two beautiful "Floating Chapels," on the East and North river. The next year, the condition and claims of seamen were presented to the Churchmen of Boston, by the Rev. Mr. Robinson, the missionary, who leased a large upper room, on the corner of Ann and Ferry streets, where the services of the Church have been maintained, without any intermission, three times on each Lord's day. This mission has commended itself to the interest and prayers of many of our Churchmen, and in despite of its inconveniences, has been visited by upwards of twelve thousand seamen, to many of whom, there is good reason to believe, it has been made a means of salvation. Two years since, the Churchmen of New Orleans fitted up a temporary chapel, and obtained the services of the Rev. Mr. Whitall; and so prosperously has this good work gone on in the crescent city, that a valuable lot of land has been purchased, on which a church is to be erected in the spring. A year ago, "a Churchman's Missionary Association" was formed in the city of Philadelphia, which, in zeal and energy, seems to have outstripped the efforts of other places, long before them in the work. This association has done nobly; and the beautiful church, the result of their well directed efforts, which in a few weeks will be moored in the waters of the Delaware, we trust will inspire Boston Churchmen to go and do likewise, and thus give a permanency to its own mission, which, by its steady, onward course, has secured the confidence of all who have worshipped in its humble upper room.

PURITAN RELICS. A correspondent of "the Christian Advocate and Journal," in an account of his "rambles in Connecticut," gives a description of "the beautiful village" of Stamford. We take the following curious fact from this narrative.

THE BURYING GROUND.

The ancient burying yard was in the centre of the town. The present one is north of the village, and is called "Northfield." The remains of the dead in the old ground were taken up some years since, and interred again in this place. The following inscription I copied from a tablet. There is so much of the "Hence, ye profane," about it, I send it to you. It smacks of Romish superstition and Puritan folly.

"Rev. John Davenport departed this life on the 5th February, A. D., 1730-1, and in the 36th year of his age.

"At honorary distance keep, nor dare disturb the peaceful sleep of Reverend DAVENPORT.
None but his sons,
the sacred tribes;
or those whom heavenly wisdom guides, may to his urn resort."

Diocesan Intelligence.

North Carolina.

The last Sunday in September and the first in October, the Bishop of North Carolina spent in visiting the missions and schools under the religious house at Valle Crucis. He reached the first mission (Wilkesboro, 45 miles from the valley) on the 23d, and was greatly encouraged to find that, notwithstanding an opposition from the sectaries, amounting to serious persecution, the church had gained sufficiently upon the feelings and affections of the community to bring a number to confirmation and the holy communion, and to secure the building of a small but beautiful and proper church—the first edifice for the public worship of God in the county seat of one of our largest counties. The Rev. W. R. Gries, a deacon from Valle Crucis, is in the immediate charge of the mission, and while called to severe trial has much to cheer and sustain him under it.

The bishop proceeded from this place to the valley, where he passed some of the happiest days of his life. The Religious House, which cost him much anxiety and labour to establish, he found, under its present Superior Head, realizing his proudest expectations. Every thing is conducted upon the best and strictest rule, and characterized by an earnestness of zeal, a depth of self-sacrifice, and a promptness and cheerfulness of obedience which can result only from an absolute consecration of soul and body to Christ, our divine head. During the last winter, the building which afforded the only accommodation for public worship, was destroyed by fire. And although the utmost labours of the brethren seemed to be required for working the farm and securing their daily bread, yet they resolved in the strength of God to redouble their efforts for the immediate erection of a chapel. And this, with God's blessing, they accomplished, without one dollar's expense, and in a style and manner, reflecting upon them the highest credit. Though not completed it was sufficiently advanced to admit of their entering it with thanksgiving to God on the blessed Easter morn. where, ever since, their prayers and praises have ascended three times a day. The antiphonal chanting, the priest at the altar responded to by a choir of well trained boys; while it is highly creditable and devotional in itself—appeals affectingly to the hearts of the poor and ignorant—showing what power might be given to our noble service in the missionary field, by due pains in this particular; showing again, that, while organs are good in their place, they are not necessary to the most simple and hence most effective antiphonal chanting.

The bishop had the happiness to perceive that the holy and self-denying labours of love, so judiciously put forth from this valley of the cross, were just breaking down the prejudices and vices of the surrounding country and gaining over the good will of all earnest minds. The congregations at the valley especially, have become large and deeply and seriously attentive; some of the most prejudiced have yielded to the truth, been baptized, and admitted through confirmation to the communion of the church. Others have ceased their opposition, paused in seriousness, or been forced to bow to the conviction, that this work is verily of God. It was also most encouraging to find that the institution had been placed upon a footing, which, from the experience of a year, left no doubt of its ability to sustain itself in every thing save the clothing of its members. The property wholly unencumbered, is made over to the diocese in trust for the benefit of the Religious House at Valle Crucis, conducting the preparatory and theological schools and missions, under its charge according to the Book of Common Prayer set forth by our branch of "the one Catholic and Apostolic Church." The small debt for the original purchase and stocking of the establishment rests upon the bishop personally, from which he feels no doubt of being soon relieved through the bounty of churchmen.

From this place the bishop went to Grace church, Morganton, where, on the 8th of October, assisted by the Rev. Messrs. Prout and Parker, he admitted to the holy order of priesthood, the Rev. Joseph C. Huske; whose labours in this interesting region have been signally blest to the increase of truth and holiness.

On Sunday (15), accompanied by the Rev. Mr. Parker and the Rev. Mr. Gries, he proceeded to consecrate to the worship of almighty God, St. Mark's church, Moxville.

On the next Sunday, (22d,) assisted by six priests, he consecrated to the same worship the Chapel of the Cross, Chapel Hill. The consecration of this church, the result of the untiring zeal and self-sacrifice of a Rev. brother, is hailed by all sincere and earnest churchmen as securing to their sons at the University of the state, the great privilege of worshipping God according to the dictate of their own consciences, and of being instructed in the faith and edified by the sacraments, once delivered to the saints.

Tennessee.—CALVARY CHURCH, MEMPHIS.—In this church on the 17th Sunday after Trinity the Rt. Rev. Bishop Otey admitted to the Holy Order of Deacons, Mr. William Steele, who for three years past, has been pursuing his studies at Columbia under the Bishop's supervision,—the sermon was preached from 1 Tim: iii. 13, and the candidate presented by the Rector Rev. D. C. Page, D.D.—In the evening we were pleased at seeing the distinction made in the dress of each order, the Bishop then appeared in his robes, the Rector in his surplice and scarf, and the Deacon in the plain surplice. After the second lesson several persons were admitted to Baptism, among others two colored persons. And after the sermon by the Bishop the rite of Confirmation was administered to twelve persons, one colored. We are glad to see that the Church in the south is awakening to an interest in the religious training of the colored population; there is a colored Sunday School connected with Calvary Church consisting of about thirty persons, mostly adults, and there are several colored communicants in the Parish. The Church is the only body that can christianize the negroes, and at the hands of Churchmen most assuredly is the work required. And to do this, you must give them such teaching as the Church alone can give, that is simple yet firm and unwavering, not forced upon them in a moment of excitement, but the fruits of long preparation, and steady training in religious principles; this we trust is doing in this Parish, and may He who for our sakes took upon Him the form of a servant, bless the good work already begun, and open the eyes of our brethren in the South to its importance, that these degenerate sons of Africa, who in the early days of our faith could boast their Bishops, and their Martyrs in the cause of Christ, may once more be gathered into His fold, and partake of the benefits of His death and passion even as we.

R. H. W.

Western New York—ST. ANDREW'S CHURCH, NEW BERLIN.—This Church was consecrated to the service of Almighty God by the Rt. Rev. Bishop DeLancey on Wednesday, the 18th inst. The request to consecrate was read by the Rev. Mr. Rogers, of Greene; sentence of consecration by the Rev. Mr. Hull, Rector of the parish. The ante-communion service was read by the Bishop, the Rev. Mr. Beach, of Louisville, reading the epistle, and the Rev. Dr. Andrews, of Binghamton, the gospel. After which five persons (one from Sherburne) were confirmed, the Rev. Mr. Hull reading the confirmation preface.

The Bishop preached an appropriate discourse from Psalms xcii. 5, very distinctly explaining the meaning of the consecration services and the obligations resting upon the vestry as Trustees for God ever to preserve the consecrated edifice from all unhallowed uses.

On Thursday, the 19th inst., the Bishop held an ordination and admitted Mr. Alexander Capron and Mr. Noble Palmer, of the diocese of New York, to the holy order of Deacons. The sermon was preached by the Rev. Mr. Tuttle, of Hudson, N. Y., from St. Luke ix. 54, 55. It was an admirable delineation of the spirit with which the work of the ministry should be carried on.—The closing address to the candidates was faithful, sound and discriminating, expressed in language peculiarly felicitous and impressive. A copy was requested for publication, which request we trust will be complied with.

The candidates were presented by the Rev. Mr. Beach, of Louisville, N. Y. The Bishop then proceeded with the ordination service. The Rev. Mr. Capron read the gospel. The Rev. Mr. Andrews and the Rev. Mr. Hull assisted in administering the elements. The oblations at the offertory were appropriated to Diocesan Missions.

This beautiful Church is built of stone after a design of Richard Upjohn, Esq. It has been erected by the enterprising inhabitants of New Berlin, at a cost of about $8,000. It requires more knowledge of architecture than we possess to give an adequate description of this Church.

We congratulate the Rector upon the completion of a work which does so much credit to his perseverance, and is such an ornament to the diocese. We trust that the piety of this congregation which has prompted them to devote so much of the means which God has given them to the erection of a house for His honor and glory will meet with an ample reward, in blessing which He alone can bestow.—Gospel Messenger.

Massachusetts.—CONFIRMATION.—This rite was administered for the first time, in the hall occupied by the Society of Grace Church, Medford, on Sunday evening last. The service was read by the Rector, assisted by the Rev. Mr. Purdy. The Bishop preached to a crowded audience. Eight persons came forward to receive the imposition of hands. The occasion, in every respect, was an interesting one, and we trust will prove highly profitable, in cheering the hearts and strengthening the hands of the band of devout Churchmen, who are here laboring to build up the walls of our Zion.—Christian Witness.

New Hampshire.—INSTITUTION.—On Sunday last, being the 18th after Trinity, the Rt. Rev. Bishop Chase instituted the Rev. J. Kelly into the Rectorship of St. Michael's Church, Manchester, N. H. The Bishop preached a sermon appropriate to the occasion. In the afternoon, the Rector said prayers, and the Rev. Mr. Lambert preached from the words, 'Then said Jesus unto his disciples, if any man will come after me, let him deny himself, and take up his cross and follow me.' (Matt. xvi. 24.) In the evening, the Rev. Mr. Lambert said prayers, and the Bishop preached on the subject of 'the laying on of hands,' or confirmation. After the sermon, eleven persons were confirmed.

Throughout the services of the day, the church was filled with a large, attentive, and we trust, devout congregation: and we hope that the words that day fitly spoken, may bring forth fruit unto life eternal.

The Rev. Mr. Kelly entered upon the duties of Rector of this parish early in June; his institution being deferred until the time of the Bishop's annual visitation.

Virginia.—EPISCOPAL SERVICES.—ORDINATION.—The Rev. Francis M. Whittle was admitted to Priest's orders in St John's Church, Charleston, Va., on Sunday morning, October 8th, by the Rt. Rev. Bishop Meade. The candidate was presented by the Rev. F. B. Nash, who together with the Rev. E. T. Perkins united in the imposition of hands.

CONFIRMATION.—After the above services in St. John's Church six persons were confirmed.

We are happy to learn that the health of our Diocesan appeared on this occasion to be better than heretofore, and that he was enabled to deliver his address customary on such occasions with much impressiveness.—We trust that he will continue to be favored with such a degree of health as will ensure to the Diocese and the Church a long continuance of his valued and important services.

CLERICAL CHANGES.—The Rev. Cranmore Wallace, Secretary of the Convention of South Carolina, has resigned the Parish of St. John's Berkeley, in order to take charge of St. Stephen's Chapel, Charleston, South Carolina, and wishes letters, pamphlets, and Diocesan Journals to be directed accordingly.

Rev. Dwight E. Lyman, has removed from the Diocese of Maryland, to that of Pennsylvania, and entered upon his duties as Missionary at Columbia and Marietta. Post Office, address, Columbia, Lancaster Co.

Rev. Edward Magee, having accepted a call to the parish of St. Mary's, Delphi, Indiana, requests that all communications addressed to him, be directed to said place.

The Rev. Charles H. Halsey, Secretary and General Agent of Domestic Missions, has accepted an invitation to the Rectorship of Christ Church, in the city of New York; and expects to enter upon his duties on the first Sunday of November next.

The Rev. George W. Nichols having accepted a call to the charge of the parish of Trinity Church, Northfield, Conn., desires all papers and letters to be addressed to him at Northfield, Litchfield county, Conn.—Calendar.

The Rev. Samuel C.  EDWARD C. JONES.

FROM REV. H. E. MONTGOMERY,
 Rector of All Saints' Church.

I perceive by your advertisement that you have opened a Female Seminary at Mantua. From a knowledge of you personally for several years, I cheerfully subscribe my testimony to your ability and excellence as an instructor of the young. Since we were at the University together, where you took a distinguished stand, I have received many evidences that you were peculiarly fitted for the career on which you entered so early, and to which I am glad, all things considered, that you have returned, and believe that you will fully justify the confidence that parents may repose in you by entrusting to you the education of their children.

FROM REV. DR. CLAY,
 Rector of Gloria Dei Church.

I cordially concur in the sentiments expressed above in relation to the school you have opened in the village of Mantua. I believe you to be peculiarly fitted for the education of youth, and feel assured that parents who entrust their daughters to your care, will have them well and efficiently instructed.

Male Teacher Wanted.

A young man, who has been accustomed to the instruction of boys, and who would be willing to take charge of a class of a limited number, is wanted in New Castle, Delaware.

He must be a thorough English scholar, and capable of teaching the Mathematics and Classics, if required. The compensation, at first, may be moderate; but there is every prospect of such an increase, as will speedily justify a salary fully adequate to his support.

Address the Rector of Immanuel Church, New Castle, who, upon application, will furnish further particulars. Oct. 14

St. Matthew's Hall,

Port Colder, Warren County, New Jersey.

This Institution is beautifully located in the mountainous district of New Jersey, and the experience of four years has proved the situation to be remarkably healthy. The buildings, which have recently been improved, are large, convenient, and airy. Boys are received from five and six years old and upwards. The merits of this school are now well known, and speak for themselves. The Rector regards his pupils as his children, and gives his special attention to the formation of their correct moral and physical, as well as mental habits. Parents and guardians sending their sons and wards to the Hall, may rely on the faithfulness of the Rector and his assistants, in the discharge of their duties towards all committed to their care.

The terms, for Tuition, Board, Washing, &c., are $150 per year, or $75 per session of five months, payable always in advance. Books, French, German, Spanish, Music, Drawing and Painting, extra, at moderate charges.

The Winter Session opens on the first of November. For the admission of pupils, or further information, apply to the Rector, Oct. 12

The Cross of Constantine.

BY LADY FLORA HASTINGS.

selected by S. A. Merrick copied from 7th

Cath: Herald

with remarks

"Conquer in this!"—Not unto thee alone
The vision spake, imperial Constantine!
Nor, presage only of an earthly throne,
Blazed in mid-heaven the consecrated sign.
Through the unmeasured tract of coming time
The mystic Cross doth with soft lustre glow,
And speaks through every age, in every clime,
To every slave of sin and child of woe.

"Conquer in this!"—Ay, when the rebel heart
Clings to the idols it was wont to cherish,
And, as it sees those fleeting boons depart,
Grieveth that things so bright were form'd to perish.
Arise, hereafter one! and, athwart the gloom,
Read in the brightness of that cheering ray—
"Mourn not, O Christian! though so brief their bloom, Nought that is worth a sigh shall pass away."

"Conquer in this!"—When fairest visions come
To lure thy spirit to a path of flowers;
Binding the exile from a heavenly home,
To dwell a lingerer in unholy bowers:
Strong in his strength who burst the bonds of sin,
Clasp to thy bosom, clasp the holy Cross!
Dost thou not seek a heavenly crown to win?
Hast thou not counted all beside as loss?

"Conquer in this!"—Though powers of earth and hell
Were leagued to bar thee from thy homeward way,
The Cross shall every darkling shade dispel,
Chase every doubt, and re-assure dismay.
Faint not, O wearied one! faint not: for thee
The Lord of righteousness and glory bled,
And His good Spirit's influence, with free
And plenteous unction, is upon thee shed.

"Conquer in this!"—When, by thy fever'd bed
Thou see'st the dark-winged angel take his stand,
Who soon shall lay thy body with the dead,
And bear thy spirit to the spirit's land;
Fear not! the Cross sustains thee, and its aid
In that last trial shall thy succour bring;
Go fearless through the dark, the untried shade,
For sin is vanquish'd, and death hath no sting.

"Conquer in this!"—Strong in thy Saviour's might,
When bursts the morning of a brighter day,
Rise, Christian victor, in the glorious fight,
Arise, rejoicing, from thy cell of clay!
The Cross, which led thee scathless through the gloom, Shall, in that hour, heaven's royal Banner be;
Thou hast o'ercome the world, the flesh, the tomb;
Triumph in Him who died and rose.

* "Make then this sign when thou eatest and drinkest, sittest or liest down, risest up, speakest, walkest; in a word, on every occasion; for He who was crucified here, is above in the heavens.—S. Cyril Catech. iv. 13.

† "Let us not be ashamed of the Cross of Christ: though another hide it, yet do thou openly seal it on thy brow, that the devils seeing that princely sign, may flee away trembling."—S. Cyril Catech. iv.

In connection with the above, sent by a correspondent, &c. give the following historical extracts in relation to this wonderful vision.—Ed. BANNER.

"A preternatural vision, which transcends all description, appeared to him, as he was marching at the head of his troops; he saw about that part of the day, when the sun, after passing the meridian, begins to decline in the west, a pillar of light in the heavens, in the form of a Cross, on which were inscribed these words ΕΥ ΤΟΥΤΩ ΝΙΚΑ, BY THIS CONQUER." Socrates Eccl. Hist. bk. 1, c. 2. "About midday, when the sun was beginning to decline, he saw with his own eyes the trophy* of a Cross of light in the heavens, above the sun, and bearing the inscription ΕΥ ΤΟΥΤΩ ΝΙΚΑ, CONQUER BY THIS." At this sight he himself was struck with amazement, and his whole army also, which happened to be following him on some expedition, and witnessed the miracle."—Eusebius' Life of Const. bk. 1, c. 28.

"About the middle of the day, he and the soldiers who were with him saw in heaven the trophy* of the Cross composed of light, and encircled by the following words, ΕΥ ΤΟΥΤΩ ΝΙΚΑ, BY THIS GO FORTH TO VICTORY.

He saw in a vision the Sign of the Cross shining in heaven. He was amazed at the spectacle, but some holy angels, who were standing by exclaimed OH! CONSTANTINE, ΕΥ ΤΟΥΤΩ ΝΙΚΑ, BY THIS GO FORTH TO CONQUER."—Sozomen Ecc. Hist. bk. 1, c. 3.

* "The salutary trophy of Jesus, the Cross."—S. Augustin.

ST. JUDE'S CHURCH.

The above is a representation of St. Jude's Church, now in process of erection on Franklin street, Spring Garden, 100 feet north of Brown street, between Seventh and Eighth streets. It is built in the early English Gothic style, without galleries, with high pointed roof, and will contain 850 persons. Its form is that of a Latin Cross, 42 feet front on the street, extending of that width to the transepts which are 40 feet deep, where it widens to 80 feet. The head of the cross beyond the space occupied by the chancel will form a Sunday school building, to be completed whenever sufficient funds can be raised. The whole length of the church will then be 112 feet 9 inches from east to west. The entrances will be through the tower which is 12 feet square and surmounted by a spire as in the cut, another through the corresponding porch on the north side, and one in each of the transepts. The church is slightly elevated from the street and without basement. The roof inside to be exposed with stained timbers. For the present the transepts will be used as Sunday school rooms, separated by a screen.

This enterprize commends itself as an attempt to put the price of pews within the reach of that large class of our population who have hitherto been almost excluded by high rates. Whilst this church will cost eight to ten thousand dollars, there is scarcely an other Episcopal church in the city which seats 700 persons on the ground floor, on which, perhaps, three times that sum has not been expended. The object is to finish it free from debt, so as to offer seats to the inhabitants of that growing district at an annual expense within the reach of all. This is a work well worth attempting. The field is a most important one. The district north of the city grows at a most surprising rate, and every year house is added to house and street to street, filled with continually increasing crowds from the country and from foreign lands, who give a character to our city for good or for evil, as they are furnished with that religious instruction which alone can make them peaceable, instead of riotous and disorderly citizens.

One half of the population of Philadelphia lies north of Vine street, and there, among 100,000 people, the Episcopal church at present, only affords church room for some 2500; while in the neighbourhood we occupy, there are few places of worship of any description. What more need be said to the Episcopalian, the Christian, the Philanthropist, or the Philadelphian?

Selections.

As we are desirous that each member of the family circle to which the Banner is admitted, should find matter to interest and instruct, we shall, from time to time, select articles especially suited to young readers.

The following simple narrative, for which we are indebted to the Church, impresses in a pleasing manner an important truth for children to learn. How often are they afraid to be "out in the dark?" This would not be if they learned to feel that they were under the sure protection of that Gracious Father of whom it is said, "yea the darkness hideth not from Thee, but the night shineth as the day: the darkness and the light are both alike to Thee."

Out in the Dark.

Three little girls were standing one summer evening at the gate of the court before the school.

The least of them was leaning against a gate post, with her pinafore held to her eyes; and she was saying something that nobody could well understand, because she was sobbing and crying.

One of the bigger boys was standing there too.—He was rattling the gate with a stick that he had in his hand, and say-

"Well, Kitty, I can't help it, you know; I must go to the farm."

The other two little girls came close to Kitty.—Charlotte pulled the pinafore from her eyes, and Susan took hold of her hand, and said,

"Why are you crying, Kitty?"

Kitty answered with sobs,

"Because I always go home with Tom, for he lives close by us; and now he says, he is going to-night to his uncle's, and I must go alone; and I can't. I am afraid; I never go home alone."

And then she began to cry bitterly.

"Oh, don't be a baby," said Tom. "You know the way well enough. It is a month and more since you have been living there. Only go down the lane, and across the wheat-field, and through the copse—no, the common first,—and there's only the lane up to your father's rick-yard. Come set off and run; you'll be there in no time."

"But I can't run, it is so hot. I shall not get home before dark. Oh dear, what shall I do?"

And then she began to cry again. But Tom had taken up his hat and his dinner bag, and was out of sight in a moment.

Susan and Charlotte wondered what Kitty should do to get home. She was not used to be left to herself. Her father was a farmer, and she had been rather tenderly brought up; and she was timid, and shy, and very soon frightened.

Susan said,

"The school-room is locked up, and mistress is gone; but I dare say she will keep you to-night, if you are afraid to go home."

Kitty could not bear to think of sleeping all night in a strange room; so this only made her cry the more.

Then Susan said,

"Charlotte, shall we go home with her?"

Charlotte said,

"Mother will want us, and wonder where we are; it is too far to go round to ask leave. Kitty, shall we take you home, and find room for you in our bed?"

But poor Kitty still cried, and said,

"I want my mother—I want to go home to mother!" Kitty was a very little girl, not five years old; and, as you have heard, she was a stranger to the village, and to every thing about it. So the two little girls, who were rather older, were very sorry for her, and Susan said,

"Do you think father would be angry? Do you think mother would be frightened, if we were not home till late? Look, the sun is nearly set! How red those black clouds around it look! I mean the edges of them."

"Why, you know, we ran down the village to grandmother's, a little while ago, with a message; and when we said we did not like the dark, father laughed; and asked if we were afraid anything would eat us up. So I don't think they would be angry."

"Then, Kitty, shall we take you home?"

Kitty wiped her cheeks, and smiled, and said,

"Yes; I am not afraid to go with you. Let us go now."

And she took hold of Susan's hand, and pulled her along.

So they set off very merrily—Kitty between Susan and Charlotte, jumping as she went; quite as gay as if she had not been crying, the moment before, as though her heart would break.

She chatted to them all the way down the village: and when they got into the sandy lane, she had forgotten her hurry about getting home so much, that she wanted them to stop and gather the tall foxgloves that grew high up on the steep bank.

But Charlotte said,

"You forget we have no time to play, Kitty. We are come all this way on purpose to please you. You must come along."

And she twitched the fern out of Kitty's hand rather sharply, as she was trying to break it off.

Susan said,

"It's very hot for all the sun is gone down. There is not a breath of air. I should not wonder if it was to pour with rain presently—those clouds are so black and dark."

"Every body will be glad of rain because the ground is so dry. Father wants it very much. Mistress said she thought there would be a thunder-storm to-night."

They walked on pretty quick through the fields, over the common, with their bonnets in their hands for coolness. They fanned their faces with their bonnets, for there was not a breath of air even on the open common; and it was very close and hot in the copse.

When they got to the end of the rick-lane, Susan started, and listened, for there was a sound very far off.

Kitty said it was father's wagon; but Susan said it was thunder.

"We must make haste home now Kitty; you see the yard gate. We need not go any farther with you."

Now Kitty was afraid, not for herself, but for her friends; she said,

"You will be in the dark; you will be out in the storm; you will lose your way, and get down to the river. Come home with me; mother will give you some supper. You shall have my bed. Oh, do come!"

They said they must go home; they could not stay any longer. They looked at the farm house, though, and the light shining through the windows so nice and comfortable. They wished they could be at home too. Beyond the yard they saw two or three cottages, in one of which Tom lived. They wished Tom had been going home, and that he could have taken care of Kitty. But they were not sorry they had come with the poor girl either. They kissed her, and wished her good-bye, and then they heard another long distant sound of thunder; so they turned round quick, and ran down the lane, and through the copse, and on to the common.

The sky was all covered with clouds, like a curtain drawn over it; and every now and then, as they looked up at the clouds, a great big drop of rain fell on their faces. Presently they heard the thunder louder; and soon after, Charlotte started, for there was a flash of lightning, and the thunder again; and the rain came on faster and faster. They quickened their steps.

Susan said,

"People will be glad of the rain."

And Charlotte answered,

"But I wish it had not come just now. See how fast it comes down. We shall be wet through. What puddles there are on the ground already! Oh, how light that was! The lightning—do you see it? And the thunder! it is rolling over our heads."

"I wish there was any house near. Let us run back to the farm."

"Oh, but mother will be frightened. We cannot go on. We shall change our wet clothes when we get home, just as father does when he has been out in the rain. How comfortable we shall be then!"

But Charlotte's heart was beginning to fail her; for the lightning was bright, and every now and then the thunder seemed to roll over their heads; and talking of home made it worse. She began to say with a faltering voice, "Oh, if we were but there!"

"Don't cry, Charlotte; don't be frightened. It won't be so very dark when the storm is over. Don't cry."

Charlotte could not stop crying, however. Susan recollected there was a cow-shed somewhere in the fields near. In the summer, her mother had been making hay in those fields; and Susan and Charlotte had been very happy at play in that shed, and had sat there with the haymakers when they had their dinner. She said,

"Let us look for the cow-shed. I can see it only two fields off."

"I never can get over the hedge; and then that ditch—I dare say it is full of water now."

"Never mind; I'll help you up. Take hold of my hand."

So they ran across the fields, holding down their heads because of the lightning and the rain which streamed from their bonnets and blinded their eyes. They got through the first field, and into the next by a gate; and in the next to that they saw the cow-shed; but between them there was a hedge, with a high bank and a deep ditch.

As they came up to it, there was a flash of lightning, and the thunder very loud, and the rain came down as if it was poured out of a watering-pot.

The two little girls crouched down on the ground. Charlotte cried, and Susan was very near it. But she jumped up and said,

"Make haste, Charlotte; I'll help you." So she scrambled up the steep slippery bank, where there was a gap in the hedge and pulled Charlotte after her. Then she tried to get carefully down on the other side; and when she was at the bottom, she helped Charlotte down. Charlotte ran after, crying, and not able to speak, for she had left her shoe in the sticky clay bank.

But Susan said,

"We must stop now; and they ran on to the shed, and crept into one corner of it, out of breath, and hardly able to stand.

The cow shed had mud walls all round it; only the doorway and the place for the window were open. So they saw the rain and lightning, but were sheltered from the rain.

At first they were heartily glad to have got there; but they had nothing to do but to think of their fears, and they got more uncomfortable. They fancied the thunder louder as they listened to it; and the violent rain seemed to make the dry ground smoke.

Charlotte thought every thing was on fire; and as they crouched down in the corner of the shed, she hid her face on Susan's knees, who sat with her pinafore over her face; and she cried. Presently Susan said,

"Charlotte!" and she raised her head in a moment.

"Don't you know what we ought to do when we are in danger? I had forgotten it till now."

"We should say our prayers, I know. We should pray to God. But I can't think of anything to say."

"Let us say the Lord's Prayer; that must be best, you know. Let us say it, and think of what it means, and then God will keep us safe from the storm."

Charlotte said, sorrowfully,

"I know God will keep good people safe; but I have not always been good. I have not minded mother. I have not been good at church."

"Nor I; I know we have not. But, you know, we are to say our prayers for all that."

So they knelt down, and said the Lord's Prayer together; and as they said it, all the things they had been taught about it came into their heads: how they had been taught, it was the best prayer of all, and that we should say it as often as we could, because there is something in it to suit every body, and all things that can happen to us: so it was a comfort to them to say, "Our Father," because they recollected God could do more for His children than their father on earth could do. They would have been glad, indeed, to see him coming to look for them; but they knew their Father in heaven was near them. And when they said, "Forgive us our trespasses," they prayed in their hearts that their carelessness and disobedience to their mother, and all their faults might be forgiven. And they recollected that God would forgive them, if they were heartily sorry, and tried to do so no more. They prayed that He would deliver them from this evil that had now come upon them; and they thought that, when they were tempted to do wrong, they should always recollect this time. So they both felt more quiet, and less frightened; and they sat close together, shivering a little with the wet, for they were wet through; but thinking of these things, and as they thought of them, they felt less frightened.

After a time, the rain did not come down so heavily on the roof of the shed, though the drops still splashed from the eaves; and the thunder was going off beyond them, though it was still loud. And when they looked out, quite in the west, where the fierce clouds had gathered round the setting sun, there was a clear light streak in the sky. That streak looked light, though it was now quite night, because the rest of the sky was dark.

Though the rain was very little now, they could not see farther than the hedge. Susan said,

"There is no moon now; but if the sky clears, the stars will shine. The rain is nothing to signify. Let us set off towards home. The thunder might come on again."

"O, yes, let us go before it comes again," said Charlotte, leaping up. And that is the way out of the field; through that little gap into the lane. Don't you remember the hay-wagon went that way? Make haste."

"But we will go to the high bank, and find your shoe."

"Oh, don't mind my shoe. I'll go home without."

"But your new shoe; mother can't easily buy another pair. Sit down here, and I'll go and look for it."

Charlotte was ashamed to let her sister go by herself, and rather afraid, too, to be left alone. So they both set off together, splashing through the wet field; for every thing was as wet now as it had been dry before.

They did find the shoe, more by feeling than by looking for it; and then they got into the lane, and felt their way along it; for the hedges were high, and the lane very narrow: it was only used to go to those fields. The darkness was their only difficulty now; for the thunder was very far off indeed, and they saw no lightning. The rain had stopped. Susan said,

"Charlotte, we ought to be very thankful to God for having kept us safe through the storm, should not we? Let us try to say some of the psalms we have learnt, and that will make the time pass away pleasantly."

So they said them as they walked along the middle of the lane; and then they talked cheerfully and said how nice it would be to get dry and warm at home, and hoped mother had not been frightened.

But presently Charlotte stopped short, and started; she squeezed Susan's arm, and said,

"What's that?"

"Where?" said Susan; and her teeth chattered, she did not know why.

The sky had got more clear; there was a little light from the stars, but not enough to see anything clearly. A little before them, on one side of the road, they saw something quite white. Now and then it moved a little.

"Hush," said Charlotte; "stop a moment."

They stopped and looked. Neither liked to go on. Presently there seemed to come from the white thing a low hollow sound.

"Oh, I can't go by—it's something terrible—worse than the thunder!" said Charlotte, "I had rather stay all night in the shed."

"What can it be?" said Susan, nearly as much frightened.

"What shall we do?"

They stood helpless in the lane. At last Susan said, "God will keep us from any bad thing that might hurt us in the dark. If we believe, He will take care of us; we ought to try to go by it bodily. Come, Charlotte; come on, without thinking; and we will say our lessons—the hymn; and try if we can say part of the collect for next Sunday. Then we shall not think of it."

They walked on; and when they saw the white thing, they stopped saying their lessons, and their knees shook; but they went on. It was lighter now; and as they came nearer, they both cried out at once,

"It's the white cow! Kitty's father's cow. She told us, you know, they had one quite white. It has strayed into the lane."

And they both looked at it as if it was a friend. Then they went on, and soon got into the sandy lane; but they could not see the foxgloves and fern now.

The sandy lane was very dark, because the banks were so high. They felt the bank with their right hands as they went along; and they began to laugh when the briars caught hold of them. Presently they came to a more open part, when Charlotte stopped, and pulled her sister back.

"What's that, Susan?"

"The moon, I think; no, a star."

"It's moving about."

"It is one of those stars that seemed to shoot from the sky. I saw them last year after a thunder-storm, as I lay in bed."

"Oh, no; it is coming towards us. It is something very dreadful that goes about at night. How large it gets! If it was to lead us out of the way, into the river!"

Susan shook a little, but said,

"It can't, if we stand quite still till it is gone by. I hear somebody hallooing. Oh, Charlotte, it's a lantern! Somebody with a lantern! I thought every body must be in bed."

"They are coming to look for us, perhaps. Oh, I am sure that's father calling. Come on."

And they both ran towards the light—the faster when they heard their father's voice, and their brother Sam's too. They were quite out of breath when they got up to them, and could not speak; when Sam cried out,

"Well, here you are, safe and sound, at last."

And their father said,

"Why, girls, you have made a fine business of it! Your mother is almost scared out of her wits."

As soon as they had recovered their breath, they were both near crying, partly for joy, and partly for fear of being scolded. But they told their father how it had all been; and he took their hands to lead them along, and said there was no harm done. "But we must get you home to dry you."

And then he took Susan up to carry her; for she was so tired, she could not stand: and Sam who was a great boy, carried Charlotte. So they were soon at home.

Cannot you fancy how glad they were to see the bright light of the fire shining through the windows, and most of all, when their mother opened the door? They ran to her, and kissed her; and she seemed too glad to speak while their history was told to her.

She did not blame them for taking care of little Kitty. She took off their wet clothes, and wrapped their winter-cloaks round them; and they were comfortable and happy sitting in the chimney-corner, with some warm tea to drink; and they laughed merrily when their brother told them they looked like two little old women.

They were surprised to find any body up: for it seemed to them they must have been out all night, so much happened to them. They were glad to go to bed; for their walk and the warm fire made them sleepy. But they did not forget to kneel down, and say their prayers; and they felt very thankful that they had been kept from harm, and brought back safe to their kind friends.

The next morning, when they awoke, the sun was shining bright, and the drops glittering on all the trees, looking nice and fresh. And when they looked out they saw everything in the garden, that had been parched up, quite alive, and the flowers, that had been drooping, holding up their heads again.

Then they thought that the thunder-storm had done good, and that they should enjoy the fine clear weather the more for their troubles the night before.

They had done their breakfast before Kitty's mother came to the door with her little girl. She said she could not be easy without hearing how the girls got home. She had nobody at home that evening to send after them; and little Kitty had woken in the night and cried, because Susan and Charlotte were out in the dark.

Kitty ran to them and kissed them; and they began telling their history, and how they got safe home, till it was time for all three to go to school.

Soon after they took a nice walk to Kitty's home. It was on a holyday; and they drank tea there, and played in the garden, and saw the ducks and chickens, and the calf, and gathered nuts in the copse. And their mother came in good time to fetch them home; so that the walk this time was a pleasant one, and only seemed too short.

Pride is a dainty occupant of our bosom, and yet ever feeds on the meanness and infirmity of our kind.

Balaam.

MR. EDITOR,

In the narrative of this person, there is the interest awakened by the several occurrences; which, lying on the surface, is obvious to every reader. There is also the further and deeper interest of an example, painfully conspicuous, from the periods and countries in which true religion, professed and inculcated by the patriarchs, was waning into error and defection that soon became the unmitigated darkness of idolatry. From the former view of the story, much improvement may be gathered. But the latter affords broader edification for a pious intellect; and it is the key for the exposition of many particulars of the case recorded.

Balaam was one of those who "retained God in their knowledge," and in part served Him, while yet the heart and more willing allegiance were with the changes which had long been coming over the pure faith and worship. He is called a prophet, because of the predictions he delivered in the close of the affair which made him notorious in the sacred history. But he did not belong to the class of inspired men who ordinarily have that appellation,—any more than Caiaphas, another bad man to whom was imparted for the moment the gift of foretelling events and announcing heavenly truths. The occupation of Balaam appears to have been that of a "soothsayer" or magician; the former title is given him several times, and it is in that character that he is sent for by the king of Moab: "I wot that he whom thou bledest is blessed, and he whom thou cursest is cursed:" the language implying that in this vocation he was eminent, in high repute for predicting good or evil fortune which came to pass. The calling could not be followed without a compromise of sound religious principle, which Balaam had already made. And the success infested nothing miraculous: for fortune-tellers of celebrity are persons of superior information and sagacity, looking deeper than others into affairs, whether about them or acting at a distance, and penetrating more thoroughly their causes and probable results; besides that their professional or even social influence brings them not a little direct power over the coming destiny of those whom they "bless or curse." With sagacity and influence thus potent, Balaam no doubt was often borne out by the event in prognosticating the worldly prosperity or failure of his clients: and his mistakes were concealed or glossed over. Ceremonies he of course employed, in deference to the superstitions of his false creed, and they may have been perverted ceremonies of the true faith; and to these various "enchancements" the people ascribed his astonishing faculty—a delusion which he naturally encouraged, as he was a bad man. But whether himself gave the "enchancements" any portion of the credit, or assumed it all to his intellectual cunning, would depend on his freedom from this shallow imbecility, or succumbing to it; for mightier minds have thus disgraced themselves.

The king of Moab had heard of the great "soothsayer," and sent for him to "curse" the Israelites; a common practice among idolaters towards their enemies, when beginning a war. That people had attracted much notice from their sojourn of forty years in the wilderness, and had now begun their triumphs; and the Moabites, with whom they came in contact in their way to the promised land, feared that themselves also would be sufferers. Under this apprehension, messengers were sent to invite Balaam for his unhallowed function; and they arrived with the "rewards of divination in their hands," the ample fee or remuneration for the renowned "soothsayer." But the magnificent part Balaam was now to act was probably new, and unquestionably dangerous. To be a fortune-teller to individuals was safe, though he should guess wrong, as his popularity would secure him from private revenge. But to predict the fate of a nation or large tribe, when a battle was pending, would certainly hazard his life; no amount of reputation would insure him from the hot rage of a defeated king and his army. He declined therefore setting forward immediately with the messengers, after they had opened their mission in form, but detained them a night, i. e. beyond the time for rest and conference. His plea was, that he might answer as God should direct him,—a plea that may have been the dictate of piety, such piety as loves two masters or two causes; but both his equivocal and unequivocal character allow us to ascribe it to the policy of gaining time. He dared not risk a mistake. Nor could he brave without terror the anger of the Holy One of Israel, in whom he had not ceased to believe.

In the night of delay, God appeared to him, and forbade his going, assured him that the Israelites were "blessed" and so beyond the power of his malediction. With these tidings he dismissed the messengers. Whether he had before been honoured with a revelation from the Deity, is not mentioned: his frequent "divinations" or "enchancements" infer nothing of the kind; and the supposition is worth little without proof:—or rather, we may justly superinduce the contrary from the language of his concluding prophecy, "he hath said, who heard the words of God, and knew the knowledge of the Most High, and saw the vision of the Almighty, falling into a trance, but having his eyes open;" it seems like exultation in a privilege, long coveted perhaps, but never before enjoyed. Vastly more important is it, however, to remark the explicitness of the Almighty, "thou shalt not curse the people, for they are blessed." It was the divine decree, established and unchangeable. And the declaration would have sufficed for any sincere worshipper of Jehovah, not drawn towards false religion or substitutes for religion. It ought to have been enough for the enemies of Israel; more than enough for Balaam, whose country was too remote for inimical fear or policy.

I sufficed however for neither him nor Moab; they both imagined that they could change the determination of the Supreme Arbiter. Another embassy is sent to Balaam, "princes" or chiefs, more numerous and more honourable than the former, and bearing the king's promise to promote him to "very great honour." The reply of the "soothsayer" is,— "if Balak would give me his house-full of silver and gold, I cannot go beyond the word of the Lord my God, to do less or more." Piety again, but of the kind that speaks of Heaven, yet looks in another direction. Policy rather, we may believe, putting the blame on Jehovah, should he fail, after all, in "cursing" the hated Church. Of his two religions, he hoped the false might eventually overcome the true, and bring him the coveted reward and promotion; but as he had faith enough to know that if God persisted, he and Moab and idolatry must yield, he made this broad proviso against his being ultimately powerless, earnest as would be his efforts to procure the execration. The holy record more than once declares that the Lord "would not hearken unto Balaam, but delivered the people out of his hands, and blessed them still." And this infatuation is what St. Peter calls the "madness" of the self-impostor: very "madness" it was, from first to last.

He again required the deputies to tarry a night; during which a divine communication is made, permitting him to go with them, "if they came to call him," but to pronounce no other sentence than that which God should reveal to him; a restriction that shows what the Omniscient saw in his heart. He did not wait for the messengers to call him, but rose early and prepared for his departure,—forfeiting thus the divine sufferance of his journey, and betraying the deep victory in his soul of wrong principles and motives over his halting inclination to do right. We need not argue as yet, that delusion was inflicted on him, judicially, by the Holy Spirit, as on some wicked prophets, though that explanation of the leave granted him is perfectly tenable: it is enough that his eagerness to circumvent his Maker hurried him into violating the condition with which the allowance was connected. The condition was very peculiar, that "princes" should come to awake him in the morning; but he slighted it, and was beforehand with them. Well might "God's anger be kindled because he went."

After setting out, his mind appears to have been absorbed, doubtless in his unhallowed enterprise; hence, the miracle of his animal's uttering articulate sounds was for a time lost upon him. He had struck it repeatedly to master its unruliness, and when it first spoke he only gave freer vent to his anger. The angel then became visible to him and declared his "way to be perverse before God," intending the motive of his journey, to curse Israel, in which he was obstinate. Before such a monitor he could not but acknowledge, "I have sinned,—his better religion predominating for a moment over his worse. Rage against the beast was a sin, yet natural, as it had bruised him, and altogether trivial compared with his indomitable malice against the Church of God.—The miracle needs no defence; to produce articulate speech in the mouth of a brute, was as nothing to Him who created it, and who is the author of all speech and of every sound. We may ask questions, indeed, but God is not bound to answer them,—whether reason accompanied the momentary speaking,—whether the structure of the organs was changed, to be instantly changed back again; all such curiosity is but folly; deny the occurrence, and make God's word a lie, if you will, or if you dare; but be not so stupid as to doubt whether He who formed the creatures out of nothing can make them do whatever is His will, either with means or without them.—It more becomes our humility, to acknowledge that He who made a brute speak would make Balaam also speak,—aye, and that not his own words, but the words which the Almighty would put in his mouth. Ought not the pertinacious "enchanter" to have perceived this degrading admonition?

"A double-minded man is unstable in all his ways,"—that is, when his two minds oscillate or are balanced; but if either predominate, it will so far make him persevering. Balaam's unsound belief had the ascendant, and kept him unmoved in his wicked purpose to the last; and it is not improbable that, as with Pharaoh, God at length hardened him after he had finally hardened himself,—not listening to his offer to turn back, after seeing the angel with his drawn sword. He went to the king of Moab. He prudently reminds him that he will not be responsible, but must utter what God commands. With him he proceeds to several high places, and directs what sacrifices should be made. This rite had been stolen by false religion from the true; and its perversion is now strangely complicated. The offering is made to Jehovah; but the "seven" altars instead of one only, indicate the profane purpose mingled with it, and bring the sacrifices to a level with "enchancements" and "divination;" and other ceremonies of that kind were probably observed: the obvious purpose was, to inveigle the "Most High." Twice, during the two first sacrifices, Balaam went alone to meet Him, and each time is forced to say, "how shall I curse whom God hath not cursed," "surely there is no enchantment against Jacob, neither is there any divination against Israel." But he ventures not a further contest with the Omnipotent. After the third oblation, without going on his solitary path, to complete alone the superstitious attempt to overmatch the Deity, he merely turns to the wilderness, where the Israelites were encamped, and proclaims under a heavenly impulse which he cannot control, and against the expostulation of the king, the to him bitter, yet sublime benediction, on the well ordered hosts whom God was conducting to triumph and prosperity,—with also the further prediction, of the advent of the Star and Sceptre of the Messiah. That irresistible afflatus being uttered, the disappointed Balak, and the renowned, the infatuated, the mortified "soothsayer," parted from each other,—the one, balked of his imaginary aid in witchcraft and a conjuror,—the other, shorn of his expectation of abounding wealth and lofty distinction. The supreme victory was that of the God of Jacob over idolatry, as developed in that age and the countries involved in the narrative. And at the right hand of the Divine Conqueror was Jacob himself, the Church of His love.

The "servant of two masters" received thus his terrible reward. But he was unhumiliated, and instead of loving afterwards the ONE only, he gave his whole heart to the other, and, like Satan, found a way to defeat, for a time, goodness and the Good. He well knew that the Israelites, though protected from arts claiming to be above nature, were not proof against natural corruption: and by employing the Moabite or Midianite women in efforts condemned by God and by unpurged society, yet sanctioned and made a religious duty among idolaters, Balaam succeeded in bringing a partial "curse" on his now hated foes. But his reprobate career was short; for, within a year, and along with five kings or principal chiefs of Midian, he was slain by the avenging sword of Israel. His name is consigned to execration in the inspired volume, even to the pages of the Apocalypse,—a sad premonition, we may fear, that it will not be "found in the book of life." Nor was the forsaken man, though in his first revelation he uttered the language, "let me die the death of the righteous," without a foresight now of his awful danger; for among his final exclamations are the terrible words, connected with his naming the Most High and the predicted Messiah, "I shall see Him, but not now; I shall behold Him, but not nigh." This will be in the dreadful day, when Job "in his flesh shall see God," when, "every eye shall behold Him whom they have pierced" by their iniquities. Then, when the righteous will "see God as He is, and be ever with the Lord," Balaam will "behold Him, but not nigh." A dark shadow, cast by the light within, on the curtain that hides futurity from our inspection!

In the foregoing narrative, we learn the blinding influence of a covetous or ambitious temper; the fate of Balaam is but an open view of that of thousands who love the honours and "the wages of unrighteousness;" nor was he more obstinate than they, under the superior light of both the knowledge and the internal shining of the gospel. We further see how completely stubborn a mind not surrendered to God may become, even to the utter contemning of His express and known will, whether revealed outwardly in His word, or inwardly in the conscience, which, when humble and docile, is a clear enough intimation from Him of what is right; so horribly perverse, that the "feet will run to evil," though a vision or an angel should warn them to stop. We perceive, moreover, that such a mind, when false religion, "divination," or some other semblance or distortion of piety, (and many such forgeries there are,) will not effect its object, will resort to palpable wickedness or demoniacal temptation. Balaam seems foremost among those who, in the day of judgment, will plead, "have we not prophesied in thy Name;" but "many" will share his rejection, their palliation being like his their greater fault, "have we not been zealous for thy church, for thy doctrine, for thy cause?" Alas, ardour on the surface is too welcome a commutation for the refining fire in the innermost alloy of the soul.

Portentous also is this warning of the Spirit against attenuating the true religion with false worship, or with what is the root of false worship, untrue or oblique doctrine. That Balaam, besides professing the One God, however incongruously, was an idolater in principle, in mind, in heart, in affection, is indubitable; but to what extent (beyond the "enchancements") he practised this rebellion, with images and other superstitious appliances, does not appear: and the earlier idolatry seems often to have been outwardly mild,—a dilution of piety, rather than a deluge sweeping it away,—a compromise adapted to the suppleness of intellect and of mental nerve that will neither stand firmly upright nor endeavour to do so. Such flexibility of the judgment and the feelings prevailed then, prevails now, will always prevail. Not one man in ten, or perhaps in an hundred, holds inflexibly the inflexible truth. The vast majority (and of that majority half-thinkers and half-doers are sure) are afraid of stern consistency, or grow weary of it,—they even welcome inconsistency,—relaxation, of thought and conduct faithful as the magnet to the pole,—as a relief. And hence the predominance, in whatever age, of untruth or untrue mixtures, is no wonder; while it is a perpetual miracle that the truth survives the generation to which it has been revealed by Heaven. The corruption of Christianity, by erroneous philosophy and erroneous worship, was and is a matter of course: its preservation is alone due to the special promise and a special providence. Idolatry is broadly mingled with it in the Oriental Church, and in the Church of Rome; the defection is glaring and obstinate. And there are other tendencies than the Romish to pagan border-land. The idolatry of "covetousness," or of other worldliness, fastens itself on the Christian when the cooling vapour of enthusiasm leaves him weakened and unprotected. And ceremony, and devout ornament kindred with ceremony, will become a nascent idolatry, with or without proclivity to the "seven hills," when, instead of aiding the bleoded nature of sense and spirit, they overtask it,—yet, with the force of a passion, make it love to infatuation its task-master. In every such case, there is a longing, a hankering, after a something which the pure faith will not supply; there is distorted principle craving distorted observances, to fill a vacuity in the unappeasably tortuous mind. All this,—cometh it not of evil? O let the character and the fate of Balaam warn us,—that the something yearned after involves deep spiritual peril, and at length goes hand in hand with the deadly spiritual sin of open rebellion against HIM who is "a jealous God!"

REV. CALVIN COLTON.—It gives us pleasure to be able to say that Mr. Colton's voice, the condition of which has for some years disqualified him for the public discharge of his ministerial functions, is recovered, apparently with the prospect of remaining so. For some months past he has been able to preach without difficulty, and without experiencing any injury.—Prot. Churchman.

RELIGION IN RUSSIA.—There are in Russia 2,770,000 Romanists; 2,400,000 Mehommedans; 1,200,000 Jews; and 1,750,000 Lutherans. The State religion is that of the Greek church, the number of whose clergy in Russia, is 35,944; and the number of Greek churches, 11,480.

WILL THE CHURCH SUSTAIN HER WESTERN MISSIONS?—

This is the real question before the Church, and its final decision cannot long be delayed. Let not the members of the Church deceive themselves, nor unwisely refuse to consider in time a disagreeable truth.

The questions are not merely, Shall this or that station, in some field white unto the harvest, be abandoned? Shall the Church's prayers and praises rise no longer from some hamlet or village in the western wilds? Shall the deep voice of her supplications, and the music of her solemn chants be heard no more upon the vast prairie, and wake no more the echoes of the mighty hills? Shall this or that missionary be left to starve upon the unfulfilled promises of the Church? These, though questions of moment, do not include the great and real question now at issue, which is in truth the one set forth at the head of this article. In other words, shall the whole domestic branch of the Board of Missions be broken up? This must be the result, and we say deliberately that it is far better it should be so, than that Body, which the Church has solemnly adopted as part of herself, should stand before the world as unable to fulfil its engagements and discharge its debts.

We know it to be a fact, that our Missionary Bishops have suffered great inconvenience for want of their stipulated salaries. And we know cases of missionaries, who having held to their post until they have been literally starved out, have at last been obliged to leave the place where they could do no good, because they had lost their credit, for the simple reason, that the Church had given them "nothing to pay."

These remarks have been occasioned by a stirring letter from the Rt. Rev. Dr. Kemper. Although this letter is written in the hurry and occupation of a western visitation, yet as the words of a Bishop, whose zeal and devotion have been shown by his works, and who speaks from actual knowledge and observation, must have greatest weight, we will quote a portion of this interesting letter. The justice of the views first expressed, will appear evident to all, and the few facts related speak more powerfully than any words.

"I observe that the Spirit of Missions proposes a collection on Advent Sunday for the Domestic Committee. May I beg you to urge it upon the attention of all the Clergy and the whole body of the faithful? In my opinion it is a subject of immense importance. I am so incessantly occupied that I cannot arrange my thoughts, but I will state as they occur and as I have time a few facts and opinions of which you can make use.

I think at the last meeting of the Board of Missions it was recommended to the Domestic Committee to pay the Missionaries hereafter at the end of every quarter. I wish the Church would urge this and insist upon this as a matter of vast concern. I have proposed to the Domestic Committee to do it hereafter from 1st January even if they have to borrow thousands of dollars. A debt incurred, by paying the Missionaries punctually, what has been solemnly pledged to them in the name of the Church, would rouse the feelings, and zeal and generosity of Churchmen if any thing can do it.

I do not think that the interest of Churchmen in the broad subject of Missions has lessened, but it has of late been nearly absorbed by diocesan and foreign Missions, while we in the west, in the midst of our labours—so important—so promising—are almost left to perish. This almost abandonment of the west has in a good measure arisen from ignorance, prejudice or calumny. The great body of the Missionaries are and have been sound divines and practical, pious and useful men. Of course, at times, some who were unworthy or could not succeed at the East have found their way to our new country; and the folly of a few has been visited upon all, while the vast majority, amidst unnumbered trials and privations, have persevered in laying a foundation which cannot be moved.

For two or three years past, the delay in making remittances to the Clergy has been most painful and injurious. The Rev. Mr. —, came to Wisconsin with a large family and a few hundred dollars. He purchased some land and paid for it in part, promising the other payments semi-annually as his Missionary salary was sent him. Month after month elapsed and no remittance arrived from New York. He must then either lose his land, which was becoming valuable, or borrow money to meet his payments at 12 per cent. His parish gave him but little, for they were building a Church, and he was too modest to complain. For a time he preached at three stations, one of which was fourteen miles off and the other eight from Jamesville, and to both of which he walked. He and his sister taught school, and he and his little boys at odd hours cultivated the land to some extent. By the strictest economy in his family (in which there has been much sickness) he has thus far saved his land—but it has been amidst anxiety and debt.

The Rev. Mr. — lately wrote me that he left the service of the Domestic Committee, because he could not receive his Missionary salary. I found Logansport in Indiana vacant, as it generally has been for years past. The Rev. Mr. — has been there for ten months without receiving one cent from the Domestic Committee. Having a family to support he readily embraced an opportunity to return to Ohio, where he would be relieved from his difficulties. And yet he was beloved by his parish, and they mourned his departure. One of our best and truest men, the Rev. Mr. — has a little parish at Michawaka. The members are warmly attached to him, but they are few in numbers and have a heavy debt on the Church hanging over them. Every thing around his little establishment was neat and respectable—while the garden and the chicken house have supplied him and his excellent wife (they have no children) with the greater part of their food—but the rent was to be paid quarterly, and he depended upon his Missionary salary and twelve months had elapsed the day I was with him—and for those twelve months he had not received one cent from New York. I said a few days since to the Rev. S. L. Johnson of Indianapolis that his Missionary salary would be reduced. He replied that he did not know how he could bear it—but added, on reflection, that he would give it up from this time provided all now due him was paid without delay. These are a few of the best cases, and do they not prove that the gifts of the Church, solemnly pledged, but delayed month after month to the mortification, anguish and distress of the Missionaries, produce as much evil as good? He who should set an example in all things and who is a representative of the Church—cannot pay his debts—violates his word—and suffers in every respect—because the Church forfeits her word to him!"

To this, the Bishop adds a word of encouragement. "Of our success and prosperity something can be said, of a most encouraging nature. Wisconsin, the youngest Diocese, exceeds in the number of her clergy and communicants twelve or fourteen other Dioceses. And Indiana with more than twenty Parishes, shows what can be done, with the blessing of God, in a country where thirteen years ago the Church was unknown."

The question then is, not whether the Church is to grow and extend in the West. It has been planted there, and neither the active hostility, nor the passive neglect of man may stop the work which is of God. The question is, whether the Church at large, and we especially in the East, are to have a share in this great and blessed work? If not, we must blot from our Prayer Book the 105th Hymn, that the concluding verse may no longer testify against us.

Saviour, we own this debt of love:
O shed Thy Spirit from above,
To move each Christian breast;
Till heralds shall Thy truth proclaim,
And temples rise to fix Thy name,
THROUGH ALL OUR DESERT WEST.

The following notice calls upon the Church to give an immediate answer to the question proposed in the beginning of this article.

Collection on Advent Sunday, for Domestic Missions.

To the Bishops, Clergy and Laity, of the Protestant Episcopal Church.

It will be remembered, that the Board of Missions, at its Triennial Meeting, recommended a collection to be made on Advent Sunday last, in aid of Domestic Missions.

This was generally adopted, greatly to the relief of the missionaries. In some portions of the country, however, the collection was not made, because the season appointed had past before the notice thereof could be given. As usual during the past summer, but little has been received into the Treasury, and the missionaries remain unpaid.

In view of the many advantages to be derived from a systematic plan of contribution throughout the Churches, and especially of the great importance to the missionaries, that they should receive their arrears before the setting in of winter, the Domestic Committee respectfully request your attention to the subject; and ask that on Advent Sunday, the third of December next, or on some other day near that time, a collection or contribution may be made for this object, and as soon thereafter as practicable be remitted to the Treasurer of Domestic Missions.

In behalf of the Committee,
CHAS. H. HALSEY,
Sec. and Gen. Agent.

CLARK MISSION, DIOCESE OF MISSOURI.—We have already made our readers acquainted with this new and most interesting Missionary Institution. The following letter addressed to the Bishop of Missouri has been kindly sent us in the hope that "it may prove interesting to the friends of the Mission in the East."

The Bishop informs us that the school-house and dormitory (spoken of by Mr. Corbyn) are to be finished early in the next year. The cost will be $1250. Of this sum $600 are to be paid when the walls are up and the roof on, the remainder on the 1st of April next. The Bishop adds, "for the first payment I am ready, and for the second I must make ready." We sincerely hope that the perusal of the Rector's letter will induce some of our readers to help on this needful preparation.

CLARK MISSION, Marion County, Mo.
October 17th, 1848.

MY DEAR BISHOP:—

We were all very sorry that you could not be with us on the festival of St. Michael and All Angels. It was a day of so much expectation to us that we had in our simpleness supposed all others filled with the same anxiety. Indeed we are well assured that nothing but an urgent necessity kept you away. We began the day with the Holy Communion which was celebrated in the little Church in the village, at 6 o'clock in the morning. The day proved unpleasant and as the time fixed for the ceremony of laying the corner stone, drew on, it rained considerably. Towards evening, however, the rain ceased awhile and permitted us to proceed with our solemn service.

Owing to the rain there were but few present from town. To those few the Rector made an address of some fifteen minutes, upon the nature of our present undertaking and the manner how, and the means by which we would prosecute that undertaking.

The service commenced with the chanting of the 127th Psalm in the Psalter, "Nisi Dominus." Then followed the exhortation with appropriate prayers, a selection of Psalms and a lesson, then the laying of the stone, and the address, the chanting of the Te Deum, the concluding prayer for the congregation and for the whole Catholic Church, and the benediction.

Some drops of rain had fallen upon us before the conclusion of the service, but as Te Deum, arose in solemn chorus a most beautiful arch spanned the entire Eastern heavens. Was it not the bow of promise? As such our hearts hailed it, and so we are fain to believe that the blessed angels were commissioned to assist in our work. And now that the walls are rising over that foundation stone, we feel that we have indeed set our hands to a mighty work. For what is it that we are thus essaying to do? Either our doings are a most impious trifling, or they are such as the blessed Father himself will approve and bless. For it was with solemn calling upon GOD and in the Name of the ever blessed TRINITY, that we laid that corner stone, chanting the while, "Except the Lord build the house their labor is but lost that build it." Our profession was that we were founding an institution whose aim was the glory of GOD. An institution which should, in subordination to His holy Church, lend its aid in training up her sons in the nurture and admonition of the Lord. An institution from which, we would fain hope, shall go forth in future years many a holy priest and deacon to labor in the lonely wilderness in the midst of which it has been founded.

The building which we have thus begun is to be fifty feet by twenty, and is designed for the grammar school. Our hope is that by the time our boys are ready for the college course, the means may be obtained for the erection of the necessary buildings.

In the meantime our wants are, first the chapel. Next a building adjoining the one now going up, which shall serve for a refectory—class rooms, and additional chambers for boys.

This would enable us to increase our numbers to fifty boys. Five thousand dollars would build the chapel and the other building besides.

We have now thirteen boys in the family—about the same number of day scholars.

Our manner of dealing with these you already know. I very much wish we had two or even four candidates for Holy Orders, who could, while pursuing their own studies in Divinity, assist in the labors of the school. We could take care of two very well. We can afford also an excellent opportunity to others who might choose to prepare themselves at their own cost to labor in the West. For seventy-five dollars a year, we could board them and give them an opportunity for study which is rare in the West. The library contains above 1700 volumes—many of them most rare and valuable, especially to students in divinity. Among them are fine copies of nearly all the Greek and Latin fathers. There are also splendid editions of many of the English Catholic Divines. The Rev. Mr. Comings has just completed the arrangement and the catalogue of the books, and we are beginning to see what we have, and to understand their great value.

The new building is going on rapidly, and we expect to see the walls up and the roof on before the winter comes.

The boys are all well—in fact I am daily more and more convinced that we have chosen the most healthy situation in Missouri.

Hoping that you will visit us soon,

I remain Rt. Rev. Father,

Your faithful and obedient son, in the Holy Church,
WM. B. CORBYN.

For the Banner of the Cross.

MR. EDITOR:—

The last number of "The Churchman" contains the following communication from the Agent of the "General Protestant Episcopal Sunday School Union."

I should be glad to see it in your "valuable" journal if agreeable to you to give it a place there. It may stimulate others to the same "labour of love" and good works, in behalf of an Institution of the Church, which needs, as it is most worthy to receive the liberal aid and patronage of Churchmen.

How different would be the condition of the Institutions of the Church; how full of life and activity those which are now languishing for want of steady and sufficient support; how greatly would their usefulness be increased, if we had among us more such practical men as he whose praiseworthy example is cited by the agent. Men who would show their love to the Church by works as well as by words: whose faith will not permit them to rest in useless profession, and will not evaporate in words of zeal, but will live and grow in works of charity.

I would earnestly commend the suggestions of the agent to the Laity as offering to them the means of benefitting the "Union" while they would contribute to the dissemination of sound principles throughout the Church. The Reverend Clergy will no doubt observe the hint of their South-Western Brother.

A LAYMAN.
J. S. McCall.

To the Editor of the Churchman.

REV. SIR:—A friend in the South-West, who has done the Church much good service, in a letter recently received, gives the following excellent suggestion; by giving currency to which you will confer a favor, and perhaps advance the objects proposed.

He writes: "I have received from you, and disposed of, quite a number of Libraries. Most of these have gone into private families, in some of which there were not more than two or three children. Why can you not induce the Parochial Clergy to exert themselves to effect what I have done, with but very little labor? When I receive those orders now, I shall have received from you at least a dozen Libraries. Why can there not be found one hundred out of our fifteen hundred Clergy, who will do likewise in the next year? If so, you would have to supply 1200 Libraries, at $12,000."

The Library of one hundred volumes issued by the Union, is believed to be the cheapest library published in the country, taking into view the quantity of matter, and the style in which it is presented: with it the Union offers a list of Books of Instruction for Catechetical classes, Sunday Schools, and families which is unrivalled on the score of cheapness. Will not, then, even more than a hundred of our Clergy—laboring anxiously as they do for the good of the people of their charge—adopt the suggestion of our correspondent? And if the books are not wanted in such quantity within their own bounds, will they not raise something toward supplying the many destitute parishes and missionary stations of the great West, and South-West, which are continually sending in their appeals for aid—appeals to which we can make no suitable response, for the want of the necessary funds?

Contributions for these objects may be deposited with the Union, either to the credit of any particular diocese, parish or missionary station, or to the credit of the depositor to be drawn upon in Books, as occasions of bestowing may occur; or they may be left at the disposal of the Committee of the Institution, in full reliance that a good use can be immediately made of them.

I am, Sir, very respectfully,

Your obedient servant,

Depository, 20 John street,
New York, October 23, 1848.

D. DANA, JR.

MISSION TO CALIFORNIA.—We have received the following circular which has been addressed to the Clergy in the hope of securing their aid in providing means for this important work.

The Rev. Dr. Ver Mehr is a Graduate of the celebrated University of Leyden, and a scholar of extensive acquirements. He has, moreover, approved himself during his short ministry, a faithful and devoted servant of Christ. He is urged, by a zealous desire for the Missionary work, to go forth to this distant post. And ample is the field which spreads before him.

San Francisco is a rapidly growing city, and must, from its position and noble harbor, become a great place. In addition to its own increasing population, there are several thousand sailors, on board of Whalers alone, visiting this place every year. It is also a Naval station, and a Military post, with a numerous garrison, and no chaplain. And in this city there is now no place of worship of any kind. We leave the zealous Missionary to say the rest. The form of address is intended for each of the Clergy.

REVEREND AND DEAR BROTHER IN THE LORD:

A new territory has been added to these United States, and thus a new and wide field opened to the blessed influence of our branch of the Church of Christ. Upper California, with unparalleled climate, soil and native riches, draws hundreds of our countrymen. More than twelve thousand Americans are already there. It is estimated on reliable authority, that, next spring, many thousands will cross the Rocky Mountains, to seek a home in California. The town of San Francisco, increasing with unprecedented rapidity, and evidently destined to be a central point of American enterprise, has actually a population of more than two thousand Americans.

The importance of establishing a Mission at San Francisco, has been considered by the Domestic Committee of Missions. Having been appointed to that station, and leaving in December, I hope, with God's favour, to be in February next, on the field of labour to which I intend to devote my life.

The Mission at San Francisco seems, in more than one respect, to have a peculiar claim on the attention and co-operation of the American Churchmen. I abstain from mentioning the expenses of so distant a journey. I would only lay before my Reverend Brethren the importance of going there, with part, at least, of the funds necessary to build a Church, wherein to preach the Word, and to administer the Sacraments; to establish a School, wherein to assemble the children of the hardy pioneer. Not, that the people of San Francisco will be backward in doing their part; the appended note gives proof to the contrary. But, let the warm-hearted and generous Churchmen, enjoying the privileges of civilization, send them a token of brotherly love and communion. Let not the Missionary come with empty hands. Let him be encouraged in the arduous task before him. Let him bring to the shores of the Pacific, the visible proof, that the Churchmen on the borders of the Atlantic sympathize with their brethren in the common Faith.

Wherefore, Reverend and dear Brother in the Lord, I humbly request your co-operation in this work, by directing the attention of your congregation to it, by reading this letter, or, better yet, by preaching a sermon to impress them with the importance of the subject, and by receiving such contributions as your parishioners will give, as "free-will offering to the Lord," and forwarding the same to the Domestic Committee of Missions, at New York, to be appropriated to the purposes herein contemplated.

In the bonds of Christian love, your servant and Brother,
JOHN L. VER MEHR, Ph. D., L.L.D.,
Missionary to San Francisco, California.
Philadelphia, October 26, 1848.

The undersigned cheerfully commends the above to the favourable notice of his Brethren.

ALONZO POTTER,
Bishop of the Protestant Episcopal Church in Pennsylvania.

The undersigned, residents of, or about removing to California, fully aware of the importance of establishing the Church in San Francisco, will contribute towards the erection of a Church there; and hope that the call upon the members of the Church, made by the Rev. Dr. Ver Mehr, who has our entire confidence and warm support, may be abundantly responded to.

The following communication from a correspondent whose contributions too much resemble "angels' visits," will interest our City Readers at least. Though the comparison is somewhat odious, it is striking, and may serve as a warning to our citizens to do their part, so that the only points of resemblance between Babylon and Philadelphia may be in the streets "directly crossing each other at right angles."

For the Banner of the Cross.

Babylon and Philadelphia.

MR. EDITOR,

Some of your readers may have never read, and others may have forgotten, the following curious passage in Prideaux's Connexions; which I copy from the second American, from the twentieth London edition, (Baltimore, W. and J. Neal, 1833,) vol. 1. p. 120. The learned Dr. Humphrey Prideaux, Dean of Norwich, was born May 3, 1648. His principal work, the Connexion of the History of the Old and New Testaments, was begun in the year 1709, and finished in 1717.

After a minute description of ancient Babylon, and stating that "the whole number of the streets were fifty, each fifteen miles long, whereof twenty-five went one way, and twenty-five the other, directly crossing each other at right angles;" he adds, in a note,—

"Much, according to this model, hath William Penn the quaker laid out the ground for his city of Philadelphia, in Pennsylvania; and were it all built according to that design, it would be the fairest and best city in all America, and not much behind any other in the whole world. For it lieth between two navigable rivers, at the distance of two miles from their confluence, and consists of thirty streets, ten of which being drawn from river to river are two miles long, and the twenty others being drawn across the said ten, and cutting them at right angles, are a mile long. In the midst of the whole is left a square of ten acres, and in the middle of the four quarters of the town, into which it is equally divided, is a square of five acres; which void places are designed for the building churches, schools, and other public buildings, and also to serve for the inhabitants to walk, and other ways divert themselves in them, in the same manner as Moorfields do in London. Above two thousand houses are in this place already built, and when it shall be wholly built according to the plan above mentioned, it will be the glory of all that part of the world; and if the country round it comes to be thoroughly inhabited, the great convenience of its situation for trade, by reason of the two navigable rivers on which it stands, and the great river Delaware, into which both fall within two miles of it, will soon draw people enough thither, not only to finish the scheme, which hath been laid out by its first founder, but also to enlarge it by such additions on each side, as to make its breadth answer its length: and then, barring the walls and greatness of Babylon, it will imitate it in all things else, and in the convenience of its situation far exceed it. But this is to be understood as a comparing of a small thing with a great. For though Philadelphia were built and inhabited to the utmost I have mentioned, that is, to the full extent of two miles in breadth as well as in length, yet fifty-six of such cities might stand within those walls that encompassed Babylon."

It would appear from this, that the "Dean of Norwich," no less than "William Penn the quaker," had large ideas of the future greatness of Philadelphia; yet how little could either of them have seriously anticipated what the next hundred years were actually to bring forth!

Yours, &c.,

Rev. J. Coleman D.D.

Episcopal Acts in Pennsylvania.

We understand that during his late visitation in central Pennsylvania the Bishop of the diocese officiated in the following counties, viz. Schuylkill, Columbia, Northumberland, Union, Lycoming, Centre, Clearfield, Huntington and Mifflin.

In Schuylkill county he officiated at Minersville, preaching, confirming thirteen persons, and consecrating the church edifice; also at Schuylkill Haven preaching and confirming four persons—also at Pottsville addressing the congregation of Trinity church after a sermon by the Rector.

In Columbia county he officiated at St. Paul's church, Bloomsbury, preaching once; at Christ church Danville preaching and confirming four persons; and in Derry township where he preached and consecrated St. James church.

In Northumberland county, he officiated at St. Matthew's church, Sunbury, preaching and confirming six persons; and at Milton where there is no organised congregation by preaching once.

In Union county, he officiated by preaching at Lewisburg, where as also at Milton services are occasionally given by the Rev. Wm. Morris.

In Lycoming county, he officiated at Muncy, preaching before the convocation of Northern Pennsylvania, administering the communion, addressing the congregation of St. James on two other occasions and attending the private meetings of the convocation; also at Williamport preaching and confirming three persons.

In Centre county, he officiated at Bellefont, preaching twice, addressing the children, and confirming seven in public and one in private; also at Phillipsburg preaching once and confirming one person.

In Chesterfield county, he officiated at Morrisdale, preaching and confirming three persons; at Clearfield reading service, preaching once; and at Curwensville reading service and preaching once.

In Huntington county, he officiated at the Borough of Huntington by preaching twice, reading service once and confirming two persons.

In Mifflin county, he officiated at Leek's Mill by preaching and consecrating the Church building which has been erected there by the liberality of the Messrs. Leeks; and at Lewis-town, where he preached twice, confirming two persons, and catechised and addressed the children.

At a meeting of the Standing Committee of the Diocese of Pennsylvania, held on Tuesday the 7th of November,—

Mr. Wm. White Montgomery applied to be recommended for admission as a candidate for Holy Orders. His application according to rule, lies over for action at the next stated meeting.

Testimonials were signed on behalf of Mr. Wm. B. Musgrave, applying to be recommended for admission to the Holy Order of Deacons.

Foreign Intelligence.

Our readers will observe, says the English Churchman, with pleasure, that the University of Cambridge—as much to her own honour as to his—has elected Dr. MILL, the most able and sound divine of the day, to the Regius Professorship of Hebrew, in the room of Dr. LEE.

The (London) Guardian says: Cases of Asiatic cholera still continue to occur in the metropolis and its vicinity; and we regret to say that the registrar's return, made up to Saturday last, shows a considerable increase of the disease since last week. Few of the cases, however, are free from a shade of doubt; and we trust that appearances warrant us in believing that, even now, we may be spared any serious visitation of the epidemic.

At a meeting at Bognor (Diocese of Chichester) in aid of the Society for the propagation of the Gospel in foreign parts, the second resolution was proposed, says the English Churchman, "by an American clergyman, the Rev. J. C. Richmond." The same authority informs us that Mr. Richmond made "an eloquent and instructive speech."

Although not strictly a matter of ecclesiastical intelligence, we feel bound to give the following letter, from the same paper. The great Sea Serpent is no longer a fable, a mere "Yankee Notion!" It is now a serpentine reality; it has been seen by English eyes! Let no one doubt it! At least such is the inference to be drawn from the following declaration of the Guardian:

"Our readers no doubt have often heard the story of the 'Great Sea Serpent,' and participated in the general desire that Brother Jonathan should have full credit for the fable, for such it was believed to be. The existence of this monster, however, has now met with a corroboration that must not be subjected to doubt."

The question now to be settled between the two nations, and we hope it will be done peacefully, is, to which belongs the right of discovery. The serpent, we must own, seemed disposed to put himself under the protection of the British flag, that is the only way of accounting for his coming "so close under the lee quarter" of a British ship of war. He never so honored the American service! He only exhibited himself to landsmen or crews of fishing vessels and merchantmen! It is time some of them made oath that they saw such a snake, but their eyes and their glasses were not so well trained as those of the Navy. Leaving the great question of Discovery to be settled by wiser heads, we give the "corroboration that must not be subjected to doubt."

THE GREAT SEA SERPENT.—This following report has been forwarded to the Admiralty by Captain M'Quhæ:—

"Her Majesty's Ship Dædalus, Hamoaze, Oct. 11.

"SIR,—In reply to your letter of this day's date, requiring information as to the truth of a statement published in the Globe newspaper, of a sea serpent of extraordinary dimensions having been seen from Her Majesty's ship, Dædalus, under my command, on her passage from the East Indies, I have the honour to acquaint you, for the information of my Lords Commissioners of the Admiralty, that at five o'clock, p. m. on the 6th of August last, in latitude 21 deg. 44 min. S., and longitude 9 deg. 22 min. N., the weather dark and cloudy, the wind from the N.W., with a long ocean swell from the S.W., the ship on the port tack heading N.E. by N., something very unusual was seen by Mr. Sartoris, midshipman, rapidly approaching the ship from before the beam. The circumstance was immediately reported by him to the officer of the watch, Lieutenant Edgar Drummond, with whom and Mr. William Barrett, the master, I was at the time walking the quarter deck. The ship's company were at supper.

"On our attention being called to the object, it was discovered to be an enormous serpent, with head and shoulders kept about four feet constantly above the surface of the sea, and as nearly as we could approximate by comparing it with the length of what our maintopsail yard would show in the water, there was at the very least sixty feet of the animal a fleur d'eau, no portion of which was, to our perception, used in propelling it through the water, either by vertical or horizontal undulation. It passed rapidly, but so close under our lee quarter, that had it been a man of my acquaintance I should have easily recognised his features with the naked eye; and it did not, either in approaching the ship or after it had passed our wake, deviate in the slightest degree from its course to the S.W., which it held on at the pace of from twelve to fifteen miles an hour, apparently on some determined purpose.

"The diameter of the serpent was about fifteen or sixteen inches behind the head, which was, without doubt, that of a snake, and never, during the twenty minutes that it continued in sight of our glasses, once below the surface of the water; its colour a dark brown, with yellowish white about the throat. It had no fins, but something like the mane of a horse, or rather a bunch of a seaweed, washed about his back. It was seen by the quartermaster, the boatswain's mate, and the man at the wheel, in addition to myself and officers above-mentioned.

"I am having a drawing of the serpent, made from a sketch taken immediately after it was seen, which I hope to have ready for transmission to my Lords Commissioners of the Admiralty by to-morrow's post.

"I have, &c.,

THE BISHOP WHITE PARISH LIBRARY ASSOCIATION.—We desire to give all the prominence, in our power, to the following communication from an esteemed correspondent. If we supposed any thing could be said by us, which might add to the force of this strong appeal; we would rejoice to say it. We subscribe heartily to the powerful arguments herein expressed. They are dictated by that Charity which "rejoiceth in the truth." There is not a shade of exaggeration, not a word but those of "truth and soberness" in the statements of the good already accomplished, and which may still be done, by the Association. We speak that we do know and testify that we have seen. We know many cases of Missionaries who have thus been supplied with needful help for their glorious work. We have seen the benefits resulting, and heard the expressions of joy excited by the unhopd for possession of fifty volumes of Standard Church Theology on the part of those who could never have bought these treasures for themselves. What can a Missionary, far away from Libraries and other resources of the kind, do without books in this Age? The very character and reputation of the Ministry are concerned in the successful operation of this Charity. The Works which are thus distributed, we speak from our own observation, are most judiciously selected. The money given all goes straight to the desired object, and is, we know, most carefully and economically expended. Our readers must not suppose, from what our correspondent says, that any donation under $50 will not be most gratefully accepted. We assure them that, while this is a case demanding the largest possible gifts, the smallest favors will be thankfully received. The widow's mite will not be despised.

MR. EDITOR,

I am certain that the majority of the members of the Episcopal Church in this city and Diocese are not aware of the existence of the BISHOP WHITE PARISH LIBRARY ASSOCIATION, which was instituted about eight years ago. It was formed, with the sanction of the Bishop, with the design of furnishing every Missionary, in Pennsylvania, with the standard works of the ablest writers and soundest divines in our Church. The list of books was furnished by the Bishop, and none are added without the approbation of the Bishop of the Diocese. The ladies do not pretend to be sound theologians; they merely wish, in their subordinate capacity, to be co-workers in disseminating the truth, and preventing those errors, which proceed from ignorance, from creeping into their beloved Church. They have no agents, but perform all the manual labour themselves. By economical and judicious management, they procure the books at a very low rate. I understand the liberal patronage of a few female members of the Church has enabled them to carry on their operations, and to supply fifty-three Missionaries with small libraries, many of them containing 50 volumes. So urgent were the requests from several Bishops and entreaties from Missionaries from distant States, that they could not confine their exertions to their own State. At this time, three Missionaries are applying for libraries: the managers will be compelled sorrowfully to refuse their solicitations as their treasury is empty! Will not three enlightened, kind-hearted, wealthy, Episcopalians give donations for this purpose? Are there not three members in all the Churches, in Pennsylvania, who will each spare fifty dollars to spread the knowledge of the truth, to enlighten the minds and gladden the hearts of our destitute famishing Missionaries, and to encourage the ladies in their well-conducted charitable work? Three laudable objects can be accomplished by sparing fifty dollars from their superfluities: they will experience no inconvenience from this small deduction from their revenue, and it will be a source of lasting gratification to them, especially if they should hear of the efficient ministrations of those Missionaries, to whom they had furnished the means of instruction. The libraries remain at the Missionary stations, so that many successive pastors may be benefitted, for years, to come, by the perusal of these books; and being established in a sound faith, will not be driven about by fluctuating opinions, or induced to acquiesce in the introduction of distracting innovations into the Church. The money which is worse than wasted, in purchasing demoralizing ephemeral trash would procure many libraries of the Standard Works of the soundest Old English Divines who have enlightened our Church with their learning, and ornamented it with their piety. Our Missionaries, who are destitute of the common necessities of life, cannot afford to purchase a single volume! And many of them dwell in desert wilds, where they cannot have access to a single book! Episcopalians who acknowledge the necessity of having a learned and well instructed ministry should consider it as an imperative duty, to supply them with the requisite means of instruction. Let them, in imagination, exchange situations with them, and they will perceive that the almost obsolete golden rule of doing to others (even Missionaries!) as we would wish them to do to us, exactly applies to the present case. Those who would be satisfied with the unauthorized ministrations of the unlearned and ignorant, cannot pretend to be Episcopalians. Will the literary epicure who enjoys the variety of a well selected library, refuse to furnish the destitute Missionary with a few volumes to refresh his spirits after the toils and labours of the day? If the starving Missionary endure cold and hunger, without repining, if he be famished at his scanty board, let him, at least, feast at his desk, in his study, where he can enjoy a temporary forgetfulness of the privations he is condemned to suffer from the want of consideration, and consequent want of sympathy of nominal Christians, "who live at home at ease." They feel and express more gratitude for a supply of books, than for any provision that is made for their corporeal necessities. Even reading the Daily Newspapers should stir us up to spread Gospel truth far and wide, in order to counteract the blind and pernicious activity of those who are propagating the grossest idolatry, superstition, and fanaticism, which are spreading, like wild-fire, with fearful rapidity, over the length and breadth of the land, and rushing on in overwhelming torrents, which will soon be irresistible, if no barriers are raised to arrest them in their devastating course! Every enlightened Christian should contribute his or her quota in extending the means of knowledge to the ignorant. Our Saviour has established the order of the ministry in his Church, and his sincere disciples will do all they can to strengthen their hands, and encourage them in their work. Every Diocese should support a Parish Library Association. Now there is but one in the Episcopal Church in the United States! And that one is languishing for want of funds! Who will generously come forward to rescue, sustain, and invigorate it; and to cheer the desponding spirit of the disheartened managers? That thou doest, do quickly. Will not every Episcopal minister immediately urge its claims to the patronage and fostering care of the members of his congregation, and enumerate it among laudable objects in his appropriation of the Church collections? As the managers have made such exertions to send libraries to other States, will not some members of the Church in the Dioceses to which they have been sent, send them a few contributions to enable them to benefit others? No one will ever regret giving a donation to this unexceptionable charity; many, when it is too late, may regard it as a sin of omission, who knew how and when to do good, and did it not! I have lately met several of the managers, and heard them discoursing in such melancholy accents, and with such dejected countenances, upon the approaching dissolution of this society, that I could no longer refrain from making this appeal in their behalf, and hope my poor attempt may be successful.

Donations will be received by any of the managers, or by the Editor of the Banner of the Cross.

MR. BOLMAR'S SCHOOL AT WESTCHESTER. We have been requested to call the attention of our readers to the advertisement of this School. It enjoys the advantage of a good situation, large and commodious buildings, with safe and extensive grounds. Although we cannot speak from our own knowledge, we have always heard that the discipline and instruction of this School are of a high order. These are matters, however, in which parents must take no second hand authority, but see and observe for themselves.

In copying the following brief and just tribute to the memory of one, lately numbered with the faithful departed, we cannot forbear adding a word. It was for many years our privilege to enjoy the hospitalities of the "Farm House" wherein the humblest Minister of Christ ever found a glad welcome. Many, who have shared this pleasure, will mourn the loss of her, whose intelligence enlivened the home, which her christian graces adorned. They will join with us in attesting the justice of the following Memorial, admirable for its truth as well as for its pointed brevity.

Obituary.

MR. EDITOR,

In the Churchman of the 21st of October, was announced the death of Mrs. HANNAH RATTOONE. Suffer one who knew her well to add a few words to that notice.

Mrs. Rattoone was the daughter of the late Dr. Beach, for many years an assistant minister of Trinity Church, New York. Dr. Beach resigned his charge some years before his death, and retired to his farm near New Brunswick, where he spent the remainder of his days. Mrs. R. resided with her father till the period of his death, and since that time continued to occupy the paternal mansion. To those who knew Mrs. Rattoone, it need not be said that her house was the seat of hospitality and kindness. Mrs. R.'s acquaintance was extensive; and seldom was it that her house was free from visitors, who loved to enjoy her society. Mrs. Rattoone was a lady—a Christian lady, and a Christian lady of the old school. What higher eulogium could be passed upon her! As long as memory retains her seat, will the writer of this remember the many pleasant hours he has spent at "Farm House," and never can he look back upon them, but with regret that she who was the mistress of that house has left us to return no more.

C.

The following notice, intertwining in a graceful wreath the memory of two departed Church women united by the hand of death, we received in "the Missionary" after the above was in type.

MRS. RATTOONE AND MRS. BAYARD.—The Missionary mourns the departure, within the last month, of two mothers in our Israel; widows of reverend Clergymen, and venerable for age and piety. Mrs. Rattoone, was the daughter of the Reverend Dr. Beach, long connected with Trinity Church, New York, and the widow of the Reverend Mr. Rattoone, formerly a Professor in Columbia College, New York. She died, as did her venerable father, at the family seat, near New Brunswick; having reached the Psalmist's period, when life becomes labour and sorrow. She was a most exemplary woman, of fine intelligence, and cultivated taste; and a Christian, such as is moulded only in the Church. A home of ancient hospitality and pious cheerfulness is darkened by her death.

Mrs. Bayard was the daughter of Col. Jonathan Rhea, of Trenton, and the widow of the late excellent Dr. Bayard, Rector of St. Clement's Church, New York, and formerly of Trinity Church, Newark. She was a woman of sterling worth, adorning, in all things, the doctrine of God our Saviour. Her latter days were consoled by the presence and attentions of her affectionate children; and she died in the cheerful hope of a blessed resurrection.

In the departure of women such as these, the Church, albeit "natural tears" are shed, rejoices in her sorrow, as she recounts the treasured stores, she thus lays up in heaven. Their beautiful example is a legacy to their survivors, far more precious than rubies. The fragrance of their beloved memory will linger about our path, to console, to purify, and to cheer.

New Publications.

The Women of the Bible:

Delineated in a Series of Sketches of Prominent Females. Mentioned in Holy Scripture. By Clergymen of the United States. Illustrated by eighteen characteristic Steel Engravings. Edited by JONATHAN M. WAINWRIGHT, D. D. One beautifully printed Imperial 8vo. Volume, handsomely bound. Price seven dollars.

D. Appleton & Co., New York, and Mr. George Appleton corner of Chesnut and Seventh Street, Philadelphia, have published this work as one, among others, "appropriately adapted for Christmas and New Year's Presents, &c."

The binding and printing of the work are exceedingly rich and beautiful, and do credit to those who have shown such evidence of taste and skill. The copy, of which we speak, was bound by Mr. J. F. Altemus, No. 44 North Fourth Street, Philadelphia.

But although the Binder and Printer have well performed their parts, the Engraver has done still more to lend attraction to this volume of beauty. The engravings are not only finely executed, but the designs are most appropriate, and picture forms and faces which might well have belonged to the holy women of old. The Publishers, however, not satisfied with these powerful aids, have invoked the still greater influence of mind, and learning, and eloquence, to set off all the other beauties of the work, under the direction of an Editor, distinguished for his taste and accomplishments, as well as for his scholarship.

To show how many gifted minds have lent their united powers to make this Book attractive, we append a list of the SUBJECTS AND AUTHORS.

- I. Hagar. By the Rev. Dr. Sprague. II. Rebekah. Rev. Dr. Cook. III. Rachel. Rt. Rev. Bishop Burgess. IV. Wife of Potiphar. By Rev. Dr. Muhlenberg. V. Pharaoh's Daughter. Rt. Rev. Bp. Doane. VI. Deborah. Rev. Dr. Cheever. VII. Jephthah's Daughter. Rev. Dr. De Witt. VIII. Delilah. Rev. Dr. Wainwright. IX. Ruth. Rev. Dr. Higbee. X. Hannah. Rev. Dr. Vermilye. XI. Abigail. Rev. Dr. Vinton. XII. Dr. Kipp. XVIII. The Mother in Maccabees. Rev. Dr. Wainwright.

CHILDRENS BOOKS. We have received from Mr. George S. Appleton, some beautiful children's books. Among them a series called "UNCLE JOHN'S FANCY PICTURE BOOKS." These are "put up in a new and unique style," and we should think, would be most attractive books for children.

In addition to these, we have LITTLE ANNIE'S FIRST BOOK, in words of three letters, by her Mother, illustrated with seventy designs. MAMMA'S BIBLE STORIES, for her little boys and girls. From the eighth London edition. And WATTS' DIVINE AND MORAL SONGS, an exceedingly well printed Book. It is important that children's tastes should be improved in this, as in other respects, and publishers deserve encouragement in the good work of bringing out books in a style so well calculated to have this effect. This much we can safely say of the works enumerated above. The character of their contents we must leave for those to determine who have more time to examine them.

"Tabernacula Tua quam dilecti."

New York, H. M. Onderdonk, 161 Fulton street.

This is the first original Periodical of the kind, ever published in this country. As far as we are able to judge, from the partial examination we have been able to give it, this first number does great credit to the Society.

We are particularly pleased with an able article on Reality in Church Architecture, by Mr. Frank Wills, Architect of New York. The criticisms also upon various churches, seem to come from one who understands his subject well. They are not, and this is great praise, written in a captious spirit. There is a great deal of useful information conveyed in this number, and when they consider how necessary such knowledge has now become, we trust the members of the Church will gladly contribute $2 a year to encourage those who have engaged in this good work. We give a list of articles that our readers may see the important subjects treated of in this Publication.

Address; Cheap Churches; Reality in Church Architecture;

New York Ecclesiological Society; Ecclesiological, late Cambridge Camden Society; Oxford Architectural Society; Exeter Diocesan Architectural Society; Review—History of Trinity Church, N. Y.; Church Notes: New Churches; Eagle Lecture, Church of the Advent, Boston; A Hint on Modern Church Architecture; Glossary; Notices.

The New York Ecclesiological is published every two months, in numbers containing two sheets each, or thirty-two pages. The subscription is Two Dollars per annum, to be paid in advance, to Mr. Wm. A. M'Vicar (Treasurer of the New York Ecclesiological Society), 8 Columbia College, New York.

Communications addressed to the Editors may be sent through Mr. H. M. Onderdonk, Publisher, 161 Fulton street, New York.

THE COMBATANTS, AN ALLEGORY, by the Rev. Edward Munro, Author of THE DARK RIVER. From the London Edition with engravings executed by B. F. Childs, from original designs by Darley. New York: GEN. PRO. EPIS. S. S. UNION; Daniel Dana, Jr. Agent, 20 John street.

The previous work of this Author is a strong recommendation of this new and beautiful little Book just published by the Church S. S. Union. These Allegorical stories, in the hands of the able writers who have undertaken them, have become exceedingly popular. "The Combatants" will not be found less interesting than those which have preceded it. The manner in which the Book is published, does great credit to "the S. S. Union" and adds much to the attraction of the work. It is for sale at Mr. R. S. H. George's Book store, 16, South Seventh street.

We have also received THE JOURNAL OF THE CONVENTION OF WESTERN NEW YORK AND MISSISSIPPI. We have also received from the Publishers, Messrs. Lindsay and Blackiston, THE MEMOIR OF MISS MARGARET MERCER, by CASPAR MORRIS, M. D. Second Edition, with additions. The first edition of this work was duly noticed in the Banner. The demand for a second edition shows that the first has been favorably received. Much additional matter has been added relating to the life and character of the subject of this "Memoir."

SLANDER REFUTED.—It will be remembered by some of our readers at least, that we published in the Banner of April 15th, an article to which we gave the title of "A REPROACH AGAINST OUR ARMY." We called upon those who knew the facts to refute the gross slander against American soldiers. It seems that this story has been circulating in the secular prints, and the following authorized contradiction has been sent to us, by a friend. We are glad that it goes forth in our columns, when it cannot be supposed to have in view party or political purposes. In order that those of our readers who forget the circumstance may have the case before them, the following is a part of the article containing the slander, copied from THE CATHOLIC HERALD of April 6th, in which paper it is used as an argument against the distribution of the Bible!

PROTESTANT BIBLE DISTRIBUTION.—It is well known that Protestants showed great zeal in supplying every soldier destined for the Mexican war with a copy of the Bible. The following fact, related in the Pittsburg Christian Advocate, tells what use was made of these Bibles.

"Among the horrible perversions of all that is good, may be classed the destruction of Bibles furnished by the benevolence of the American Bible Society to our army in Mexico. The officers of that society have it in a form that gives less room to doubt than could have been wished, that a large portion of the Bibles furnished to the army under General Taylor was torn up and used for wadding during the battle of Buena Vista. It is also said that one of the general officers on that field profanely exclaimed, on seeing the destruction of Bibles, 'My God, how the gospel spreads in Mexico.'"

The last "Freeman's Journal and Catholic Register," of New York, gives us a still more personal concern in the matter by telling the story as a good JOKE (!) perpetrated by "Pat," which we suppose is a contraction for "Pater Jecorum," as he has to father all the fatherless jokes in the world! The following may be thought very witty by the readers of the Freeman's Journal, it may seem a very jocose way of disposing of "Protestant Bibles," but our readers we are sure will be shocked with the awful profanity which speaks in the following.

"PAT'S WAY OF SPREADING THE PROTESTANT BIBLE IN MEXICO.—We see in one of the papers that large quantities of the Protestant Bibles were sent to Mexico by the American Bible Society; and that the troops accepted them very cheerfully—and tore them up for wadding their cartridges! When it came to firing, some of the waggy sort called it the diffusion of Protestant Principles."—Freeman's Journal, Nov. 4th.

And now for the credit of generals and soldiers, of whatever nation, arrayed under the American flag, we are happy to publish this refutation of the slander:

Schuylkill 8th, below Spruce St., Oct. 31, 1848.

DEAR SIR:—Some of the secular prints have published a statement that at the battle of Buena Vista, "General Taylor ordered his troops to use their Bibles for cartridges and wad-dings," and when a "regiment of our troops" refused or hesitated, he exclaimed, with an oath, "Now show, you fools, how you can spread the Gospel in Mexico!" As slander is not always readily refuted, even if there be no foundation for the same, I send for insertion in the Banner a letter from Major Ramsay, U. S. A., who had charge of all the ordnance on the field of Buena Vista, which at once proves the falsity of the charge of the use of Bibles; also a copy of a letter from Major Chilton, U. S. A., an aid of General Taylor's in the same battle.

I am, very respectfully, yours,

A. D. CHALONER,

Late Assist. Surgeon, Voltigeur Regt.

Rev. Fred. Ogilby, Editor Banner of the Cross.

Frankford Arsenal, Oct. 27, 1848.

DEAR SIR:—Your note of the 25th inst., enclosing, at his instance, a letter addressed to you by "A. D. Chaloner, late assistant Surgeon, U. S. Voltigeurs," together with an article taken from a Philadelphia paper, accusing General Taylor, on "irrefragable evidence," of using "several hundred Bibles for cartridges and wadding," at the Battle of Buena Vista, reached me last night.

In reply, I have no hesitation in stating for the information of Dr. Chaloner, and for all whom it may concern, that the article in question is wholly unfounded in truth.

Indeed, the fabrication strikes me as too supremely ridiculous to be worthy of grave refutation. Having at hand the reference, I find that at the time of the battle of Buena Vista, we had in depot at Monterey, 783,557 cartridges for small arms, fabricated at the U. S. arsenals; and 181,000 musket cartridges captured from the enemy, by the capitulation of Monterey, having previously sent to the rear, (Camargo) as superfluous, 216,000 Mexican cartridges for small arms.

At Saltillo, within a few miles of the field of Buena Vista, we had all of the ammunition of the army of Major General Wool, which he had brought with him from the United States via Montelova and Parras; together with the greater part of that carried forward by, and subsequently furnished to Major General Worth, who made the advance on and took possession of that city. The quantity of ammunition available at Saltillo must have exceeded that in depot at Monterey. By order of Gen. Wool, I made, as Chief of the Ordnance, an inspection of the Ordnance Stores at Saltillo, in May last, and found the supply so great as to occasion some embarrassment as to its removal to the United States. As no accession of ammunition was made subsequent to the battle of Buena Vista, it will be seen that General Taylor did not at the time of the battle stand in need of Bibles "for cartridges and wadding."

As to the Bibles, I remember that at Monterey, Dr. Steinecke, our medical Director, took a commendable interest in distributing to the inhabitants a Spanish edition, which he had brought with him from the United States. I have no knowledge of Bibles having been furnished the army, further than that they were always to be found in our Hospitals.

I return you herewith the letter of Dr. Chaloner.

I am, dear sir, very truly, yours,

GEO. D. RAMSAY,

Brevet Major U. S. A.

Maj. G. Crossman, U. S. A., Phila.

Carlisle, Pa., Oct. 26, 1848.

SIR:—I received your letter, enclosing newspaper slip, charging General Taylor with cursing men at Buena Vista for not using Bibles for cartridges. The most complete contradiction to the charge consists in its absurdity. Manufactured cartridges were always to be procured in abundance. I doubt whether there was a Bible on the field, and if there even had been, the men had not time during the engagement to make waddings.

Respectfully, your obedient servant,

R. H. CHILTON,

Major, U. S. Army.

Dr. Chaloner, Phila., Pa.

Western New York.—CONFIRMATION.—On Sunday Oct. 29th, Bishop DeLancey preached for the congregation in St. John's Church, Vienna, in the Methodist Chapel in that village, both morning and afternoon, and confirmed four persons at the morning service.

Prayers and the confirmation preface were read by the Rev. Eli Wheeler the Missionary of the station.—Large congregations attended the services.

NEW CANDIDATES FOR ORDERS.—On the 12th of October Mr. Edmund Roberts, a candidate for orders from the Diocese of Delaware, was received into this Diocese.

On the 25th, Mr. Oran Reed Howard, and Mr. Joseph Morrison Clark were, on recommendation of the Standing Committee admitted candidates for orders in this Diocese.

These we understand make our present list of candidates for orders twenty-six, among whom are one who had been a Lutheran clergyman, one who had been a Methodist clergyman, two who had been Presbyterian clergymen, and ten who had been brought up in early life among our brethren of the surrounding denominations.—Gospel Messenger.

CLERICAL CHANGES.—The Rev. Owen P. Thackara has been received into the diocese of Maryland by Letters Dimissory from the Rt. Rev. the Bishop of Rhode Island. Mr. Thackara has received and accepted an invitation to take charge of the parish of the Holy Trinity, Prince George county.—P. O. Good Luck.

The Rev. E. Wheeler having removed to Vienna, Ontario county, Western New York, requests his letters and papers to be directed to Phelps post office.

The Future Church.

BY REV. EDWARD C. JONES.

"And there shall be one Fold under one Shepherd," "that they all may be One."

Saviour! ere death had bid thy heart-strings sever,
Thine intercession for the Church began,
And that calm, earnest, straining, subsiding never,
Till one in Faith, the brotherhood of man
Bow at a Shrine, where Peace, that gentle Spirit,
Sways her mild sceptre o'er each yielding breast,
And truths, which carnal minds would disinherit,
Are hailed, and clung to, as the Ark of Rest.

Master! speed on the day, for faint with watching,
Thy children weep, as Discord loads the gale,
If mid the gloom, their eye one beam is catching,
How would they all, that sure precursor hail,
That double Day-Spring, in its faintest gushing,
Would bid the Hydra, Sect, abashed recoil,
And to the ensign of Emmanuel rushing,
A World would shout, "as they who take the spoil."

Oh, era most sublime, when at the Cross,
(True central point of Love, and Joy divine,) Mankind unite to quite consume the dross,
And the pure gold, no longer dim, refine.
Then, Jesus come, the waving harvest gather,
Then garner in thy trophies far and wide,
And mid angelic plaudits, to thy Father
Present the Church, Thy blood-bought, spotless Bride.

The Jews in England.*

The history of the Jews has been well described as rich in the memories of the past, and the anticipations of the future. During the nineteen centuries which intervened between the call of Abraham and the birth of the Messiah, all other history is insignificant when compared with that which records the fortunes of that wondrous race, "to whom pertained the adoption, and the glory, and the covenants, and the giving of the law, and the service of God, and the promises; whose are the fathers, and of whom, as concerning the flesh, Christ came."—Rom. x. 4, 5. Ever since, solitary amongst the nations, a by-word and an astonishment, has outcast Israel remained from age to age—a standing monument of the severity of that God whose peculiar goodness it once so abundantly experienced. Nor is the interest less absorbing which invests the future prospects of the Jewish family, "when they shall be as though God had not cast them off;" when the glory of their restoration shall far transcend their first estate, "in that day that the Lord shall set His hand again the second time to recover the remnant of His people that shall be left, from Assyria, and from Egypt, and from Pathros, and from Cush, and from Elam, and from Shinar, and from Hamath, and from the islands of the sea; and he shall set up an ensign for the nations, and shall assemble the outcasts of Israel, and gather together the dispersed of Judah from the four corners of the earth."—Is. xi. 11, 12.

Of the date or occasion of the Jews' first settlement in England, we have no recorded information. The earliest mention that we find made of them, in any document connected with English history, is in the Canons of Ecbright, Archbishop of York, which contains an ordinance that "no Christian shall Judaize, or presume to eat with a Jew." These Canons were issued in the year 750, and are evidence that, at this period, Jews were already resident in England.

Ingulphus, in his history of Croyland Abbey, relates that in the year 833, Whitglaif, King of the Mercians, having been defeated by Egbert, took refuge in that abbey; and in return for the protection and assistance rendered him by the abbot and monks on the occasion, granted a charter confirming to them all lands, tenements, and possessions, and all other gifts, which had at any time been bestowed upon them by his predecessors, or their nobles, or by any other faithful Christians, or by Jews. This charter, noticing Jewish benefactors of the abbey, is proof that, previous to the date of it, Jews were established in England. But the circumstance of their being distinctly mentioned would seem to favour the idea that they were then considered as standing in a different situation, with respect to property, from the Christian inhabitants.

By the laws attributed to Edward the Confessor, it is declared, that "The Jews, wheresoever they be, are under the king's guard and protection; neither can any of them put himself under the protection of any rich man without the king's licence; for the Jews and all that they have belong to the King.—Judæi, et omnia sua, regis sunt."

Excepting those Canons of Archbishop Ecbright, the charter to Croyland Abbey, and the ordinances of King Edward the Confessor, history furnishes no materials for conjecture respecting the condition of the Jews in England prior to the Conquest;

"All that can be collected," says Mr. Blunt, "from this limited information, is, that some Jews were resident here as early as the year 750, and that, under the reign of the Confessor, they were regarded as the mere villeins or bondsmen of the crown. With respect to their numbers, their wealth, their habits of life, their civil rights or disabilities, or the estimation in which they were held by the inhabitants, we remain totally ignorant."

From the time of the Norman Invasion our information respecting the Jews becomes gradually more extensive. In the Conqueror they found a generous patron, and a steady friend. No sooner was he seated on the English throne, than he encouraged them to emigrate in considerable numbers from his native city, Rouen. The town of Stamford is said to have been appropriated for their residence upon their arrival. At Oxford a large colony was planted. Wood, in his History of Oxford, informs us that, in the tenth year after the Conquest, the Jews already resided in great numbers at the University. Not long afterwards they became possessed of most of the houses in the parishes of St. Edward and St. Aldgate there; which, from this circumstance, were called the Great and Little Jewries. They also erected a synagogue; and some of their houses being resorted to by the scholars, they, in process of time, came to be distinguished by the name of Halls, as Moses's Hall, Jacob's Hall, and Lombard's Hall. Under the three first Norman kings, the Jews increased rapidly in numbers, and lived without molestation. Although both Rufus and the first Henry, on many occasions, had recourse to violence to extort money from their subjects, the Jews are not said to have been subject to any exactions.

Under the favouring government of the Conqueror's sons were laid the foundations of Jewish wealth in England:

"It was during this period that the Crusades first began to occupy the minds of men in the different nations of Europe. In England, as in other countries, the nobles and men of rank, impelled by the romantic spirit of the age, sold and mortgaged their estates and possessions at terms the most disproportionate to their value, in order to provide themselves with money to defray the expense of their journey to the Holy Land. Many also, from among the less elevated classes of society, parted with and pledged their property for the same purpose. The Jews, from the command of ready money, which they have ever been found to possess, would not, it may naturally be supposed, fail to turn such a state of things to their own advantage."

—Blunt, p. 6.

Another source of wealth was open to them in a quarter where it might have been least expected, in the property of the Church. When a bishopric fell vacant, it was not unusual with Rufus to delay the appointment of a prelate, in order that he himself might enjoy the temporalities of the vacant see. On such occasions the persons whom the king employed to farm the vacant benefices, and to manage the sale of the lands, when they were sold, were for the most part Jews. Among his Christian subjects the king would have found it difficult to find instruments to aid him in these sacrilegious spoils. The Jews were troubled with no such scruples, and moreover, were expert in traffic, and dextrous in the management of business.

The reigns of the Conqueror and his sons were the palmy days of the Jews. They hoped that they had found in England a secure asylum; and, in the hope of continued protection, they employed this season of tranquillity in the diligent acquisition of property. With the reign of Stephen began the lengthened chapter of their persecutions. In the fifth year of his usurped dominion he exacted from the Jews in London a fine of £2000. From those resident in Oxford he demanded an enormous subsidy; and, to terrify them into compliance, he ordered the house of one of the leading Jews to be burned.

In the ninth year of Stephen the Jews were, for the first time, accused of the crime afterwards so constantly alleged against them, that of crucifying an infant in derision of the death of Christ. This atrocious charge, so perpetually brought forward to excite the populace against them, does not appear to have been established in a single instance. Fuller investigated the subject with his usual pains, and states, as the result of his inquiries, that "the Jews were seldom accused of the crime but at times when the king was in want of money."

During the reign of Henry II, the monetary pressure commenced by Stephen was continued with increasing rigor. But the year 1177 (the 24th of Henry II.) is remarkable for an act of unwonted kindness to this injured race. Up to this time they were permitted to possess but one burial-place in England. It was situated in the outskirts of London, and to it they were compelled to bring their dead from the most distant quarters of the kingdom. It was not until after repeated petitions to the king that they were allowed to purchase cemeteries near the towns which they inhabited. Nor can there be a stronger proof of the cruel prejudices of the public mind, than the fact, that so charitable, so reasonable a concession was violently opposed by the nobles of that day.

A new element of persecution was introduced with the reign of Richard I. The crusader regarded with horror and antipathy these determined enemies of the cross. The Lion-heart which longed for the recovery of the Holy Land from the Moslems, could but ill tolerate these domestic idlers. Actuated by such sentiments, Richard, upon his accession, issued a proclamation forbidding any Jew to approach the palace during the ceremony of his coronation. The populace, eager for the plunder of their Jewish neighbours, gladly interpreted this proclamation into a license to persecute them. An anti-Jewish crusade rapidly spread throughout England. In London, the rabble, after pillaging their houses, fired them, and destroyed many families in the flames. Like outrages were perpetrated at Stamford, Lincoln, and Norwich. At York many of the gentry and clergy joined the populace in this abominable violence. One canon was pre-eminently zealous. When the unhappy Jews had fled for safety into the castle, this warlike churchman headed the attack upon the fortifications. For days he led the people, clad in his surplice, and inflamed their fury by crying out with a loud voice, "Destroy the enemies of Christ!—destroy the enemies of Jesus!" Not less than 1500 Jews are said to have perished in this wholesale butchery at York.

The accession of John found the Jewish fortunes reduced to the lowest extremity. That crafty monarch, finding that no immediate profit could be gained from a continuance of ill treatment, set himself to foster and encourage, in the hope of future gain. He accordingly, in the very first year of his reign, granted to the Jews permission to nominate a person to the situation of High Priest in England, and confirmed the appointment by charter under his own hand. This charter secured to James, High Priest of London, the enjoyment of the office during his life; and at the same time provided him a safe conduct through the kingdom for the exercise of his duties. He is styled "Jacobus, presbyter Judæorum, dilectus, et familiaris noster." In the next year two other charters were granted, empowering the Jews to hold lands, and live freely and honourably within the king's dominions. These conciliatory measures had the desired effect. The Jews rapidly advanced in prosperity and wealth. Before ten years were completed their improved circumstances seemed to promise a rich harvest of plunder. The base tyrant threw aside his disguise of kindness. In the year 1210 he imposed a tallage upon the Jews of 66,000 marks, enforcing payment by imprisonment, and every species of bodily torture. Many had their eyes put out. One rich Jew at Bristol, who hesitated to pay the sum at which he was assessed, was condemned to have one of his teeth torn from his head each day, until he had discharged his quota. For seven days he endured these excessive torments; for as Holinshed observes, "those homely tooth-drawers used no great cunning in plucking them forth." On the eighth day, having now lost all his teeth but one, he found means of providing for the amount demanded.

Gospel.

"And he that was dead sat up, and began to speak."—Luke vii. 15.

The Saviour had shown his power by many miracles; he had healed the sick, and cured those whom man could not restore: he had made the blind to see and the lame to walk; he had cleansed the leper, and made the dumb to speak and the deaf to hear; nay, he had cast out devils; but here it is proclaimed that Jesus could make the dead to live. It had not been enough for us to have cast ourselves upon a Saviour who could not conquer death; for death is, of all man's adversaries, the mightiest and the most appalling; a terror to every child of man; a devourer, whose prey is confined neither to great nor small, rich nor poor, prince nor beggar; for death, like a fisherman, incloses all kinds in his net. Our need called for a

* Stow, in his Survey, gives the following account of this ground: "In Red Cross-street, on the west side from St. Giles' churchyard, up to the said Cross, be many fair houses, with divers alleys, turning into a large plot of ground, of old time called the Jews' Garden, as being the only place appointed them in England wherein to bury their dead, until the year 1177. It is now called Jewen-street, being a continued street of contiguous houses on each side of the way, and leadeth out into Aldergate-street."

* History of the Establishment and Residence of the Jews in England. By John Elijah Blunt, A. M., of Lincoln's Inn. We propose to confine ourselves on the present occasion to a brief sketch of the history of the Jews in England, which may be found in extenso in the learned and highly-interesting work of Mr. Blunt.

Redeemer who could encounter death, break his sceptre, crumble his work in the dust to which he abases us, and convert death into life. In such a Saviour and such a Redeemer only could every son of Adam trust for his soul's deliverance. And this was the fulness with which Jesus was anointed; his sufferings and cross were the grave of the powers of death, and the harbingers of life and immortality. He came; and the dead woke from their sleep: his "breath came upon them; and they lived." For we are told, "He that was dead sat up, and began to speak." O what power is there in the call of Jesus! Behold, at his word the dead arise, and their tongue is unloosed! Did ever man speak as Messiah spake? At his word corruption puts on life again—the grave yields up its dead. There is no motion nor voice in the tomb. What a Saviour is this, who can call its tenant anew to move and speak among the living, and cause them, whose "bones were dried" and whose "hope was lost," to come up out of their graves! As with the earthly so is it with the spiritual. When his word of life falls upon the sinner's heart, and makes it beat, the slumberer in sin is raised up from his sleep of death: he has heard the voice, and lives; and utterance is given him: "O sinful man that I am, and lost for ever! What shall I do to be saved?" Lo, Jesus delivers him to his mother, the church of his saints: he believes he has found grace and life and peace and joy, and walks with Christ; he hungers and thirsts, and the bread from heaven and living waters become his meat and drink. They are the "green pastures" of his soul: he grows up in a measure of the stature of the fulness of Christ. Mark now the soul that turns a deaf ear to the word of life. He doth not arise, but sleepeth on still; or he heareth it, and sitteth up for a while, but anon layeth himself down again on the bier of his perverseness and self-destruction; but his lips speak no answer to the voice of saving love, his soul is untouched by the compassion of his Lord: he neither confesseth nor repenteth him of his sin: he hungereth not for grace, neither thirsteth for righteousness: he sleeps on unto death eternal, and quenching the Spirit that brooded over him. Alas! he will not awake up and come unto Christ, that his breath may come into him—the breath of the Almighty, who is "the resurrection and the life."

"I say unto thee, Arise!" 'Tis the voice of the Lord speaking to us in his sanctuary; speaking to us by his word; speaking to us when his saints feed upon the bread he giveth them, that both we and they may eat and be satisfied. Is he not now the same Lord of grace and compassion, who went into the city of Nain? Where two or three are gathered together in his name, is he not still in the midst of them, eager to make our hearts burn within us, and saying unto our souls, "Arise, ye that sleep, and I will give you life?" O, we will not come unto him, that we may have life: we hear his word, but because we believe it not we do not keep it: we have no meekness, that it may be engrafted and save our souls. Yes, we are stiff-necked and uncircumcised in heart and ears: we resist the Holy Ghost: we will not believe his report: we will not be converted, and live: we love death better than life, and darkness better than light, because our deeds are evil.

O, let us pray that Jesus may come and touch the sinner's bier, that they which bear it, his sins, his evil concupiscences and fleshly lusts, may stand still; for they are carrying him to his burial. Alas! how many corpses, living corpses, are moving around us and about us, whose whole lives are a funeral obsequy, which is bearing their souls to the grave—a grave of utter darkness and despair, where reigns the awfulness of a silence unbroken by any voice but that which shall say to them in a tone of thunder, "Behold, the Judge standeth before the door!"

EARLY ATTENDANCE AT CHURCH.—Let me advise you to make all suitable arrangements for kneeling, for the placing of your books, &c., in good time. Regard these matters as preliminaries to be settled, once for all, before the commencement of the service. Let every thing be in its place, and that too a convenient and proper place. If possible, do not render yourselves liable to be disturbed, during the course of the service by want of room for this thing, or want of a place for that. Anticipate and remove every thing which may tend to distract your attention, or to make you restless and uneasy. Convenience for kneeling, and for kneeling with comfort (for kneeling is not an act of penance,) is a matter of real importance. I regret that many pews, not excepting the pews in our own little church, are so narrow as to be inconvenient for this purpose. If I were speaking to church-architects, I would say, "Let there be always ample room and accommodation for this posture of supplication; and, whenever you build a church, take care to make as many kneeling-places as seats." But, addressing myself, as I do now, to persons whose duty it may be to worship God in churches not well constructed in this respect, I can but suggest the propriety of using an effort, and exercising some little forethought, in order to obviate or overcome the disadvantage. Hassocks are very inconvenient, especially in narrow pews. A covered stool, with room for the feet underneath, is far better; but I would especially recommend a kneeling board, with the same accommodation affixed to the whole length of the pew, in front of the seat. At all events, let there be some provision of this kind, by means of which each individual worshipper may be able really to kneel, without being subject to inconvenience or pain from continuance in this posture. Kneeling ought to be a posture at once of lowliness and of rest: of rest, not indeed for its own sake, but in order to the full employment of the thoughts in prayer: just as, when we sit in church, we sit not simply for the sake of repose, but for repose in order that we may give attention to the word read or preached. I apprehend that, in our religious services, the leading idea of a standing posture is alacrity, effort, or respect; of sitting, attention; of kneeling, lowliness. Attend carefully to the directions of the rubric with respect to posture, response, or any other matter which affects your conduct as a member of the congregation. It ought not to be necessary for you to study the rubric during divine service. Your previous acquaintance with the prayer-book, and with the meaning and spirit of the instructions contained in the rubric, ought to be such as to lead you to comply with those instructions at the proper time, as it were instinctively, without thought or further inquiry.—Riddle's Churchman's Guide.

The whole number of Parishes in the New England States in 1769 was 40; of Clergymen, 12; and of Families, as estimated by President Stiles 2100.

The whole number of Parishes in the New England States in 1847 was 243; of Clergymen 250; and of Communicants, 17,438.

The whole number of Bishops of the Protestant Episcopal Church in the United States at the meeting of the General Convention in October 1847, was 29; of Clergymen, 1427, and of communicants, 78,150.

Some of the reports as to the number of Communicants were defective, the whole number would probably have been over 80,000.

LOOKING UNTO JESUS.—If thou wouldst have thy conscience and heart purified, and pacified, and have thy life certified, go to Christ for all, make use of him: as of his blood to wash off thy guiltiness, so of his Spirit to purify and sanctify thee. If thou wouldst have thy heart reserved for God, pure as this temple; if thou wouldst have thy lusts cast out which pollute thee, and findest no power to do it, go to him, desire him to scourge out that filthy rabble that abuse his house, and make it a den of thieves. Seek this as the only way to have thy soul and thy ways righted, to be in Christ, and then walk in him. Let thy conversation be in Christ: study him, and follow him: look on his way, on his graces, his obedience and humility and meekness, till by looking on them they make the very idea of thee, new as the painter doth of a face he would draw to the life. So behold his glory. But, as it is added, this must be by the Spirit of the Lord (2 Cor. iii. 18); do not, therefore, look on him simply as an example without thee, but as life within thee. Having received him, walk not only like him, but in him, as the apostle Paul speaks (Col. ii. 6). And, as the word is here, have your conversation not only according to Christ, but in Christ. Draw from his fulness grace for grace (John i. 16).—Abp. Leighton.

ENCROACHMENT OF THE SEA.—The slow and unnoticed, but gradual variation which is continually taking place on our coast, is truly surprising. According to Mr. Lyall, when the Inn at Sheringham, in Norfolk, was built in 1805, the spot chosen was at a distance of fifty yards from the sea, which was, from previous observation of its rate of encroachment, calculated to take seventy years to reach it. No allowance was made for the slope of ground being from the sea, in consequence of which the waste was naturally accelerated every year as the cliff grew lower, there being at every successive period less matter to remove, as portions of equal area fell down. Between the years 1824 and 1829 no less than seventeen yards were swept away; and there is now a depth of twenty feet, sufficient to float a frigate, at one point of the harbour, where, forty-eight years ago, there stood a cliff fifty feet high.

ANECDOTE OF THE REDBREAST.—Last winter a pair of robins were daily fed near the kitchen door of a Mr. James Neild, of Oulton. The male bird occasionally flying through the open window to pick up the crumbs from the floor; and so remarkably tame has he become, that he will fly to and feed out of the hands of one of the family. During the present season they have reared three broods of young—the nests being built in an old wall within a few feet of each other—and again are occupied in the construction of another nest. Whenever gardening operations are in progress, one of the old birds is generally near to pick up the vermin; and it is a remarkable fact that these valuable birds will sometimes carry to their young, in a few minutes, between forty and fifty small worms and grubs. During a heavy shower a few weeks ago, the gardener took refuge in a harbour at some distance from his work, when he was quickly followed by his innocent companion, who, perched on the branch of a tree, warbled his song of joy, as if in gratitude for the bounties of Providence.

A TROUBLESOME CONGREGATION.—On Sunday, when the minister of Udney entered the kirk, he was no less surprised than indignant to find that daft "Jamie Fleming" had taken possession of the pulpit. "Come down, Jamie," said his reverence. "Come ye up sir," answered Jamie, "they're a stiff-neckit and rebellious generation, sir, an' it will tack us biath to manage them."—Liverpool Standard.

A NATURAL PHENOMENON.—Great excitement has of late prevailed at Liegnitz, caused by another mysterious locomotion of the Wanderstein, or migrating stone of the Risenberge. This stone has repeatedly been known to have changed its place, without the action of any outward agency whatever. It stands in the Agnetendell, near the village of that name, and consists of fine-grained granite of a yellowish grey, composed of white quartz, red feldspar, with a slight admixture of black glimmer. This block of granite has suddenly moved above twenty-five yards from its former place. The last locomotion dates from the year 1822; and its migrations are the more enigmatical, as they take place, not on a slope, but on perfectly level ground. It is impossible to conceive the cause which thus repeatedly forces this rock from its place of rest, and constrains it to such violent leaps as that in 1822 and of this year, which took place between the 18th and 20th ult.—Breslauer Zeitung.

"THE READER" IN A PRINTING OFFICE.—In a printing establishment "the reader" is almost the only individual whose occupation is sedentary; indeed, the galley-slave can scarcely be more closely bound to his oar than is a reader to his stool. On entering his cell, his very attitude is a striking and most graphic picture of earnest attention. It is evident, from its outline, that the whole power of his mind is concentrated in a focus upon the page before him; and, as in midnight the lamps of the mail which illuminate a small portion of the road seem to increase the pitchy darkness which in every other direction prevails, so does the undivided attention of a reader to his subject evidently abstract his thoughts from all other considerations. An urchin stands by, reading to the reader from the copy—furnishing him, in fact, with an additional pair of eyes; and the shortest way to attract his immediate notice is to stop his boy; for, no sooner does the stream of the child's voice cease to flow, than the machinery of the man's mind ceases to work: something has evidently gone wrong; he accordingly at once raises his weary head; and a slight sigh, with one passage of the hand across his brow, is generally sufficient to enable him to receive the intruder with mildness and attention. Although the general interest of literature, as well as the character of the art of printing, depends on the grammatical accuracy and typographical correctness of "the reader," yet from the cold-hearted public he receives punishment, but no reward. The slightest oversight is declared to be an error; while, on the other hand, if by his unremitting application no fault can be detected, he has nothing to expect from mankind but to escape and live uncensured.

THE PALACE OF DAVID.—To the left of the platform, the temple, and the walls of Jerusalem, the hill which supports the city suddenly sinks, stretches itself, and descends in gentle slopes, sometimes by terraces of falling stones. On its summit, at some hundred paces from Jerusalem, stand a mosque, and a group of Turkish edifices, not unlike a European hamlet, crowned with its church and steeple. This is Sion! the palace, the tomb of David! the seat of his inspiration and of his joys, of his life and his repose! A spot doubly sacred to me, who have so often felt my heart touched, and my thoughts rapt by the sweet singer of Israel! The first poet of sentiment! the king of lyrics. Never have human fibres vibrated so harmonious, so deep, so penetrating, so solemn. Never has the imagination of poet been set so high, never has its expression been so true. Never has the soul of man expanded itself before man, and before God, in tones and sentiments so tender, so sympathetic, and so heartfelt! All the most secret murmurs of the human heart found their voice and their note, on the lips and the harp of this minstrel! And if we revert to the remote period when such chants were first echoed on the earth; if we consider that at the same period the lyric poetry of the most cultivated nations sang only of wine, love, war, and the victories of the muses, or of the courses at the Eleian games, we dwell with profound astonishment on the mystic accents of the prophetic king, who addresses God the Creator, as friend talks to friend; comprehends and adores his wonders, admires his judgments, implores his mercies, and seems to be an anticipatory echo of the evangelical poetry, repeating the mild accents of Christ before they had been heard. Prophet or not, as he is contemplated by the philosopher or the Christian, neither of them can deny the poet-king an inspiration bestowed on no other man! Read Horace or Pindar after a psalm! For my part I cannot!

I, the feeble poet of an age of silence and decay, had I domesticated at Jerusalem, should have selected for my residence and abiding place, precisely the spot which David chose for his at Sion. Here is the most beautiful view in all Judea, Palestine, or Galilee. To the left lies Jerusalem with its temple and its edifices, over which the eyes of the king or of the poet might rove at large without his being seen from thence. Before him, fertile gardens descending in steep declivities lead to the bed of that torrent, in the roar and foam of which he delights. Lower down, the valley opens and extends itself; fig trees, pomegranates, and olives overshadowing it. On one of these rocks suspended over the rolling tide, in one of these sonorous grottoes, refreshed by the breeze and by the murmur of the waters; or at the foot of a terebinthus, ancestor of that which shelters me, the divine poet doubtless awaited those inspirations which he so melodiously poured forth! And why will they not here also visit me, that I might recount in song the griefs of my heart, and of the hearts of all men, in these days of perplexity, even as he sang of hopes in an era of youth and of faith! Song, alas! no longer survives in the heart of man, for despair sings not! And until some new beam shall descend upon the obscurity of our times, terrestrial lyres will remain mute, and mankind will pass in silence from one abyss of doubt to another, having neither loved, nor prayed, nor sang.—Lanartine.

LAUDATORY EPITAPHS.—A little girl walking in the cemetery of Pere-le-chaise, Paris, and reading one after another the praises on the tombs of those who slept beneath, said, "I wonder where all the sinners are buried?"

SIR.—The Episcopal Recorder of this date contains an editorial notice of the first number of the New York Ecclesiologist, just published.

In commenting upon a note on p. 7, of the Ecclesiologist, the Editor remarks—"We have here a fair specimen of the impracticable character of the movements of men who wish to carry us back to an age entirely dissimilar to our own, as though Christianity in its workings and developments had no adaptations to the numerous social changes that are continually taking place upon the earth."

From this it is evident that the Editor knows nothing of the subject he has appointed himself to discuss. Under cover of deprecating a return to "the dark ages," he censures the "movements" of the only men who concern themselves about the modern improvement of Church Architecture—now sunk to so low a degradation. So far is the return which he fears, from being a movement of an impracticable character, that any practical builder, who has had the opportunity to judge, can teach the Editor of the Recorder the superiority of the ancient structures (as buildings) to those which we have been now too long accustomed to. The dissimilarity of the past age to our own now is, in this point, its superiority. Besides the Editor of the Recorder, there are, probably, few persons who are not aware of this superiority, or, at least, who have ever considered the subject without being struck by it.

That the "developments" of Christianity ought to have any "adaptations to the numerous social changes that are continually taking place upon the earth" is certainly strange doctrine! Yet this is directly implied in the Editor's language. It is the common prayer of Christians—"that among all the changes and chances of this mortal life, they may ever be defended by" one and the same Divine Grace, the help of God through Jesus Christ our Lord, changeless amidst all changes. They hold, in common, one Faith, immutable amidst the decay and renewal of all things else on earth. This Faith does not pretend to interfere with God's Providence in these changes. Nay! it gladly accepts them all as its own appointed discipline and trial. But its work is, to remain firm in spite of them—not to adapt itself to them, but to meet them all, and to grow stronger by constant patience.

Ought, then, the Christian Church continually to change its architecture, in token of the endless changes around it—or ought it, rather, only to improve unto perfection its symbolism of the unalterable Faith it was built to maintain and bear witness to? Sad will be the day for the best interests of our Church when the symbols of Ecclesiology take the place of the simple, practical teaching and preaching of the pure and purifying doctrine of Christ crucified.

Perhaps so! But glorious will be the day when the labors of Ecclesiology shall substitute the proper symbols of God's Holy Faith, and a corresponding Architecture, for the coarse and incongruous monuments of man's ignorance which insult His Service and seem to contradict His Doctrine. [The church of the Church of St. James the Less] is a part of that sacramental system of salvation which had its birth, growth and full development in the dark ages of the Church. We have been taught in our catechism (out of Holy Scripture) that the "Sacraments" were "ordained," "as generally necessary to salvation,"—not "in the dark ages" of the Church, but—"by Christ Himself."

How are we to reconcile the complaining remark that "ten substantial churches, each capable of seating as many persons as that of St. James the Less, might have been erected for the sum expended on it"—with the rejoicing, in the next column, over "the large and splendid edifice," in which "the Rev. Dr. Tyng will commence his labors" on Sunday the 19th inst. The Ecclesiologist informs the Editor of the Recorder (though he has not chosen to notice the information) that the Church of St. James the Less will seat four hundred persons. Will St. George's, New York, seat so many in proportion to its vastly greater cost?

The Church of St. James the Less is an example of correct (almost faultless) Christian Architecture. St. George's is not. I am, sir, your obedient servant, R. R. Cox.

Rubrics.

MR. EDITOR:—As a Churchman I feel no little satisfaction in the contemplation that I belong to a body of Christians, who under Christ, are knit together by a common bond of union acknowledged by all, and acknowledged as the notary says, in the presence of each other; and this bond which derives its efficacy from the Bible is the Book of Common Prayer, as set forth and ratified "by the Bishops, the Clergy and the Laity, of the Protestant Episcopal Church in the United States of America in convention, this 16th day of October in the year of our Lord One Thousand Seven Hundred and Eighty-nine."

After a careful examination of this book we find that the daily services of the sanctuary are plainly written and carefully pointed out, each step we take leads to another until the benediction of the Priest of God bids us depart in peace. You no doubt, Mr. Editor, have experienced as well as many others a delightful home feeling creeping over you, as "the order of daily prayer" proceeds in accordance with the Rubrics. Even in a strange edifice, and in a distant city from your native parish, you feel that God and your brethren are present; cold indeed must be the heart that does not with renewed fervor return thanks "for the means of Grace" vouchsafed unto Episcopalians in the possession of this blessed Liturgy. But let deviations in the service, in form, or substance, jar upon the ear of the stranger and he is at once painfully reminded of his absence from his own well-ordered sanctuary; or is led from his devotions, to search anew this bond of union, to see if the Rubrics have been read aright or correctly understood.

I have been led to the contemplation of this subject from a notice from the Churchman published in the Banner, October 14th, of a service held in New York city. It appears the chancel was filled on that occasion with the Clergy in surplices, and the Psalter was chanted antiphonally by the Clergy and the people, no not by the people but by the Clergy and Choir! Now I cannot conceive a more effectual means of disturbing the devotional feelings of a congregation gathered from the delegates of a whole Diocese than the chanting of the Psalter as above mentioned. It was at the anniversary of the Diocesan Institutions, and a collection was taken up in aid of the funds of the New York Bible and Common Prayer Book Society. If the directions how and when the Psalter is to be used are correctly printed in the books the society issues, what a sorry compliment was then paid to the rubrics of that book which they then sought funds to circulate.

But the mystery is, that a large number of the Clergy should sanction by their aid such a positive deviation from the Rubrics. Choirs we know will follow where their music leads. We laymen are accustomed to look up with confidence not to our choirs, but to our Rectors for directions on all the rites and ceremonies of the Church judging them to be learned in all ecclesiastical subjects. Is such an exhibition calculated to increase this confidence?

I see that the Church of England permits the Psalter to "be said or sung," and it likewise directs the creeds to be sung or said, but this fact instead of allowing us to do the like, shows conclusively to me that the convention of 1790 struck that privilege if privilege it be, from the book, and left the direction "how the Psalter is appointed to be read."

I question not the taste of any man who prefers chanting the Psalms of the day, but I must be excused for objecting to his exercising this taste to the annoyance of others in places and at times of public worship, especially when the same is Anti-Rubrical. If the wish for this mode of worship extends to any great number in the church, why not take steps to have the rubrics so altered as to permit it, perhaps many of our Clergy would then aid this alteration who now prohibit chanting the Psalter from

PRINCIPLE.

We would thank our Rubrical friend to point out the Rubric which makes our present method of reading the Psalter, responsively by Minister and people, rubrical. "Sacerdos," shows (see Editorial) that it is rubrical to chant the Psalter, while there is not a word in the rubric to justify our present mode of reading. —[Editor of the Banner.]

North-Eastern Convocation of Pennsylvania.

Pursuant to notice, a new convocation was organized at Montrose, Susquehanna county, on Wednesday Nov. 1st, which is intended to embrace the Clergy of the Diocese of Pennsylvania residing in the North-Eastern counties. The meeting was convened at the invitation of the Rev. John Long, Rector of St. Paul's Church, Montrose. There were also present, the Rev. Asa S. Colton, Rector of St. Matthew's Church, Pike, and the Rev. Robert J. Parvin, Rector of Christ Church, Towanda, in Bradford county, the Rev. Henry H. Bean, Rector of St. Andrew's Church, Springville, Susquehanna county, and the Rev. Geo. D. Miles, Rector of St. Stephen's Church, Wilkesbarre, Luzerne county. The name adopted was "The North-Eastern Convocation," and the rules with some slight modifications were taken from those of the Northern Convocation organized at Bellefonte in July last. The Rev. Asa S. Colton being the presbyter longest resident within the bounds of the Convocation, took the chair. (The Bishop of the Diocese being President ex-officio) and the Rev. Geo. D. Miles was chosen Secretary.

The religious services commenced on Wednesday morning, prayer was read by the Rev. Mr. Parvin, assisted in the lesson by the Rev. Mr. Colton; the sermon was preached by the Rev. Mr. Miles, and the communion administered by the Rector of the Church in which the services were held. The services were continued through Wednesday, Thursday and Friday, morning, afternoon and evening, the sermons being preached by the Clergy in rotation, followed by short addresses. At the final service on Friday evening, after the sermon, exhortations were made by each of the Clergy;—the 27th Hymn sung (Blest is the tie that binds our hearts in Christian love,) and the congregation dismissed after prayer, with the benediction from the Rector. It was a pleasant and refreshing season to us all, and we trust that the services will prove useful to the parish, and the organization ultimately beneficial to the Church in that section of the Diocese.

The next meeting is appointed at Springville, Susquehanna county, on the first Wednesday in February 1849.

Bishop White and the Daily Service.

REV. MR. EDITOR:—

The attention of readers and of Churchmen generally is respectfully called to the following extract from Bishop White's "Memoirs of the Protestant Episcopal Church," pp. 52, 53, 1836, 2nd Edition. (The venerable author is speaking of some abbreviations and licences which were proposed in the Service by the House of Bishops in 1826.) He writes, "License was also given, in reference to the calendar, that in churches in which there is the observance of what are called the prayer-days, the minister may make his choice of a chapter intervening between one such day and another. The notoriety that the calendar was constructed with a view to a daily morning and evening service, is proof, that where this does not obtain, but there is service on Wednesdays and Fridays, it is conducive to edification to admit the proposed latitude." (The italics are mine own.) It may be necessary to add, Rev. Mr. Editor, that the meaning of the word Daily was, in the lifetime of Bishop White, just what it now is, i. e. according to Webster, "Happening or being every day; done day by day; bestowed or enjoyed every day."

Very Respectfully Yours.

Girard College.

We lament as Churchmen and as Citizens the resignation of the "Lady Matron of Girard College." The beautiful dignity and tenderness blended in the character of this noble daughter of the Church, has eminently tended to harmonize and elevate the tone of the "Citizens' College;" and we can hardly refrain from asking why such a loss was allowed at this time, before the Policy of the great institution is firmly based?

Obituary.

DIED, in Charleston, S. C., on Thursday, the 26th October, Mrs. ANNA LOUGHTON FRAZIER CAMPBELL, wife of Dr. I. M. Campbell, and eldest daughter of the late Dr. John Ramsay, aged 50 years, 8 months and 26 days.

The death of this excellent lady has excited a more than common interest in this community. Seldom has a larger assemblage been witnessed at the funeral of one, whose retired habits had made her emphatically a "keeper at home." Through life, she was an object of special regard to a large circle of friends and relatives, and for the last nine years severe and almost uninterrupted suffering had rendered her the subject of their deepest sympathy. At the early age of 14, she was called to the charge of her widowed father's family, in which responsible station it was observed by her uncle, the late Dr. David Ramsay, the historian, that her "prudent maternal conduct was exemplary beyond her years." And, in after days, when her own family was growing up around her, she fulfilled the sanguine hope which he expressed, that she would "continue the same praiseworthy line of conduct which she then pursued." Her domestic virtues attracted the particular notice of the late Bishops Dehon and Bowen, the latter of whom is remembered to have said, twenty years ago, to a stranger coming to reside here, "I wish you particularly to cultivate the acquaintance of that excellent young woman." Many who survive her can bear witness that her friendship was of no common value, and the recollection of her domestic faithfulness is itself found to be a precious cordial to the hearts of those who mourn in her, a wife, a mother, a sister, a friend. Indeed, her attachments and anxieties were so strong as to bind her to earth, even when for her own sake she might well have desired to flee away and be at rest. Hence she was for a long time "in a strait betwixt two," and, though indulging an humble hope in Christ and earnestly striving to submit to the will of God, she could not venture to say that she was ready to part from those who had so long been the objects of her anxious care; but, as her end approached, hope brightened into sweet assurance, earthly affection was entirely subdued, and communion with departed friends became her prevailing occupation and enjoyment.

Let this, then, be recorded for the consolation and encouragement of those who are suffering in the flesh and trembling at the thought of the change that awaits them. To them, also, in due season, if they trust in God, the sting of death shall be taken away and the victory be given them through Jesus Christ our Lord. One more "weary traveller" has (we may hope) reached her home and gained the prize. Let us, too, journey on in the exercise of faith and patience.

"Assured God's love will far o'er pay
The hardest labors of the road."

Diet of Children.

The other day we observed an infant seven months old, sitting in its mother's lap munching away at a rich currant cake.

"Is it right for your child to eat such things?" we inquired.

"Will it not hurt him?"

"Hurt him!" replied the mother; "why he eats almost everything. And he has never yet choked on anything."

It was true the child was not yet choked, though it seemed to us very doubtful how long even that catastrophe might be averted. But it was equally true, as its dull heavy eyes, and pale cheeks too plainly showed, that this "eating everything," was sowing the seeds of constant ill health, if not of early death.

In too many families the diet of the children appears to be regulated on this principle, "it does not choke, therefore it does not hurt them." And the little creatures are allowed to eat, indiscriminately, whatever they please, unrestrained by their injudicious parents. We would like to direct the attention of mothers who act on this system, to the following remarks, which we find in an English paper. They are worthy of consideration.

"The finest children I have seen in the United States were fed mostly upon bread, milk, eggs, and poultry. If parents would feed their children in this way, giving them little or no animal food, they would not be so liable to disease, nor would contagious disorders be so fatal as they are now, owing to the excessive use of animal food, and particularly pork."

Want of due reflection on the subject, and, in many cases, mistaken indulgence, induces mothers to refrain from regulating the diet of their children. They may rest assured that a little proper attention to this point will greatly promote the health, and, as a necessary consequence, the comfort and happiness of the little ones entrusted to their guidance and care.—Christian Chronicle.

EXAMPLES WORTHY OF IMITATION.—We are happy to place on record, and commend to the attention of our readers, the two following statements.

Bishop Delancey's Address to the Convention of Western New York, contains this unusual announcement:

"The Rev. Thomas Morris has been compelled by ill health, to relinquish his missionary and ministerial duties at Ellicottville and Olean, where he had laboured from the time of his ordination, Feb. 2d, 1834—at Ellicottville the whole period, and at Olean with a brief intermission for fourteen years. I rejoice to put on record the noble act of our brethren and friends in those Parishes, in presenting to this reverend brother a farm of about one hundred acres of land near Ellicottville, as a testimonial of their high regard for their Pastor, and of their affectionate sympathy with him, and his large and interesting family. The gift was most appropriately made on Thanksgiving Day. I am sure that I have the concurrence of every heart in this house in the prayer, 'may the Lord remember them for good.'"

In the last number of the "Charleston Gospel Messenger," we find the following record:

"Annual Thanksgiving Day.—It was observed on Thursday, October 26th, (that day being designated by the city authorities) in all our city churches. In obedience to a resolution of the Convention there was a collection for the aged and infirm Clergy, amounting at St. Philip's to $70 13; at St. Michael's $41 50; St. Paul's —."

These facts suggest two important practical considerations, for which we claim the regard of the members of the Church. The first point to be considered is, the duty devolving upon Parishes of making proper provision for the support of infirm and disabled Ministers. This duty plainly rests upon every Parish, which has enjoyed the long and faithful services of a Pastor, who has spent the vigor of his life in laboring for their spiritual benefit. It is impossible for the great mass of the clergy, upon their slender incomes, to lay up anything for future temporal need. They have little enough for their present necessities. Too often the pressure of care and anxiety adds to the heavy load of years, and time's sad work is accomplished before the appointed season of natural decay. By an allotment, merciful in one respect at least, most of our working clergy die with their harness on. Few, very few, "rest from their labors" until they hear that "voice from heaven" which speaks to the weary of eternal rest. But it is not always so. Here and there a veteran soldier of the cross is driven, by infirmity and disease, from the field of active labor. And if the Minister of Christ is ever led to anticipate a season of helpless infirmity, what a dreary prospect is revealed to him as his earthly portion? It should not be so. If Parishes cannot provide against this evil every Diocese should create a fund large enough to meet the necessities of the case.

The examples, we have cited, show the two ways in which such provision may be made. The first is by that noble generosity, or rather, we should say, that acknowledgment of a bounden duty which leads a Parish to take care of its own disabled clergy. This was the method pursued by the Parishes of "Ellicottville and Olean." If two humble country Parishes like these, could give "a farm of about one hundred acres of land," there are few Parishes, if they had the same spirit, in which the clergy need apprehend misery and want as the consequence of old age or infirmity. We trust the noble example may not be lost upon the Church. Another method of attaining the same end is suggested by the second notice. In many, or most, of our Dioceses a fund exists for the support of "the aged and infirm clergy." We fear, however, that very little care and effort are bestowed upon the endeavor to increase this fund and make it ample enough to meet the large demand to which it is liable. Now that our clergy are increasing so fast it is time that this important subject secured the attention of the church. Otherwise we may expect that the order of mendicants will be revived, or those who cannot dig and to beg are ashamed, must be content to starve.

The second consideration to which we referred is suggested by the time at which these donations were made. They were offered on Thanksgiving Day. We would therefore take this occasion of calling the attention of the members of the church to this important part of the duty of Thanksgiving. If we have a proper sense of God's bounty to us, we should express it by deeds as well as words. "Freely ye have received, freely give." There seems to be a peculiar propriety in making Thanksgiving Day an occasion for some act of practical charity. Nor are we left to the deductions of our own reason or sense of propriety in this matter. The charge of God to His ancient people, when they presented themselves for a similar purpose, was, "and they shall not appear before the Lord empty: every man shall give as he is able according to the blessing of the Lord thy God which He hath given thee." And the church solemnly recognizes this part of Thanksgiving in the application of that text, placed first among the sentences at the beginning of Morning Prayer, in the appointed service, "Honour the Lord with thy substance, and with the first fruits of all thine increase: so shall thy barns be filled with plenty, and thy presses shall burst out with new wine."

We do not mean to limit the object of this bounty, or to define for others the channel in which their charity is to flow. If the purposes referred to in the cases cited, do not approve themselves as most worthy, there is no lack of objects whereon to bestow our gifts. We therefore suggest, in reference to the Thanksgiving Day now at hand, whether in view of the many demands of the Church and the various calls for help, it would not be well to remember this part of our duty. And thus to the record of our Thank's-gift may be added in words like those quoted above—"The gift was most appropriately made on Thanksgiving Day."

We understand that in some churches in this city, it is intended to make a collection on Thanksgiving Day, to aid in the erection of "the Floating Church of the Redeemer."

BISHOP DOANE.—The account which has appeared in many of the secular papers, of the dangerous illness of the Bishop, and which has excited so much alarm and distress, was strictly true. He was seized on Sunday (Nov. 5th,) after the morning service, in which he preached and administered the Holy Communion, with violent rheumatic pains. His disease, though it was attended with great suffering and confined him to bed, was not considered dangerous, until Friday afternoon, when he began to sink, and during the whole night life seemed at its lowest ebb. This critical state continued during the whole of Saturday. On Sunday the Bishop's condition began to improve, and his strength slowly to return, so that in the evening he was able to receive the Holy Communion with the members of his family and his "beloved Physician." The son who administered "the comfortable sacrament" to his spiritual Father, at such an hour, will ever esteem it a high privilege to have witnessed the solemn and impressive scene.

The Bishop has continued gradually to improve, and we are happy to state that his physicians consider him out of danger, so that the hearts which trembled with fearful anxiety, may now be filled with gratitude to Him who has graciously spared a life whereon so many interests depend, around which so many affections are entwined.

We cannot close without stating that the Bishop owes his life, under God, to the most devoted attention of his physicians. The attendant physician, Dr. Parrish, was constantly at his bed-side, and Dr. Mutter, of Philadelphia, at a time when urgent demands are made upon his important services, spent whole nights in the earnest and anxious endeavor to preserve so dear and valuable a life to the Church.

EPISCOPAL SERVICES IN NEW YORK.—We take the following from the New York Churchman:

"We have received the following from the Secretary of the Standing Committee of this Diocese—

"The Standing Committee of the Diocese of New York, hereby inform the Clergy and Parishes of the Diocese, that the Rt. Rev. Bishop Doane has been appointed to perform Episcopal Services during the month of November, and the Rt. Rev. Bishop Whittingham, from the first of December until the meeting of the next Annual Convention. Bishop Whittingham will be ready to perform such duties as may be desired, from the 2d to the 8th of December, from the 10th of January to the 10th of March, and during the months of June and August."

"By order of the Standing Committee,
"BENJAMIN I. HAIGHT,
"Secretary."
"New York, November 6, 1848."

CHANTING THE PSALTER.—Among our communications will be found one in which the writer tries to show that those who chant the Psalter violate the Rubric. We publish it not only because we are willing to hear both sides, but because we esteem it a duty to encourage those inquiries which direct attention to matters too much neglected. We do not think the writer has made out his point. We had intended showing, in our own words, our reasons for this opinion. But we think the end will be better answered by giving a short extract from a very able article on this subject over the signature of "Sacerdos" in the Banner of April the 8th. It is perfectly conclusive in our judgment, and answers directly the objection urged by our correspondent.

The person who objects to singing the Psalter, generally quotes the following Rubric. "The Psalter shall be read through, &c." And taking the term 'read' in its popular sense as opposed to 'sung,' the objector assumes that this is its rubrical sense, and consequently decides that singing the Psalter is unubrical.

Our reply is very brief. The popular sense of the term 'read' is not the rubrical sense. The rubrical term 'say' is the antithesis to 'sing:' whilst the term 'read' comprehends either saying or singing.

For example. One Rubric, in the Church of England Prayer Book, (from which our Prayer Book takes the rubric about reading the Psalter) declares, that "the creed of St. Athanasius is appointed to be read," whilst another rubric declares "it shall be said or sung."

Again, The English Rubric directs, "The Psalter shall be read," whilst another rubric, in the Daily Prayer, relating to the Psalter, directs, "Then shall be said or sung the Psalms in order as they are appointed."

It is evident, therefore, that the term "read," which our (and the English) Prayer Book retains in the rubric, "The Psalter shall be read," means "saying or singing."

But we have another way of arriving at the express mind of the American Reviewers of the Prayer Book on this matter.

The American Prayer Book not only follows the English services and rubrics generally, but contains, among other services, peculiar to it, one entitled, "A Form of Prayer and Thanksgiving to Almighty God, for the fruits of the earth, &c. &c." Now in directing what portion of the Psalter should be used on this occasion, Bishop White and his coadjutors had a fair occasion, to decide the question, which we are now considering. Had they considered it inexpedient, or improper, or unubrical to sing the Psalter, they might, in making a new rubric, have settled the point. They have, indeed, settled the point, but directly against those who, in these days, seem fonder of good Bishop White's name, than of his principles.

The American rubric is as follows. "Then shall be said or sung one of the Selections, or some other portion of the Psalms, at the discretion of the Minister."

Here then, is a service peculiar to the Protestant Episcopal Prayer Book. Our American Reviewers, as if to settle the question of the right and propriety of chanting the Psalter, at the discretion of the minister, express (what the English Prayer Book evidently means,) and say that the Psalms "shall be said or sung." Observe, the rubric does not use the phrase "read or sung," but "said or sung;" thus proving that 'say' is the proper antithesis to 'sing' in the American as well as English rubric, and that Bishop White and his friends, in constructing new rubrics, as well as in retaining old ones, adhered to the Ecclesiastical and not popular standard of rubrical terminology.

In conclusion, we remark, that in our judgment (founded on the above reasons,) it is rubrical to sing the Psalter, just because "the Psalter is appointed to be 'read.'" The term "read" comprehending 'saying or singing.' The only law, whether to say or sing, being, as the rubric for Thanksgiving Day directs "the discretion of the Minister."

GROSSE ISLE INSTITUTE, FOR THE EDUCATION OF BOYS, Wayne county, Michigan.

REV. M. H. HUNTER, an alumnus of Yale College, Principal. In this Institution, boys are instructed in the Classics, Mathematics, and all the usual branches of a liberal education. Every attention is paid to their comfort, manners and morals, and the general management is that of a private family. As the number of pupils is limited, every one receives strict personal attention, and is removed from the moral contagion attending a large miscellaneous school. The house is large and commodious, having been lately erected for this express purpose. The situation is healthy, affords ample opportunities for exercise and harmless amusements and commands a fine view of Lake Erie.

It is the aim of the Principal so to educate those entrusted to his care, that they shall leave the institution not only good scholars, but imbued with sound principles, and fitted either for business or for entering upon any of the learned professions. The institution is 18 miles from the city of Detroit, and is easily accessible from all directions.

The months of April and August will be vacations.

The session will begin on Monday, the second of October.

We have received the above Circular with the request that we should notice it in the Banner, from a clergyman in whose judgment we may repose the strongest confidence. He says that this "is the first school for boys decidedly Episcopal, which has been established in this Diocese, (Michigan), and we all trust that it will prosper." He adds, "Two years ago Mr. Hunter purchased a piece of land on Grosse Isle, and has put up excellent buildings. The situation is exceedingly beautiful, and combines every thing that can be expected in such an undertaking. Mr. Hunter is a clergyman of fine education, and having a taste for teaching, is well adapted for it." This opinion is sustained by "references" of the highest character, among whom is the Bishop of the Diocese. We think it a matter of great importance to the Church in the west that schools of such an order should be sustained. Of no less import is it to parents that they should encourage, for their children's sake, such schools in their vicinity. We would therefore urge the claims of this church school upon the regard of our kind readers in Michigan. They are called on to support it, for the Church's sake, for their children's sake, for their own sake.

ST. MARY'S HALL AND BURLINGTON COLLEGE.—We are happy to learn that these two Institutions have opened with additional numbers.

The college has now nearly 120 resident pupils, in addition to day scholars. Although these schools must for a short time lose the personal superintendence of the Bishop, still under the direction of their able Principals and the effective discipline which they so successfully administer, no interruption will, on this account, occur in the usual well ordered course of things.

THE SPIRIT OF MISSIONS, FOR NOVEMBER.—This is an interesting number, and contains much matter worthy of attention. We have already called the attention of our readers to the recommendation by the Domestic Committee of the first Sunday in Advent, as an occasion for a general collection for Domestic Missions.

We find the following encouraging notice, which we esteem a worthy example deserving of record.

Resolutions of the Vestry of St. Luke's Church, Kalamazoo, Mich.
At a meeting of the Wardens and Vestry of St. Luke's Church, Kalamazoo, Mich., holden on the 23d day of September, in the year of our Lord one thousand eight hundred and forty-eight, it was,

Resolved, That the present prosperity of this parish is owing, in a great measure, to the Divine blessing upon the fostering aid of the Domestic Committee of the Domestic and Foreign Missionary Society.

Resolved, That the thanks of the parish are hereby tendered to the Domestic Committee, and to all who have contributed to their treasury.

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Domestic Committee be requested to omit the name of Kalamazoo in the list of Missionary Stations from and after October 1st, 1848.

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Vestry transmit a copy of these Resolutions to the Bishop of the Diocese, and to the Secretary of the Domestic Committee.

By order of the Vestry,

JAMES P. CLAPMAN, Secretary.

This number also contains a beautiful and Church-like "design," of which the following is the notice.

Design for a Church.—The engraving given in this number is from a design and plan of a cheap Church, furnished by Frank Wills, Esq., Architect, No. 156 Broadway.

The cost of such an edifice, will, of course, greatly depend upon the kind of materials and extent of ornamental work used in its construction. In some parts of the country, it is supposed an edifice of this description may be built of wood for $2,500; and without the spire, which can be added at any time, it could be erected for a much less sum.

Not having yet received the article upon cheap churches promised us, we have concluded to give the sketch without it; and are authorised to refer all who may desire more full information, to Mr. Wills, who will cheerfully furnish it.

There is also a very interesting letter from Bishop Southgate. We append it as worthy of attention.

CONSTANTINOPLE, August 15, 1848.

REV. AND DEAR SIR,—I resume my report where I left it in my last to you, at the time of forwarding my annual report, and shall diverge somewhat from my usual mode of reporting, by giving you sketches of particular incidents and events, such as may best illustrate the nature and prospects of the Mission.

May 2d.—Received from the Armenian Patriarch a communication in reply to one that I made him a few days ago, with reference to the treatment of the Papal Envoy by Oriental Ecclesiastics. The Pope sent an envoy to the Sultan in January, a bishop, the titular Archbishop of Sidon. He was received with great honor, and the most profuse attentions were lavished upon him; but it soon became apparent that his mission was not purely a political one. There were connected with it very extensive plans for enlarging the spiritual authority of the Pope in the East. I felt bound so far to act as to prevent the dangerous concessions that might be made while the envoy was in the full tide of popularity. The government had ordered the Patriarchs to show him attention. The Armenian had called upon him in person; the Greek had merely sent his compliments by a messenger. Many other events had occurred, which cannot now be narrated. I thought I had seen in the bearing of the Armenian Church too great a deference to this Papal Mission, and a tendency to do honor to it, which would prove a dangerous precedent. It was on this point that I communicated a fraternal remonstrance to the Patriarch. He received it very kindly, and to-day sent me in reply a communication, to the effect that the degree of attention which he had shown to the envoy, had not been at his own option, but by express order of government; that other things which had been pressed upon him, (and which he enumerated,) he had succeeded in avoiding; that if I was little pleased with the excessive demonstrations of respect which the envoy had received, he was still less so, &c. The communication, with others which I had made, had a good effect, and tended, I believe, to set things right, with regard to the ecclesiastical reception of the envoy. With his political mission, I had, of course, nothing to do. The whole has been one of the most extraordinary pages in Oriental Church history; and will live for good or evil in times to come.

In the evening, as I was sitting in my room, resting from the labors of the day, a Greek deacon was announced, and I invited him in. He entered in great agitation, and reminded me that I had seen him during the day. He now told me that he had then inquired who I was; and on learning that I was an American Bishop, had determined to come to me. I bade him welcome, and we entered into conversation. He told me that he was a deacon of the Greek Church, of the Bulgarian nation, the people who inhabit European Turkey. He had come hither two months ago, and his fellow-countrymen in this city had interested themselves in his favor, and wished to send him back to his native place to make him bishop of the See now vacant there. This had excited the ill-will of the Patriarch towards him, as the Greek Synod now send none but Greek bishops to the Bulgarians; a Bulgarian bishop is not allowed. If he should be seized, he said, he should be sent into banishment, and he had, therefore, determined to fly to me for protection. I told him, that if he had a difference with the Patriarch, I would go myself to his Holiness and represent the matter, and endeavor to see justice done him, and I was sure that my friendly relations with the Patriarch would secure for him an impartial hearing. This he did not like; he thought he should be seized and sent off without trial. He then proposed that I should take him as a proselyte, promising to be to me a faithful deacon, and to accept fully the faith and customs of my Church. This led to a conversation on the subject of schism, in which I endeavored to show him the evil of it, and to dissuade him from his design. He professed to be enlightened above his countrymen, and I represented to him that he was then the last man who should leave his Church, and pointed out to him the field of usefulness that was before him in his own communion—a field that he must lose if he left his Church, while there was no hope of his usefulness elsewhere. He expressed his surprise at my advice, and suggested that I could as well receive him as other proselytes whom I had admitted. I corrected his mistake on this point, which arose from a natural confounding of persons, and told him that, on the contrary, my earnest advice to him was to remain in his Church and do good. I set before him my relations to the Greek Church, and my acknowledgments of it as the Church of Christ in the East, and the utter inconsistency of my promoting the destruction of that Communion, while I professed to be laboring for its welfare. He did not seem satisfied with this, and I noticed, as I had done throughout the conversation, an uneasiness in his manner and look, which betrayed deep inward vexation. Before I could prevent the act, he threw himself at my feet, and, in the most impassioned tones, begged for money. Protestantism, the Church, schism, were all forgotten in the eager desire for funds. I ordered him to rise, and told him calmly, that as I did not know him I could not give him money; that I was always ready to do anything in my power for my poor brethren in the East; but as I suspected him of being under some ecclesiastical censure, I could not repose confidence in him till I was better informed of his position. I again offered, if he were in trouble, to go with him to the Patriarch; but this he declined, and re-commenced his petitions for money with so excited a manner and such violent gesticulations, that I began to think it unsafe to be alone with him as I was, in a retired part of the house; I therefore insisted on his leaving me, which he finally did, continuing his entreaties and demands till he was fairly out of the door.

May 4th.—Heard from Mossoul. The school had increased to 110 boys, besides several young men who come after their day's work is done, to receive instruction. Kas Michael has the chief control in the school, besides teaching a class of young men at his own house. He has just returned from a visit to Jebel Judi, a mountain north of Jezireh, and N.W. from Mossoul. He says that there are twenty villages there of Chaldeans, who do not acknowledge the Pope, and who remain attached to their old faith. You will perhaps remember, that about a century or less ago, the Church of Mesopotamia, called the Nestorian Church of Mar Elias, was induced to accept the supremacy of the Pope, and has ever since been subject to the Papal See. It has always been supposed, that the whole Church admitted this change; but, during my visit to that country, I discovered that a large portion living in mountains nearly inaccessible, had never been reached by the Papal agents, and continued to this day devoted to the faith of their fathers.

I did not visit them, the state of the country at the time not allowing it; but I then called attention to them. Kas Michael has succeeded in visiting them, and spending some time among them—the scourge of the country, Bedr Khan Bey, having been conquered by the Turkish government and sent into exile. Kas M. went freely among them, preaching the Gospel and teaching from house to house. They received him with the utmost cordiality as one of themselves, for he is of the same nation and holds the same ecclesiastical position with them. He is a Chaldean, protesting against the intrusion and dominion of the Pope. He went from village to village, and was everywhere hailed as a brother, or rather as a father, for they listened to his preaching with reverence and respect. He says that they have great need of schools, and begged him to come among them again and teach them. From his description, and from my own knowledge of them, I should judge them to be an ignorant, simple people, who have continued in their present state for centuries, and have known no change in their faith or worship since the early ages of Christianity. But learning has declined, and religion has retained its hold among them chiefly by the preservative power of a liturgy and Church institutions, as it has in other parts of the country.

May 11th.—Spent part of the day in company with a Papal clergyman. We entered very fully into discussion of the differences between us, but he abandoned one point after another so rapidly, that I was obliged to tell him at last, that he was no true Romanist. I have observed this latitudinarianism in many Roman Catholics with whom I have conversed—a liberality of opinion as inconsistent with the dogmas of Romanism as it is destructive of its exclusive claims. He said, among other things, that he regarded the Pope's supremacy as merely a primacy among equals, and did not allow that he had any right to interfere in the internal affairs of a foreign diocese. I mentioned instances in which he had interfered in the jurisdiction of Eastern Papal Bishops; and he mentioned others in which such interference had been successfully resisted. He said that the Pope had no power to enforce his interference, and when it was opposed, he was compelled to yield. He confined his right to the hearing and judging of causes referred to him for arbitration, and for this purpose he thought a princeps of the Christian Church was useful. This agrees with what was lately said to me by an Oriental Papal Bishop, namely, that he would not suffer the intrusion of the Pope into the internal administration of his diocese. "But if he sends you orders," I said. He replied, "I would not notice them farther than they might relate to the use of monies received from Rome."

May 13th.—An Armenian Vartabed, one of the highest order of priests—the unmarried priests, from which class the bishops are taken, called to see me. He gave me a long account of the state of his diocese in the interior, for this order of priests are often placed over dioceses, performing, however, no distinctively Episcopal duties, and of his own troubles through opposition excited on alleged religious grounds. He was charged, it would seem, with disaffection to his Church, which he declares was merely a pretext for the ill-will of another ecclesiastic with whom he had certain personal differences. He is a man, if I may judge from my former intercourse with him, of advanced views of religious truth. I have corresponded with him during his residence in the interior, and he has been the agent of some of my distributions of books there. He is the same to whom Mr. Miles alludes, in his answer to the Committee's inquiries, in the Spirit of Missions for November and December, 1847, page 419, as the "wild-looking fellow" from Kurdistan, with whom he was so much pleased. He gave me an account of his labors for his people's good. Believing him to be a man whose influence in the interior is important, and who will use it for the promotion of pure and undefiled religion, I determined to assist him. He is here on certain charges unconnected with his religious views, but arising out of his difference with his brother ecclesiastic. Into these matters, I did not feel called upon to enter, but I went, subsequent to the date of this extract, to various individuals of note among the Armenians, who had the power of greatly affecting the decision in his case, and set before them such proofs of his good character as I was able to give; and I will here add, though anticipating the sequence of events, that, upon my last visit to the Patriarch, I had the satisfaction of seeing the Vartabed receive from the Patriarch's hand his renewed credentials, and kneel to take the Episcopal benediction on the eve of his departure to his restored diocese.

GOthic ARCHITECTURE APPLIED TO MODERN RESIDENCES.

Containing the designs for Entrances, Halls, Stairs, and Parlors, &c. &c., the whole illustrated with working and perspective drawings, and forming all the necessary parts of a modern dwelling. By D. H. ARNOT, Architect. New York: D. Appleton & Co.

Although we may not venture to pronounce a critical judgment upon this work of art, yet we may safely say that the designs are well conceived and executed, and the work is one full of valuable information on its very interesting subject. It is to be published in numbers, costing twenty-five cents each.

THE LITERARY WORLD.—A miscellaneous journal, of all matters of interest for the week, connected with books, music, paintings, reports of science, amusements, &c. with original papers, sketches, &c. By distinguished contributors, and a great variety of miscellany and gossip for general readers, with occasional pictorial illustrations. Published by E. A. & G. L. Duyckinck, editors and proprietors, 157 Broadway, New York.

It is from no want of esteem for this excellent literary journal that we have failed to notice the change in its editorial management. Although it has lost much in the retirement of Mr. Hoffman, yet, retaining in part his most valuable assistance, under the able conduct of its present editors, it will sustain the high character and position which it has justly acquired.

THE FOLLOWING IS THE INTRODUCTORY "ADDRESS," PREFIXED TO THE FIRST NUMBER OF THE NEW YORK ECCLESIOLOGIST.

ADDRESS.—The time having arrived designated by the Committee for the appearance of the first number of the New York Ecclesiologist, it is herewith put forth with good hopes, but yet not without fears, arising from many and obvious causes. But the Committee would no longer delay. It is an experiment to which they stand pledged before the Church, and they must abide the issue. If successful, they will feel an honest pride in having led the way to the establishment of a periodical that cannot but tell favorably both on the temporal and spiritual interests of the Church they love; and even though it fail, they will still have at least that satisfaction which comes from boldly daring in a good cause. Though dependent, therefore, on borrowed funds, even for this small outlay of its first number, they go on with a good courage, knowing that the "gold and the silver" are His, to whose glory this, their feeble offering, is now made.

But the financial question, however essential, is not yet the hardest that besets this undertaking. Whether the Church in this country is as yet ready for its support, whether it is not rather anticipating a demand that another century must bring forth—a demand that grows up but by slow degrees, even as the Church itself spreads—and therefore, whether the present interest in such questions is not too narrow a base now to build upon; all these are reasonable doubts, and certainly not without strength, judging at least from the experience of our mother Church of England, which, with her 12,000 parishes and 16,000 clergy, has but just begun adequately to support a similar undertaking. But that comparison suggests another serious difficulty—where shall such a work, with us, find its adequate materials? England, our ancestral land, teems with them; but where shall the American ecclesiologist turn for his subject matter? where shall he find his perfect models, to commend, cathedral, collegiate, or parochial? where his ruined Churches and cloisters to trace out, with that antiquarian zeal which may give to his dry didactic subject all the interest of novelty and discovery? and where, above all, shall he find that widely-diffused Church sympathy in his subject, which is the highest encouragement, as well as the richest reward, that can await the patient laborer in these toils, whether of head, hand, or pen? The ecclesiologist, in England, addresses himself alike to the heart and understanding of 16,000 classically educated ministers of her communion, themselves a noble audience, apart even from her myriad ranks of lay Churchmen, a large proportion of whom are alike zealous, liberal and wealthy. The ecclesiologist in America, on the other hand, has both a narrower and a feebler audience of church clergy—less than 1,500 in number—of whom more than one-half are struggling with such narrow means, that the addition of even the $2 annual subscription to the work, however desired, would be felt by them as a burthen they could not justifiably undertake; while of the laity, professedly belonging to the Church (to whom, although not so confined, this work must mainly look,) how few, comparatively, take any interest in this subject, either spiritually or practically? and of these few, how very few, are fitted, by their previous tastes or studies, to enter intelligently into those scientific questions of church architecture which must obviously, after a time, form the chief material of an ecclesiological journal?

Now we have stated these doubts strongly, because we have felt them deeply; nor are we now clear that the time has actually come for the permanent establishment of such a work. But on one point our faith does stand unshaken, and that is the present need (whatever be the support given it) of some such guiding publication for the interests of the Church, whether in this or other form. Never, in truth, we hold, in the history of Christendom, was there opened a wider or richer field of promise to the ecclesiological teacher, or one more demanding prompt and skilful cultivation. The untamed energies of our land and race, running wild in license, have been hitherto as marked in our church buildings, as in all things else—church edifices have sprung up on all sides, as it were, in a night, and in every possible variety of form and deformity—without type, without model—without principles and without taste—as if the erection were everything and its uses nothing: nor has that era yet passed with us; but still a decided change has of late come over its spirit, and that favorable change is the foundation on which we now build the hoped-for usefulness of our Society and its periodical, whether permanent or temporary. That change is a demand for knowledge. In church buildings, as the case may be, choice is now made of styles or models, and light is asked in choosing them, and curiosity is awakened, and information sought in all questions of church architecture, and men ask with some impatience, Where shall I find it? why is there no church periodical to afford it? and why does not some such arise which shall, at small cost, guide those who are willing to be guided? Such questions are continually put, and no satisfactory answer as yet can be given; while cases are constantly occurring, where, through want of a little wise guidance that would have been thankfully received, the grossest offences against good taste and ancient usage are fallen into in the erection of God's House—errors to be lamented over almost with tears as soon as completed.

But this aspect of the case again brings up a new stumbling-block in our path; viz., that of setting up ourselves as teachers unto the Church, and, with a little brief and superficial knowledge, tarding it over God's heritage. Such is doubtless our invidious position before the Church: yet our answer will be as plain as we think it should be satisfactory. In a certain sense and to a certain degree we admit it must be even so. He who teaches at all must presume that he has some hearers less knowing than himself; otherwise his teaching is to no end. To those ignorant of church architecture, therefore, we are, and propose to be, teachers; and it will be our endeavor and study to be to them sound teachers, giving to them what we ourselves have perhaps but recently learned, yet by opportunities which they have not enjoyed; but still giving it in a spirit that would not justify any invidious term—as being truly in that humble spirit of love and communion which, as it is born at Christ's altar, so does it consecrate to His glory all studies and all teaching that relate to God's House. So much, then, for those unto whom we think, without arrogance, we may pretend to be as teachers, and we only trust that such readers will place in us that reasonable confidence which brother puts in brother, and believe that we will not speak confidently, nor urge zealously any point of church arrangement or architecture without good warrant. This confidence we may at least ask at the hands of our church brethren. But as touching the better instructed in our communion, we wholly repudiate the term: we sit here not as their teachers, but as their fellow-workers, carrying out with them that in which they are equally interested with us; and furnishing them at the same time with an instrument of power such as at present the Church has not—to serve both as a medium of their own sound teaching, and of those varied local wants which so imperatively demand it, and which at present have no organ through which to speak. In such light surely our periodical, however humble, may be recognised even by the most learned of our clergy and laity, as a valuable practical aid; and therefore a helping hand extended to it, neither in pity nor in scorn, but as one of Christ's faithful laborers in his vineyard; and though a volunteer in the work, yet seeking neither private gain nor the praise of man, but His commendation who saith, "well done"—even to him who hath faithfully used his "one talent." If we know ourselves, we stand on this impregnable rock, willing to spend and be spent in our Master's service, in the building up of such temples to His honor and worship as may best accord with the Psalmist's words, "The beauty of holiness."

We recapitulate, in closing what we think may be done through the medium of "The Ecclesiologist," and how?

1. It may be made the "Hand of the Church," to gather up its fragmentary history, now scattered and almost lost, and thus go to build up the archaeology of the American branch of Christ's Church; and to effect this, we urge earnestly upon all its members, zeal in searching for, and care in collecting and remitting in a form for publication, all notices of early church edifices, accompanied, when possible, with plans and measurements.

2. It may be made the "Store-house" of the Church, and the shelves of the Society a receptacle to receive and keep safe, books, drawings, or other documents bearing on these questions, and for which their owners, through love for the Church, would willingly find some safe place of deposit, open to the examination of all churchmen, and free from risk of loss or dispersion. To this end, too, the Editor would respectfully urge its members—the Society's library being already, though small, a valuable one, and to donations looking mainly for its increase.

3. It may be made the "Organ of Intercommunication" in the Church, bringing out its sectional wants and remedies, such as plans wanted or given, doubts and difficulties stated or solved, whether of material, or form or structure; questions of alterations in the renewal of old Churches: together with the fact of collections made, or making, for general or special objects. These certainly are numerous enough, in our rapidly extending Church, to demand a special organ for their publication; and to this end we invite communications.

4. It may be the "Teacher of the Church"—that is, of those who in it need and ask for instruction; but it will be such, not through any special superiority either in Editor or Committee, but through its open columns, concentrating rays of light now scattered. To this end, also, the Editors invite communications, calmly, and carefully, and succinctly prepared, whether on general or special points, or in the form of critical notices of works or buildings.

And lastly, The Ecclesiologist may, through the working of all these means, be made an humble instrument to God's glory in the Church, by awakening men's thoughts to the reverence due to God's House, so often forgotten in this unfeverish age, through the special care to be bestowed upon it in all its minutest parts, and through the deep meanings associated with their forms; and speaking forth from their arrangements; partly through the power of natural symbols, though chiefly, doubtless, from that reverential authority due to early and universal usage; the recognition of which authority is directly involved in the study and love of ecclesiological learning, and is in truth one of the strongest recommendations to it.

We conclude this brief address with the chosen motto of the Society, which, as expressive of the motive that governs it, so will it, we are sure, find an answering response in every churchman's bosom:

TABERNACULA TUA QUAM DILECTA!

NOTE.—Fifteen hundred copies of this number are printed and will be widely distributed. On the answer of this appeal (and a speedy one,) will depend the means of the Committee to continue its publication. The Committee, having done their part, await, as they are bound, the Church's answer. The second number will be issued only to such as remit their name and annual subscription ($2.) addressed to the Treasurer of the Society, WILLIAM A. McVICKAR, No. 8, College Green, New York.

THE BISHOP OF ILLINOIS'S LATE ACCIDENT.—The following official account we take from "THE MOTTO." It is contained in a letter from Bishop Chase to a friend, written soon after his return from a Northern tour of duty during the month of September 1848. In the close of the letter the Bishop says:

"My bodily pains remind me how deep have been the wounds received by two late injuries. Those which I received on the mountains near Bloody Run, Penn., still linger and render, in a measure, useless my right arm, and those very recently received make my breath short and my sleeping moments distressful."

"It was not true that I received my late injury near Springfield. How this mistake was made I know not. Dates, time, place and circumstance belong to God, and should never be meddled with by the printers, or any one else, without the strongest evidence. To 'guess' where they alone should dictate is the way to do harm. History is discomposed by it; and falsehoods are often imposed on posterity of the greatest consequence, by a mistake of a single date. Not that I would attach any thing of importance to any thing relating to myself. The reflection is of a general character, and concerns us all. Be careful as to dates, time, place, or accident; and you will deserve the confidence of your fellow-men."

I was riding out in a dismantled chaise in company with Mr. Roberts, formerly a Methodist minister, now a candidate for holy orders in Jubilee College. "To see God's blessings spring from the bosom of our mother earth" we took a turn through the wide-spreading fields of Indian corn growing ten or twelve feet high on each side of a vista leading from the college Cottage, the residence of the Bishop, to the Robinsons, that "place of note in history!" Just as we were about to pass through the east branch of the Kickapoo creek, a pebbly stream fed by perennial springs, we saw before us a weed some six or seven feet long thrown athwart the well-trodden path as if by accident. It was a thistle of a species which grows very high in this country having long leaves almost white on one side and a dark green on the other; and being twisted, looked, for all the world, like a large snake; or more like two or three snakes together. At sight of this, the horse, a fine spirited animal, sprang, as if lifting all his feet at once, directly out of the road, thereby capsizing the dismantled chaise with its weighty contents. There had been a piece of iron left on the side of the chaise on which the calash once turned, and it was on this iron projecting three or four inches, that my ribs were destined in falling out to come in contact. I heard as well as felt the bones crack as I fell. Mr. Roberts caught my coat as I fell—but all would not save me. The garment was torn and the ribs were broken. Some laborers were at hand, and soon I was lifted up and put into the vehicle and myself guiding the horse to the cottage. This I could do when sitting up, but nothing could exceed the pain when attempting a recumbent posture.

I lost but two or three Sundays when I was able to go to Church and preach again. But no rest could I take in bed.—All the sleep that visited my eyelids for above thirty nights was taken when sitting in my chair. Whenever I attempted to lie down it seemed as if a sword was passing through my breast. This singular state of my health continued even after I set off to fulfil my appointments made in the fourth number of the Motto. On board the canal boat, through the singular kindness of the captain, I took my first nap in a recumbent posture. The same piercing pain afterwards returned, but not of so long duration. The Rev. Mr. Kelley welcomed me to Ottaway, where I preached in a convenient building. The new church not being finished, but progressing, I passed directly to Chicago.

Diocesan Intelligence.

NEW JERSEY.—CONFIRMATION.—On Sunday, 24 September, (fourteenth after Trinity) in the Chapel of the Holy Innocents, at St. Mary's Hall, at the early Morning Service, the Bishop confirmed three persons. The Prayers were read by the Rev. Mr. Germain, the Principal, and the Preface in the Confirmation Service, by the Rev. Andrew Bell Paterson.

ORDINATION.—On Ember Sunday, 24 September, (fourteenth after Trinity) in St. Mary's Church, Burlington, the Rev. Mr. Bradin read Morning Prayers, and the Bishop admitted William W. Lord, A.M., to the order of Deacons, and administered the Holy Communion, assisted by the Rev. Mr. Germain. The candidate was presented by the Rev. Andrew Bell Paterson, who also made the exhortation; and the Epistle was read by the Rev. Dr. Ver Mehr. The Rev. Messrs. Frost, and Parks (of the diocese of New York) were present.

SERVICES OF THE VISITATION.—On Tuesday morning, 3 October, in St. Paul's Church, Hoboken, the Bishop preached, confirmed three persons, and administered the Holy Communion, assisted by the Rector, the Rev. Mr. Burnham. In the afternoon, the Bishop read prayers, and examined the children, after they had been catechised by the Rector.

On Wednesday, 4, in Trinity Church, Newark, the Bishop preached and administered the Holy Communion. In the afternoon, the Rector administered adult baptism, and catechised the children; who were then examined by the Bishop. In the evening, the Rector administered adult baptism, and the Bishop preached, and confirmed twenty-eight persons.

On Thursday, 5, the Bishop consecrated Grace Church, Newark, (the second erected by the parishioners; the former being deemed inadequate.) The instrument of donation was presented to the Bishop by the Senior Warden, Jeremiah C. Garthwaite, Esq., and read by the Rector, the Rev. Mr. Watson. The Sentence of Consecration was read by the Rev. Dr. Ogilby. The Rev. Messrs. Henderson, Williams and Thompson read morning prayer. The Bishop preached, and administered the Holy Communion, assisted by the Rector and the Rev. Messrs. Lowell and Roberts; the Rev. Mr. Clarkson reading the Epistle.

In the evening, in the old Grace Church, the services of the visitation to Christ Free Mission Church, not yet provided with a building, were held. The children were catechised by the Missionary, and examined by the Bishop; who also preached, and confirmed eight persons.

On Friday, 6, in the Chapel of Grace Church, Van Vorst, the Bishop preached, confirmed eight persons, and administered the Holy Communion. In the afternoon, the children were catechised by the Rector, and examined by the Bishop.

In the evening in St. Matthew's Church, Jersey City, the Bishop preached, and confirmed eight persons. On Saturday, 7, the Rev. Mr. Aldis read morning prayers, and catechised the children, and the Bishop examined them, and administered the Holy Communion, assisted by the Rector.

In the evening, in St. John's Church, Elizabethtown, the Bishop preached, and confirmed two persons. On Sunday, 8, (sixteenth after Trinity,) the Rector catechised the children, and the Bishop examined them, preached, admitted the Rev. Henry McVickar, Deacon, of the diocese of New York, (at the request of the Standing Committee of that diocese,) to the order of Priests, and administered the Holy Communion.

In the afternoon in a temporary place of worship, at Elizabethport, the Bishop preached.

In the evening, in St. Paul's Church, Rahway, the Rector, the Rev. Mr. Peet, catechised the children and the Bishop examined them, preached, and confirmed six persons. On Monday, 9, the Bishop preached and administered the Holy Communion.

In the afternoon, in Trinity Church, Woodbridge, the Bishop read prayers and preached.

In the evening, in St. Peter's Church, Perth Amboy, the Bishop preached. On Tuesday, 10, the Bishop catechised the children, confirmed one person, and administered the Holy Communion.

In the evening, in Christ Church, New Brunswick, the Bishop preached and confirmed twenty-three, (making, with one in private twenty-four) persons, in this parish. On Wednesday, 11, the Rector catechised the children, and the Bishop administered the Holy Communion.

In the evening, in St. James' Church, Piscatawa, the Bishop preached.

On Thursday, 12, in St. Peter's Church, Spotswood, the Rector elect catechised the children, and the Bishop examined them, preached, and administered the Holy Communion.

On Saturday, 14, at Burlington, the Bishop confirmed one sick person in private.

On Sunday, 15, (seventeenth after Trinity,) in the old Grace Church, Newark, occupied by the congregation of St. Matthew's Church, the Rev. Messrs. Henderson and Frost read morning prayer, in German; the Rev. Mr. Frost catechised the children and preached in German, and the Bishop confirmed one person, and administered the Holy Communion.

In the afternoon, in the temporary place of worship occupied by St. Philip's Church, the Bishop preached, and confirmed seven persons.

In the evening, in the temporary place of worship, occupied as St. Paul's Free Mission Church, the Missionary, the Rev. Mr. Roberts, read prayers, and catechised the children, and the Bishop examined them, preached, and confirmed two persons; one from Christ Free Mission Church, and one of the diocese of Fredericton.

On Monday evening, 16, in Christ Church, Newton, the Bishop preached. On Tuesday, 17, the Rector read morning prayer, and catechised the children, and the Bishop examined them, preached, confirmed five persons, and administered the Holy Communion.

On Wednesday, 18, (St. Luke the Evangelist,) the Bishop consecrated St. Thomas' Church, Vernon. The request to consecrate was read by the Rector elect, the Rev. Mr. Potter, and the sentence of consecration by the Rev. Mr. Dunn. The Rev. Mr. Sherman read morning prayers, and the Bishop administered infant baptism, confirmed seven persons, preached, and administered the Holy Communion.

On Thursday, 19, in St. Luke's Church, Hope, the Bishop preached, confirmed three persons, and administered the Holy Communion, assisted by the Missionary, the Rev. Mr. Clarkson.

In the afternoon, at St. James' Church, Knowlton, the Missionary, the Rev. Mr. Clarkson, catechised the children, and the Bishop examined them, preached and confirmed three (making with one in private four) persons.

In the evening, in Zion Church, Belvidere, the Missionary, the Rev. Mr. Clarkson, administered adult baptism, and the Bishop preached, and confirmed one person.

On Friday, 20, in the afternoon, in Calvary Church, Flemington, the Bishop preached, and confirmed one person.

In the afternoon, the Rector read prayers, and catechised the children, and the Bishop examined them. In the evening, the Bishop preached, and confirmed sixteen persons.

On Monday, 23, in St. Peter's Church, Morristown, the Bishop preached, and administered the Holy Communion. In the afternoon, the Rector elect administered adult baptism, and catechised the children, and the Bishop examined them. In the evening the Bishop preached, and confirmed thirteen (making, with one in private fourteen) persons.

On Saturday afternoon, 28, (St. Simon and St. Jude) in Christ Church, Belleville, the Bishop preached. In the evening, the Bishop preached and confirmed seven persons.

On Sunday, 29, (nineteenth after Trinity) in St. Paul's Church, Paterson, the Bishop preached, and administered the Holy Communion. In the afternoon, the Bishop administered adult and infant baptism, and examined the children, after they had been catechised by the Rector. In the evening, the Bishop preached, and confirmed nineteen persons.—The Missionary.

New York.—TRINITY PARISH.—The Rev. John Henry Hobart has been called to this parish, for a year, to fill the vacancy occasioned by the absence of the Rev. Jona. M. Wainwright, who has gone to Europe for his health. The Rev. Benjamin I. Haight has also been called for another year from the 1st instant, to the same parish in consequence of the feeble health of the Rev. P. Parks, who has scarcely recovered from a protracted and very enfeebling illness. Both these gentlemen are well known, both highly and deservedly esteemed, and their selection will prove, we do not doubt, most acceptable to the entire parish.—Cour. & Eng.

Connecticut.—CONSECRATION OF ST. JAMES' CHURCH, WINDSTED, CT.—On All Saints Day, at half past 10, A. M., Bishop Brownell, attended by fourteen Priests clothed in white robes, proceeded from the house of Ex-Governor Hallbird to the church, where, after the services of consecration, Morning Prayer was commenced by the Rev. Mr. Nichols, of Salisbury. The Rev. J. Williams, D.D., President of Trinity College, Hartford, read the Lessons; the Rev. Mr. Chauncey of Hartford, said Prayers; the Rev. Dr. Fuller, of Litchfield, recited the ante-Communion service; the Rev. M. Frisbee, of Bethlehem, read the Epistle; and the Bishop the Gospel. The sermon was preached by the Rev. A. C. Coxe, of St. John's Church, Hartford which, while it fully sustained the reputation of its author, was truly a discourse 'for the times, and all time.' The text was Genesis, 28th chapter, 17th verse. After sermon, four persons were confirmed. Considered as a whole, the services of the day were such, as even Churchmen are seldom privileged to enjoy.

The newly consecrated edifice is of the Gothic style, admirable in its proportions, and finished in a manner that reflects credit upon all who have been engaged in its construction. It stands as a monument of what one association may accomplish, when their energies are united in such a labor of love for His name's sake. Nor is this all that it is doing; for, in addition to their other charities, the parishes in that county have not only contributed largely to the building of St. James' Church, but do actually give $300 per annum towards the Rector's salary. If all associations would thus feel and act, our Church would indeed arise and shine, while the waste places in our land would 'rejoice together before the Lord.' That such may be the spirit and its fruits in our own diocese, is the prayer of your brother. Christian Witness.

Maryland.—CONSECRATION.—On Tuesday, October the 10th, St. Paul's Church, Prince Frederick, in St. Paul's Parish, Calvert county, was solemnly consecrated to the service of Almighty God by the Bishop of the diocese. The deed of donation and request to consecrate was read by the Rev. Francis R. Hanson, the Rector, of the parish, and the sentence of consecration by the Rev. Edward Livermore of the diocese of New York. Morning Prayer was said by the Rev. Henry Williams, Rector of All Saints parish, and the lessons read by the Rev. Meyer Lewin, Rector of Christ Church Parish. The Bishop preached, and administered the Holy Eucharist.

St. Paul's Church was finished some two or three years ago, having then been erected in the county town for the newly organized parish of the same name. It has ever since been used for sacred purposes, but a small remaining debt, now first settled, hindered its consecration. The settlement of that debt is one among many gratifying evidences of the present prosperous condition of the parish.

CONFIRMATIONS.—On Friday, October 13th, in the unfinished church at Woodville, in St. Paul's Parish, Prince George county, six persons.

On Saturday, the 14th, in the parish church of the same parish, three persons.

On the Seventeenth Sunday after Trinity, in the chapel of the same parish, (known as "Page's Chapel,") six persons. (one colored.) On the afternoon of the same day, in Trinity Church, Upper Marlborough six persons.

On Monday, the 16th, in St. Barnabas' Church, Queen Ann Parish, Prince George county, ten persons (seven colored.)

On Tuesday, the 17th, in Trinity Church, Holy Trinity Parish, Prince George county, two persons.

On Thursday, the 19th, in St. John's Church, Howard District six persons.

On the Eighteenth Sunday after Trinity, October 22d, in the morning, in the Church of the Ascension, Washington, D. C., nine persons.

In the afternoon, in St. John's Church, Georgetown, D. C., five persons.

CONVOCATION.—The Convocation of Ann Arundel county, held a stated meeting in St. John's Church, Queen Caroline parish on Wednesday, the Feast of St. Luke, and Thursday the 19th.

The Rev. Messrs. Aisquith, (President,) and Harrison (Secretary,) Clark, Moore and R. H. Waters, were present and assisting in the services. On Wednesday, the Convocation sermon was preached by the Rev. Mr. Aisquith, and the Bishop administered the Holy Communion. On Thursday, the Rector of the Church administered Holy Baptism to an adult and two children, and the Bishop preached and confirmed.—Church Times.

SPRING HILL PARISH, SOMERSET CO.—Extract from a letter, dated, "Salisbury, September 17th, 1848."—"This is in Spring Hill Parish a sort of festival: it being the time for the semi-annual sermon before the Claggett Society—a period when we review what God has wrought for the Church and through the Church since Colonial days.

"Divine service was celebrated in the regular course at St. Paul's Church, Spring Hill, (our parish church) at ten this morning. After the Second Lesson the children surrounded the chancel and were catechised and addressed by their Pastor. After the Holy Gospel the 105th hymn was sung and a discourse preached appropriate to the day, from Ps. 112: 9. "The righteous" &c.; at the conclusion of which we were earnestly exhorted to remember in our prayers at the Holy Communion, about to be celebrated, the present Bishop of the diocese, that he may long be continued among us, to rule and feed the Church of God.

"In the evening, divine service was held at half past three o'clock in St. Peter's Church, in this place, and the semi-annual sermon for the Claggett Society was preached from Heb. 13: 7. 8. At night, the service was again performed in St. Peter's, and the first Lecture of the Annual Claggett course was delivered. The text was Eph. 3: 14, 15; the subject, 'The Church, the Family of God through the mediation of Jesus Christ.' The second Lecture is promised for St. Matthew's night (Sept. 21.)

"We expect to have our bell in about two weeks: it is to weigh six hundred pounds, and will be hung temporarily in a suitable frame with covering. The chancel of our church has been greatly improved, by substituting plain stone colors for the ill done oak graining. It is now in harmony with the rest of the church. The pillars have also changed their very sombre hue."

"The church from the 17th is to be open every day from 6 A. M. to 12, for such as desire to use it as 'the house of prayer.' The minister is to be found in his study under its roof in those hours, unless hindered by sickness, or absent on parochial duty. Quantico and Spring Hill churches are both to be painted. The former is to have a belfry and bell."

THE COLLEGE OF ST. JAMES.—Extract of a Letter. "On my way home I took occasion to visit St. James's College in order to place my son there as a pupil, and the appearance of things more than equalled my favorable expectations. From much that I have seen, and more that I enquired, it appears to me clear that institutions of learning will be patronised by those even merely professing to belong to the Church, in proportion as the basis of tuition is decidedly in the direction of the doctrines and principles of the Church, and that the spirit which would suit all is the spirit that will gain and reconcile none."

ST. JOHN'S INSTITUTE.—A correspondent sends us the following extract of a letter received from an intimate friend.—"I was very much pleased with all I saw and heard of Mr. Ten Broeck's school. His boys were exceedingly gentle-mannered and well-behaved—fully as much so, I think, as those of St. James's or St. Timothy's, and that is saying a good deal. Their demeanor and performance in the services were admirable. All the chants were excellently executed, and two of the boys, ———, and Mr. ———'s son, alternate in officiating as organists. All that is wanting to J. is an increase of scholars, to have an establishment in most respects equal, and in some even superior to our other schools.—Mr. ——— has the garden under his management; and a very fine garden he has—large, and apparently well managed and productive.—As for the site, nothing can surpass it. I do not remember, any where, a more admirable prospect than that enjoyed from the front of the house; and there are at least half a dozen varieties of it, obtainable from different spots on the grounds. It has all the elements of landscape in perfection—seven miles of a large river, chains of hills, plains, distant ridges of mountains, woods, fields, gardens, a large city and great variety of noble buildings, distant enough to receive the enchantment which distance lends to the view, and near enough to be quite distinguishable,—all brought within compass of a well bounded horizon and in a compact circular display."—We are informed that since the foregoing was written, the Institute has received such an accession of scholars, as to leave only three or four remaining vacancies.—Church Times.

CONFIRMATIONS.—In All Faith Parish Church, St. Mary's county, on Friday, October 27th seven persons.

In Christ Church, Chaptico, King and Queen Parish, on Saturday, the Feast of St. Simon and St. Jude, one person.

In St. Andrew's Parish Church, on Sunday, the Nineteenth after Trinity, three persons.

In All Saints' Church, Tomaccoquen, King and Queen Parish, on Monday, October the 30th, six persons.

On Wednesday, the Feast of All Saints, in St. George's Chapel, William and Mary Parish, St. Mary's county, six persons.

On Thursday, November 2d, in Trinity Church, in the same parish, seven persons.

On Sunday, the twentieth after Trinity, in the morning, in St. Stephen's Church, Baltimore, three persons.

In the afternoon, in Cranmer Chapel, Baltimore, ten persons.

South Carolina.—ORDINATION.—On Sunday 22d Oct., at St. Thaddeus, Aiken, Charles Theodore Bland was admitted to the Holy Order of Deacons. The Sermon was by the Rev. C. H. Hall; Morning Prayer was by the Rector, (Rev. J. H. Cornish,) who also presented the candidate.

CONFIRMATION.—This holy rite was administered at St. Michael's Church, on All Saints day, Nov. 1st, to 76 persons—53 white and 23 colored members of the Protestant Episcopal Churches in Charleston.

ORANGEBURG, So. CA.—Extract of a letter dated 21st Oct.—"Notice having been given to that purpose, at a respectable meeting of gentlemen of this village, Addison Beach was appointed Chairman, and Henry Ellis, Esq., Secretary. It was then resolved to organize an Episcopal Church, under the name of the "Church of the Holy Trinity, Orangeburg." The following gentlemen were then elected Vestrymen and Wardens, —Dr. S. B. Dwight, Chairman; Thomas S. Mood and John Marchant, Wardens; Hon. John M. Felder, Capt. John C. Row, John H. Felder, Esq., A. F. Mervino, T. B. Whaly, and Henry Ellis, Treasurer, and Addison Beach, Secretary. A Committee was then appointed to raise funds and select a site for a Church building, and report their proceedings at the next meeting of the Vestry. On motion, it was Resolved, That the Rev. R. D. Shindler be added to the Vestry. The Vestry then proceeded to elect a Rector, when the Rev. R. D. Shindler was unanimously appointed, who being present, and informed of his election, accepted the care of said Church. It was next resolved, That the Secretary inform the Bishop of South Carolina of their proceedings, and request him to take the "Church of the Holy Trinity, Orangeburg," under his Episcopal care and jurisdiction."—*Charleston Gos. CAPITAL PUNISHMENT.—In consequence of the growing increase of crime in our State since the abolition of capital punishment, and a particular manifestation of it to the Grand Jurors of Wayne county, by the presence of three different individuals charged with murder, at the present term of Court, we understand they have unanimously adopted a memorial to the Legislature asking for a restoration of that penalty which alone prevents man from assailing the life of his fellow. We are glad to make this announcement, and trust it will lead to the adoption of similar measures on the part of every Grand Jury in the State. Life, with us, has already become but a trifle, and, for a paltry ten dollars, there are those among us who hesitate not to murder.—Detroit Advertiser.

Death!

Death rides upon the summer air!
And steals around her bowers;
His hollow form is everywhere,
In this wide world of ours.

He's out upon the stormy deep,
Coursing the waves at play;
He frowns upon the infant's sleep,
And smites the maiden gay!

In palace halls of glorious light,
Where song and music float!
He lurks with loathsome form to blight,
With hideous eye to gloat!

And in the lowly cottage bower,
Where joy is humble—meek—
Aye, even there is felt his power,
He there doth vengeance reek.

But Death! tho' thou dost ride the wind,
And walk the flowery sod!
Thou art not fearful to the mind,
That trusteth in its God!

Nurture.*

BY THE RT. REV. G. W. DOANE, D.D., LL.D.

Exodus, ii. 9.—Take this child away, and nurse it for me; and I will give thee thy wages.

It is at noon upon the Nile. A Hebrew woman wanders there, and weeps. She gathers of the bulrushes, that wave upon its brink; and wets her burthen with her tears. It is Jochebed, Amram's wife, the mother of Miriam and of Aaron; and as yet, of one dearer than both, the secret child of silence and of sorrow. Pharaoh has charged his people, that every son, born of a Hebrew mother, shall be drowned. The goodly infant has been hid three months. The next day, inquisition will be made in every Hebrew house; and even a mother's love will not suffice to save him. Alas, alas, Jochebed!

It is midnight on the Nile. A mourning mother weeps upon her babe. She has arrayed him in his choicest robe. She has lavished upon him the rarest of her store. She has fed him, for the last time, from her bursting breast. She has lulled him, for the last time, to his serene repose. She has imprinted her last kiss upon his brow. She has lent it the consecration of her tears. And, with a mother's trust, that so much innocence, and so much loveliness, cannot be quite forsaken of her God, she lays the frail and buoyant ark, which her own hands have framed, with blessings upon every joint, in the tall flags, beside the river's brink. Alas, alas, Jochebed!

It is morning on the Nile. Upon the river's side, a royal maiden loiters, with her virgin train. They lave their shrinking feet in the cool stream. They launch the sacred lotus on its wave. In frolic mirth, they toss its silver spray. The thoughtful princess, as she wanders by herself, descries the floating ark. She sends for it. She opens it. She sees the child. It weeps. She has a woman's heart, and it is melted at the infant's tears. She has a woman's heart, and it takes in, at once, the whole sad story of Hebrew slavery and suffering. Alas, alas, Jochebed!

But when was faith forsaken? When were the sacred tears, with which a mother bathed her child, unnoticed of the Lord? When were a mother's prayers not heard? A sister's heart had yearned upon the babe. She saw the ark, where it was laid. She stood aside, to watch its fate; and, when the royal maid had found and rescued it, she was at hand, with love's instinctive promptitude, to seek and find a nurse. "Then said his sister to Pharaoh's daughter, shall I go and call to thee a nurse of the Hebrew women, that she may nurse the child for thee? And Pharaoh's daughter said to her, Go. And the maid went, and called the child's mother." Was ever poet's dream to equal this? Was ever mother's grief so turned to joy? Was ever woman's heart so filled and overflowed with gladness? "And Pharaoh's daughter said unto her, Take this child away, and nurse it for me; and I will give thee thy wages. And the woman took the child"—it is the child himself, that makes the record, with a simplicity that only nature's self could be contented with, and art would overdo, and spoil—"the woman took the child, and nursed it." Joy, joy, to Jochebed!

* Answering to the beautiful Print of "Pharaoh's Daughter."

What a lesson of the vicissitudes of life! Amram and Jochebed were of the priestly line of Levi. Their lot was cast in those serene and guarded precincts of the house of God; where, if on earth, contentment should be found. Blessings had multiplied upon their love. The thoughtful Aaron and the joyous Miriam were as olive branches at their side; and, soon, another was to smile upon their joy. But Israel is too prosperous for Egypt. The blessings, which God sends upon His captive children, move the envy of their masters. They make their lives bitter with hard bondage; and, when they prosper still the more for their afflictions, the decree is passed, that every man-child shall be slain. Then, with what new anxiety is nature's trial-hour expected! Then, with what dread, that quickens every pulse into a nerve, the issue apprehended! Then, what a pang, to crush the heart of father and of mother, the tidings, that should, else, be full of joy! And, what a record, that, of slavery and shame; "when she saw him, that he was a goodly child, she hid him three months." So little is man's estimate of life to be relied on. So do its choicest blessings become fountains, to the heart, of care, solicitude, and sorrow.

What a lesson of the providence of God! Behold that fragile ark, twined by a woman's hand, of bulrushes, and daubed with slime and pitch. See it deposited among the flags, upon the river's brink. Think of the swellings of the Nile. Think of the prowling wolves, and ravening hyenas. Think of the treacherous crocodile. Consider, that the tenant of that frail receptacle, exposed to such variety of deaths, is an infant of but three months old. How speedy, how inevitable, the destruction! But no! It may not be. That sleeping child is God's deliverer for captive Israel. And Noah was not safer, when his ark of gopher-wood was made the refuge of a race, than Moses, in his ark of bulrushes. And, by what wondrous means! The footsteps of a royal princess and her train, are turned, that moment, towards the guarded spot. The daughter of their oppressor becomes the saviour of the captive nation. Jochebed's son falls into the only hands that could have rescued him from death. Her daughter is at hand, to shape the wonderful result. And the poor trembler, that had laid him in what seemed to be his coffin, is the same, that, trembling even more, for love and joy, now takes him from his hiding-place, to nurse him for the daughter of a king. How can we ever doubt, with cases such as this before us, that every thing is possible with God? What too small for His considerate mercy, or too great for His almighty power? He calleth the stars by their names. And, yet, He numbereth every hair of every head.

And what a lesson of the security of faith! It was a bold venture to disregard the king's commandment, and hide the child three months; but it was made in faith, St. Paul has taught us, and so was safe. It was a bold venture, to commit a helpless infant in a frail basket, to the waters of the Nile; but it was done in faith, and it was safe. Nay, it was more than safe. Not only was it so, that Moses should be saved alive; Jochebed, by the royal pleasure, made the nurse of her own son; and joy and gladness shed upon the darkened house of Amram. It was only so—to speak, as men can see—that Moses could be fully fitted for his high and sacred trust. How else could he be "learned in all the wisdom of the Egyptians?" How else could he achieve that glory, which St. Paul ascribes to him, of disinterested virtue, in refusing, when he came to years, "to be called the son of Pharaoh's daughter?" How else could he set forth that noble pattern of unpurchaseable patriotism, in "choosing rather to suffer affliction with the people of God, than to enjoy the pleasures of sin for a season?" How else could he have reached that loftiest height of Christian perfectness, in "esteeming the reproach of Christ greater riches than the treasures of Egypt?" as the Apostles, beaten for the Cross, "rejoiced that they were counted worthy to suffer shame for His name." The ventures of true faith are thus transcendent triumphs. To suffer with Christ is to reign with Him. His Cross insures His crown. "Be thou faithful unto death, and I will give thee a crown of life."

I might pursue, almost without a limit, my enumeration of the lessons, which this speaking Scripture teaches. But your own hearts will suggest them; and God will bless your thoughtful meditation on His holy Word, to the increase of wisdom and the furtherance of faith. In what remains, I rather dwell upon a single aspect of the story; and briefly follow, to some portion of its just conclusions, the language of the text: "Take this child away, and nurse it for me; and I will give thee thy wages."

It suggests the helplessness of little children. Nothing living is so helpless as a little child. "It is crushed before the moth." The first thought that comes with it, anticipated long before, is that of the daughter of Jochebed; of a nurse, of watching, and of care. And how much it calls for! And for how long! To be fed; to be tended; to be cared for, in a thousand ways: awake, asleep, in sickness, in health. Is there a trust more sacred, is there an office more delicate, is there a responsibility more serious, than that which the word, nurse, implies and comprehends? Happiest, and holiest, and surest of a blessing, when, like favoured Jochebed, the mother is the nurse. And, for the wages, which the royal maiden promised! If toil, and care, and pain, and watching, and anxiety, that never intermits, and cannot be relieved, or delegated, or divided, be the mark, what could be equal to the task? While, if the heart be in it, and its life be love, what overpayment, in ten thousand ways, of all that love can prompt, and life can yield! The rounding limb; the opening feature; the elastic spring; new speculation in the eye; new music in the dove-like cooing of the inarticulate voice; new gleamings of the mind; new openings to the heart; new glimpses of the spiritual and the immortal! How gracious and benign the providential ordering, that makes "little children," types to us of heaven; and draws us, by them, as with cords of love, towards a purer and a better world. "Verily I say unto you, whosoever shall not receive the kingdom of God as a little child, he shall not enter therein."

But, full of tenderness, and high in sacred trust, as is the nurture of the infant, it is but the shadow of that which falls upon the heart of parents, teachers, pastors, in the training of the child. There cannot be a text more pregnant, more impressive, more exacting, than the words of holy Paul, to the Ephesian parents; "bring them up in the nurture and admonition of the Lord." They tell us of the soul. They tell us of its fearful alienation from the God who made it. They tell us of the obstacles which hinder its return; of the tendencies within, by which it gravitates towards eternal ruin; of the unseen foes, which, from the cradle, dog its track, and, to the grave, pursue their prey. They tell us, that, as the harvest, so the garner; as the seed-time, so the harvest; as the spring, so the full circle of the eternal year. And if they left us thus, they would pronounce a blessing upon childlessness, and make the grave more gracious for our children than the cradle. But the divine Creator knows our frame, and cares for all its wants. He leaves us not un comforted, in any of the trusts, and trials, which He lays upon our hearts. In every duty, and in every danger, of our lives, He meets us with His love. The "blessings of the breasts and of the womb" are blessings which take in the soul, and go with it into eternity. None of His promises are more explicit than those which sanction the religious care of children. His praise of Abraham turns expressly on his domestic piety: "I know him, that he will command his children and his household after him; and they shall keep the way of the Lord, to do justice and judgment." Nothing can be more positive than that which He declares by Solomon: "Train up a child in the way he should go; and when he is old he will not depart from it." And the benign and gracious Saviour, while He won, by every charm and charity of love, the "little children" to Himself, opened a world of comfort and encouragement, to hearts of parents, and of teachers, and of pastors, in those mysterious words: "I say unto you, in heaven, their angels do always behold the face of my Father, Which is in heaven."

The Christian parent, that desires salvation for his children, need not greatly fear. God has provided, in His Church, all needful helps and means, to gain, through grace, that great and gracious end. There stands the Font, with its regenerating wave, to wash him from his primal sin, and give him back, new-born, "of water and of the Spirit." There ever sounds, in tones of ancient piety, a mother's voice in her dear children's ears, the simple, yet majestic Catechism. There at the chancel-rail, the pastor of the pastors waits, with hands outstretched, to hear the meek renewal of his infant vows, and sign him with the seal of the Divine and Holy Spirit, and commend him to the cares, and toils, and trials of the life that lies before him, with the blessing of the Holy One. There, in the Bread and Wine which He ordained and blessed, the Saviour gives Himself, to every faithful heart. There the life-giving Word is ever vocal, with its lessons of truth, its counsels of wisdom, and its promises of peace. There in a voice that rolls up, round and full, from the deep caverns of the past, the faith once delivered to the old saints, is uttered, in the Creeds, which martyrs moistened with their blood. There, in a ceaseless round, the prayers are offered which have promise—from the gracious One, Who comes where ever "two or three" are gathered in His name—of answer and fulfilment. And, from every consecrated stone, and every charmed spot, and every word of faith, and penitence, and praise, as from His garment's hem, when in the flesh, virtue comes forth, to heal to strengthen and to bless, to all who kneel to Him, in meek obedient faith. Only be faithful, my beloved brethren, in your use of these divine provisions, for the training of your children in the way in which they ought to go, and He will make His promise sure. Only bring up your children "in the nurture and admonition of the Lord." And He will take and own them to be His forever. "Take this child away," He says, Who gave it to you first, "and nurse it for Me, and I will give thee thy wages." But you must nurse it for God, you must nurse it for immortality, you must nurse it for heaven. You must bring it up, "in the nurture and admonition of the Lord."

And, for myself, to whom so many parents have intrusted the nurslings of their love,* the Church still seems to say to me,

* There are nearly three hundred children at St. Mary's Hall and Burlington College; besides the children of the Sunday School, and the Parish School.

From the Literary World.

The Puritan.

SKETCHED BY MACAULAY.

The interest which the passages from Mr. Macaulay's forthcoming English History, published in the Literary World, have created through the country, induces us again to lay before our readers a few characteristic pages, devoted to the Puritans, for which we acknowledge our indebtedness to the Messrs. Harper, the publishers. Sentences thus taken at random almost, are hardly to be argued from in the absence of the context. Mr. Macaulay's Defence of the Puritan, quoted in almost every school book, stands firmly for one side of the question; the present exhibition is of the same character in some of its less amiable lights. It is taken from the introductory summary of events preparatory to the main object of the work, the History of England since the Revolution of 1688.

While a section of the Anglican clergy quitted, in one direction, the position which they had originally occupied, a section of the Puritan body departed, in a direction diametrically opposite from the principles and practices of their fathers. The persecution which the separatists had undergone had been severe enough to irritate, but not severe enough to destroy. They had not been tamed into submission, but baited into savageness and stubbornness. After the fashion of oppressed sects, they mistook their own vindictive feelings for emotions of piety, encouraged in themselves by reading and meditation a disposition to brood over their wrongs, and, when they had worked themselves up into hating their enemies, imagined that they were only hating the enemies of heaven. In the New Testament there was little indeed which, even when perverted by the most disingenuous exposition, could seem to countenance the indulgence of malevolent passions. But the Old Testament contained the history of a race selected by God to be witnesses of his unity and ministers of his vengeance, and specially commanded by Him to do many things which, if done without His special command, would have been atrocious crimes. In such a history it was not difficult for fierce and gloomy spirits to find much that might be distorted to suit their wishes. The extreme Puritans, therefore, began to feel for the Old Testament a preference, which, perhaps, they did not distinctly avow even to themselves; but which showed itself in all their sentiments and habits. They paid to the Hebrew language a respect which they refused to that tongue in which the discourses of Jesus and the epistles of Paul have come down to us. They baptized their children by the names, not of Christian saints, but of Hebrew patriarchs and warriors. In defiance of the express and reiterated declarations of Luther and Calvin, they turned the weekly festival by which the church had, from the primitive times, commemorated the resurrection of her Lord, into a Jewish Sabbath. They sought for principles of jurisprudence in the Mosaic law, and for precedents to guide their ordinary conduct in the books of Judges and Kings. Their thoughts and discourse ran much on acts which were assuredly not recorded as examples for our imitation. The prophet who hewed in pieces a captive king, the rebel general who gave the blood of a queen to the dogs, the matron, who, in defiance of plighted faith, and of the laws of eastern hospitality, drove the nail into the brain of the fugitive ally who had just fed at her board, and who was sleeping under the shadow of her tent, were proposed as modes to Christian suffering under the tyranny of princes and prelates. Morals and manners were subjected to a code resembling that of the synagogue when the synagogue was in its worst state. The dress, the deportment, the language, the studies, the amusements of the rigid sect were regulated on principles resembling those of the Pharisees who, proud of their washed hands and broad phylacteries, taunted the Redeemer as a sabbath-breaker and a wine bibber. It was a sin to hang garlands on a Maypole, to drink a friend's health, to fly a hawk, to hunt a stag, to play at chess, to wear love-locks, to put starch into a ruff, to touch the virginals, to read the Fairy Queen. Rules such as these, rules which would have appeared insupportable to the free and joyous spirit of Luther, and contemptible to the serene and philosophical intellect of Zwingle, threw over all life a more than monastic gloom. The learning and eloquence by which the great reformers had been eminently distinguished, and to which they had been, in no small measure, indebted for their success, were regarded by the new school of Protestants with suspicion, if not with aversion. Some precisians had scruples about teaching the Latin grammar because the names of Mars, Bacchus and Apollo occurred in it. The fine arts were all but proscribed. The solemn peal of the organ was superstitious. The light music of Ben Jonson's masques was dissolute. Half the fine paintings in England were idolatrous, and the other half indecent. The extreme Puritan was at once known from other men by his gait, his garb, his lank hair, the sour solemnity of his face, the upturned white of his eyes, the nasal twang with which he spoke, and above all by his peculiar dialect. He employed, on every occasion, the imagery and style of Scripture. Hebraisms violently introduced into the English language, and metaphors borrowed from the boldest lyric poetry of a remote age and country and applied to the common concerns of English life, were the most striking peculiarities of this cant, which moved, not without cause, the derision both of prelatists and libertines.

The Puritans in the day of their power had undoubtedly given cruel provocation. They ought to have learned, if from nothing else, yet from their own discontents, from their own struggles, from their own victory, from the fall of that proud hierarchy by which they had been so heavily oppressed, that, in England, and in the seventeenth century, it was not in the power of the civil magistrate to drill the minds of men into conformity with his own system of theology. They proved, however, as intolerant and as meddling as ever Laud had been. They interdicted under heavy penalties the use of the Book of Common Prayer, not only in churches, but even in private houses. It was a crime in a child to read by the bedside of a sick parent one of those beautiful collects which had soothed the griefs of forty generations of Christians. Severe punishments were denounced against such as should presume to blame the Calvinistic mode of worship. Clergymen of respectable character were not only ejected from their benefices by thousands, but were frequently exposed to the outrages of a fanatical rabble. Churches and sepulchres, fine works of art and curious remains of antiquity, were brutally defaced. The parliament resolved that all pictures in the royal collection which contained representations of Jesus or of the Virgin Mother should be burned. Sculpture fared as ill as painting. Nymphs and Graces, the work of Ionian chisels, were delivered over to Puritan stone-masons to be made decent.

Perhaps no single circumstance more strongly illustrates the temper of the precisians than their conduct respecting Christmas day. Christmas had been from time immemorial the season of joy and domestic affection, the season when families assembled, when children came home from school, when quarrels were made up, when carols were heard in every street, when every house was decorated with evergreens, and every table was loaded with good cheer. At that season all hearts not utterly destitute of kindness were enlarged and softened. At that season the poor were admitted to partake largely of the overflowings of the wealth of the rich, whose bounty was peculiarly acceptable on account of the shortness of the days and of the severity of the weather. At that season the interval between landlord and tenant, master and servant, was less marked than through the rest of the year. Where there is much enjoyment there will be some excess: yet on the whole, the spirit in which the holiday was kept was not unworthy of a Christian festival. The Long Parliament gave orders, in 1644, that the twenty-fifth of December should be strictly observed as a fast, and that all men should pass it in humbly bemoaning the great national sin which they and their fathers had so often committed on that day by romping under the mistletoe, eating boar's head, and drinking ale flavored with roasted apples. No public act of that time seems to have irritated the common people more. On the next anniversary of the festival formidable riots broke out in many places. The constables were resisted, the magistrates insulted, the houses of noted zealots attacked, and the proscribed service of the day openly read in the churches.

Church of England.

Few persons, in this country, even in our own Church, but more especially among the various denominations, are fully aware of the extent of the English Church,—its influence in the great work of evangelizing the world,—its rapid increase, and the liberal contributions, which are made by its members, for extending the institutions of the Gospel in foreign lands. So much has been said in England, and eagerly seized upon and repeated in this country, of the shortcomings of the English Church, and the evils of a union of Church and State, and so accustomed have people become to this wholesale abuse, that, no doubt, many very honest people have concluded, that this branch of the Church Catholic can make but little pretensions to any very respectable degree of vital godliness, and is, on the whole, perhaps rather a stumbling-block in the way of the progress of the truth. It is not our intention to attempt to set these good people right, in this important matter; we shall do what we can, occasionally, by publishing facts as we meet with them which will serve to place the truth, in respect to the actual doings of the English Church, before our readers, that they may judge for themselves of her real condition.

A noble feature in her character, which we have noticed, with much pleasure, of late, is the exertions and liberal contributions that have been made, to provide churches in the destitute portions of the country, and to increase free sittings for the accommodation of the poor, in London and other parts of England.

That our readers may have something of a just conception of what has been done, and is now doing in England, in the way of Church extension, we transfer to our columns the following extract, from the report of the Society for Building and Enlarging Churches:

"The total amount of grants made by the society during the last year, is £12,557, to procure an addition of about 30,000 sittings, to the previously existing church accommodation in the country, of which upwards of 26,000 will be free, the cost to the society being about 10s. for every additional free seat, the remainder being made up by the subscriptions raised in the various localities; but this proves that a very judicious system of economy must be constantly operating in the application of these funds thus voluntarily obtained. The benefits which the unwearied exertions of this society confer on the British public may be estimated, when it is stated that the total number of applications made to this Board for aid, from the commencement of their operations in 1818, is 40361 of which number, 2735 have received grants in aid of the complete erection of 763 additional churches and chapels, and towards the rebuilding, enlarging, or otherwise increasing the accommodation, in 1972 existing churches and chapels: by which means, 760,000 additional seats have been obtained, 556,000 of which are free and unappropriated; and the amount of money contributed by the society towards carrying these works into full operation, amounts to £439,698 sterling! And when we add to this large sum the amount raised by voluntary contributions to meet the society's grants, which are estimated at one million and three quarters sterling, it will not be difficult to understand the nature of the task the society has undertaken, and the untrifling, the judicious zeal with which its complicated duties are performed; and that this fine spirit of liberality on the part of the public, was unquestionably called forth by this management, and by the encouragement held out by this society, of granting aid from its funds to the amount of from twenty to thirty per cent, in proportion to the amount raised in each locality."—Christian Witness.

THE RESIDENCE OF A BISHOP.—The foundation of a diocese is said to have followed a certain law, upon the attempt to convert a nation to Christianity. A bishop, attended by his presbyters and deacons, established himself in some town or place of general resort, where the preaching of the gospel by their mouths might have been received gratefully and zealously. There the mother church was built, and the "cathedra," or throne of the bishop, set up; there this apostolical body of holy men served God in the beauty of his sanctuary day by day, and pushed forward the work of conversion in the neighbouring villages and towns. Thus station after station was occupied, and parishes were formed, each with its priest and deacon, in a circle widening and widening through successive years by radii drawn from the cathedral-city, as from a centre. Thus the country presbyters, sent forth by the bishop, and settled under his authority, depended upon his spiritual jurisdiction, and were held together in one bond of union with their head. Their daily prayer in the church was a universal custom; and neither bishop nor priest would dare to be absent, for conscience sake. Thus an identity was observed between the bishop and his cathedral church, just as now between the country parson and the village church: the two could not be separated in idea, they were married together by popular opinion; as the mother church was the type of the harmony subsisting between herself and her children, so the bishop, standing within her sacred precincts, represented the concord of the several degrees in the ministry. Much of public convenience also followed this arrangement. The city of the diocese, if not always the geographical centre, is nevertheless always a place of chief importance, easy of access, and much frequented. The clergy, when summoned or resorting to their diocesan, enjoyed the privilege of a choral service, and might revel in that sweet harmony of sound denied them in their remote and undowered districts, which uplifts the soul to heaven's gate, and reflects the employments of blessed angels before the throne of God himself. Either the regulations for the observance of daily services, as enjoined by the church, are useful for edification, or they are not; if they are, then the bishop of the diocese ought to be the last person to violate them; if they are not, why are they retained so conspicuously and emphatically in the prayer-book? "All priests and deacons are to say daily the morning and evening prayer, either privately or openly, not being let [hindered] by sickness or some other urgent cause." Then follows a more stringent clause: "And the curate that ministereth in every parish church or chapel, being at home, and not being otherwise reasonably hindered, shall say the same in the parish church or chapel where he ministereth." . . . Surely, in such an important matter as the public worship of Almighty God, which no true church has ever yet refused to solemnize daily, which is a standing witness against worldly-mindedness, and no inconsiderable part of a soul's discipline for heaven, the chief pastor of a diocese, who has promised, "the Lord being his helper," "to show himself in all things an example of good works unto others, that the adversary may be ashamed, having nothing to say against him," should beware of giving a handle to the adversary by his own indifference or neglect, for impugning not only the discipline and ordinances, but even the legitimate character of the church itself.—The Mirror of a Bishop.

The Coat of Many Colors.

BY OLD HUMPHREY.

The other sabbath morning I overtook an aged man, whose threadbare coat was well patched with cloth of different hues, so that it was indeed "a coat of many colors." As I walked behind him, musing on his gray hair, his bent body, his humble mien, and slow movement, he turned into a place of worship. "Well," thought I, "I took him for a pilgrim, and a pilgrim he is, I doubt not, to the city with the golden gates. He appears to be low in the world; but there was one who wore, if not a coat of the same kind as his, at least a coat of many colors, who was brought much lower, and yet afterwards was raised to a high estate, even to sit among princes.

However much there may be to discourage a man in so humble a garb from thriving in this world, there seems to be no impediment in the way of his arriving at high honor and dignity in the world that is to come. Earthly kings may not covet his company; but if his heart be right with God, however lowly his apparel may be, he shall share the glory of the King of heaven. It must comfort such a one to know, on divine authority, that the Almighty ruler of the skies despiseth not poverty. He puts down the mighty from their seat, and exalts them of low degree. He fills the hungry with good things, and sends the rich empty away.

Were all the Christians congregated together to whom the Saviour when on earth showed personal kindness, they would form but a motley group, and would obtain but little attention, on account of the respectability of their clothing. Simon Peter's "fisher's coat," was most likely of a most homely fashion. Poor blind Bartimeus, who would not be chidden into silence, but persisted in crying out "Jesus, thou Son of David, have mercy on me," was not, you may depend upon it, dressed in very fashionable attire. I greatly question if the cloak that Paul left at Tross was of much value; and I never could think of lowly Lazarus as wearing any other coat on the sabbath day, than that which he wore on every other day of the week.

Cheer up, humble-minded, meanly-clad Christian. Be content for awhile to take the lowest seat; by and by thou shalt hear the welcome invitation of thy Lord, "Come up higher," when garments shall be given thee pure and white as the moon in her brightness, and effulgent as the sun in his glory.—Christian Advocate and Journal.

CAPE TOWN:—Mission among the Mahomedans.—The Bishop of Cape Town proposes to establish a mission among the Mahomedans in Cape Town, whose numbers have been increasing from time to time by converts from professing Christians; and another among the liberated Africans, several hundreds of whom are dwelling round the Bishop's house, and many of whom have likewise become Mahomedans.

To Agents and Subscribers.

AGENTS OF THE BANNER, who may have made collections, are respectfully requested to remit the amount to us by mail. Notes of any specie-paying Banks will be received.

SUBSCRIBERS, who have received bills, will especially oblige us by remitting to us the amounts respectively due. We solicit early attention to them.

The terms of the Paper are Two Dollars and Fifty Cents a year, payable in advance; or Three Dollars if not paid before the end of the year. The advance price will be charged when we are obliged to collect the bills through a travelling agent.

Any person remitting Ten Dollars, will be entitled to receive five copies for one year.

Communications for the Editor may be addressed to the Rev. Frederick Ogilby, and for the publisher to James S. Newbold, both, No. 16 South Seventh street, Philadelphia.

Office of the Banner of the Cross

The office of this paper has been removed from No. 89 South Fifth street, to the Book store of Mr. R. S. H. George, No. 16 South Seventh street, between Market and Chesnut streets.

Mr. George will act as Agent for the receipt of subscriptions, etc.

A NATION'S CAUSE FOR THANKSGIVING TO ALMIGHTY GOD.—The day on which our Paper issues from the Press, being that appointed by the Governors of several of our States as a Day of Thanksgiving to ALMIGHTY GOD, we are urged to address our Readers on this important subject. Perhaps we may furnish a discourse which shall meet the notice of some who are deprived of the privilege of hearing a better one. These occasions should be improved, not only from the pulpit, but from the silent preaching of the press, for the great purpose of enforcing truths intimately connected with the peace and enduring welfare of our country.

Every Christian heart must own the many causes which should produce that gratitude to the kind Giver of "every good and perfect gift" which finds utterance in Thanksgiving. To deny this obligation is to profess atheism.

This truth, so readily admitted in reference to individuals, is not so generally acknowledged in its application to nations. This results not from an unwillingness to recognize national obligations to "the King of kings and Lord of lords," so much as from a failure to discover the plain truth that nations are as much dependent upon the Providence of God as individuals. The Almighty Hand which shapes the course of each individual being upon earth, is just as busy in determining the present destiny of nations. "I have lived," says Franklin, "a long time; and the longer I live the more convincing proofs I see of this truth, that God governs in the affairs of men. And, if a sparrow cannot fall to the ground without His notice, is it probable that an empire can rise without His aid?"

The great American philosopher never uttered a profounder truth and one of greater practical importance. It would be well if those who admire his political sagacity, and his skill in unfolding the mysteries of nature, would be equally ready to follow his judgment when guided by that "wisdom which cometh from above."

The appointment by our Civil Rulers, and the due observance by our citizens, of annual Thanksgiving Days, should be hailed with pleasure by every Christian, and by every true patriot who feels how much the well-being of his country depends upon the blessing of "the high and mighty Ruler of the universe." Our present aim is to assert this solemn connection, and to claim its due acknowledgment from all who desire to see their country great and glorious, under the blessed rule of institutions which shall be permanent. And this cannot be, unless they are overruled by eternal wisdom, and overshadowed by the protecting arm of Almighty power and goodness.

Are proofs needed to establish these assertions? Every page of history is eloquent with such instruction. Look at the great and powerful nations of the world which, after a brief day of illustrious existence, have sunk into the night of obscurity. Upon their ruins is written, in plain and fearful characters, the sentence of the immutable God, a decree which cannot be changed—a law which altereth not—"And it shall be, if thou do at all forget the Lord thy God, and walk after other gods, and serve them, and worship them, I testify against you this day that ye shall surely perish." That such a result will inevitably follow the declared cause is a fact fully established by universal experience. And it is no less a truth which reason clearly demonstrates, that no nation, whatever may be its form of government, can be permanent or secure unless it is upheld by some stronger influence than one which derives no force from above.

Human laws and institutions can never form sufficient barriers to restrain the encroachments of human passions. They are like those artificial embankments which are made to keep back the invading ocean, and which will answer this end as long as a superior power curbs the violence of the waves. But, as these puny obstacles are swept away when the ocean is roused to violence by fierce winds, so mere human restraints form no secure protection against the resistless storms and impetuous waves of excited passion. The only effectual power is the might of Him who could say to the troubled elements, "Peace, be still:" of whom it was said, "What manner of man is this, for even the winds and seas obey Him?"

Besides, human laws, in a free government, are nothing more than self-imposed restrictions. They are land-marks which may be removed by every change in public opinion. They are not, like the laws of God, founded upon the eternal and immutable principles of right, but they depend for their stability upon the voice of the people, which, if it be not directed by the voice of God, is nothing but the shifting quicksand, disturbed by every turning tide, and overwhelming with ruin every thing that is built upon it. So that, without the direction of the Great Law-giver of the universe there cannot be righteous or permanent laws, and without His power to give them efficiency and to control the unruly elements which they confine, the most excellent laws will be impotent when they conflict with supposed interest or fierce desire. Like the "green withs," in which the Philistines thought to bind their powerful enemy, these will be broken "as a thread of tow is broken, when it toucheth the fire." It is in reference to this truth, that our Saviour calls His disciples "the salt of the earth," for His truth is the only preservative against decay and corruption, and, without this, a nation, like a body without a soul must soon return to its kindred dust.

If these premises are just and true, they afford a strong foundation on which to rest the conclusion of this article, which was begun, and has been continued longer than we designed, for the purpose of setting forth A NATION'S CAUSE FOR THANKSGIVING TO ALMIGHTY GOD.

Not merely for the peace which He has made in our borders, and for filling our land with the finest wheat; not alone because He hath strengthened the bars of our gates, and blessed the children of this favoured land; not only for the health with which we have been blessed while other nations have been smitten with deadly pestilence, nor for the many individual and social blessings which have warmed the hearts and cheered the firesides of its citizens, should this nation find cause for thanksgiving to the Almighty. But as its existence and continuance depend upon the mercy of God, the very fact that it still exists, is a deep cause of Thanksgiving. A mighty storm has swept over the nations of the earth. The shattered wrecks of other governments are floating by the Rock on which we stand. There is not another nation of the civilized world which has not passed through scenes of trouble and of strife. War, pestilence, and famine have been abroad in all the earth. At such a time, the gracious Lord, despite our unworthiness of so great mercy, has blessed us with Peace, with Health, with Plenty. There is in this, no cause for vain-glory, for self-gratulation, or for unseemly exultation over those less favoured, but there is cause for Thanksgiving to Him who "hath not dealt with us after our sins, nor rewarded us according to our iniquities." There is cause also to tremble lest, if "the goodness of God leadeth" us not to a proper recognition of His sovereignty, the severity of God shall visit us with fearful, but with righteous, judgments.

In the late Presidential election, through which this nation has passed, with so much order and quiet, every citizen deposited his vote as if the country's salvation depended upon the man selected to be Chief Ruler. Let the same desire guide every true patriot to the House of Prayer, at the appointed time, to bless God for His past mercies, to pray for that future protection, which the Almighty arm alone can afford. Thus let them confess, as every Christian citizen should, that, in the affairs of nations as well as in the concerns of individuals, "it is better to trust in the Lord than to put any confidence in man," and they will never fail to see and own THE CAUSE FOR A NATION'S THANKSGIVING TO ALMIGHTY GOD.

The Protestant Churchman favors us with the following notice:

A Comparison to be Instituted.—The Banner of the Cross has lately made an effort to suppress the Evangelical Knowledge Society, because the Society has seen fit to suppress one of its books which had not received the examination and revision of the Bishops who are members. The Churchman, as a matter of course, grasps his neighbor by the hand, and says "well done." But neither of the adversaries of the Society have as yet undertaken to institute a comparison between the frankness and honesty which confesses and retrieves an error, and the disingenuousness (to use the stronger term) which persists in keeping upon the shelf, in another quarter, works whose errors have been exposed, and which ought not to be regarded by sound churchmen as exponents of the great truths plainly recognised in authorised standards.

As this statement does not quite represent the facts of the case, we feel bound to set the Protestant Churchman right, in order that it may not be guilty of a suppressio veri which, we take it, would be almost as bad as an attempt "to suppress the Evangelical Knowledge Society."

This "effort to suppress the Evangelical Knowledge Society," when related by an unimaginative historian, may be thus recorded. We give the simple facts. A copy of the work called "a Key to the Prayer Book," was sent to the Editor of the Banner by the Publisher, to be noticed in our columns. After a careful examination, in good temper we reviewed the Book, sustaining all our assertions by extracts from its pages. It was not until this Review had been written and the last part was in type, that we learned the strange fact that the work, after being published, with high commendation, by the appointed committee to whom this office was entrusted by the Society, had been suppressed. We did not think it necessary, on this account, to suppress our Review, especially as half of it had been published a week before the work had been suppressed.

We must say we think the implied censure which the Protestant Churchman casts upon the Executive Committee, exceedingly unjust. The implication is contained in the article above quoted, that this committee had executed an important duty without authority. They published, says this Journal, a book "which had not received the examination and revision of the Bishops who are members." Whatever we may have implied in our Review, we made no such severe charge as this, which plainly intimates that the committee had acted without due sanction, and that, without "the Bishops who are members," they are not competent to determine what "evangelical knowledge" is!

As to "the comparison to be instituted" "between the frankness and honesty" manifest in this suppression, and "the disingenuousness, &c. in another quarter," we can only say we know nothing of the mysterious reference. For the first time we learn that "frankness and honesty" are shown by one body of men confessing and retrieving an error committed by another body! Had the Executive Committee made of themselves this confession, then frankness and honesty might have been attributed. But what are the facts? We learn them from the authorized Report of the Proceedings of this Society, at their first annual meeting.

From the Report of the Executive Committee we make the following extract:

The following is a list of books as yet published, and in connection therewith, the Committee beg leave to repeat, what has already, in part, appeared in the different Episcopal periodicals: 1st. "A Key to the Prayer Book of the Protestant Episcopal Church, designed to illustrate its meaning, use, and Scriptural character, by the Rev. Robert Whytehead, A. M., a Clergyman of the Church of England. Adapted to the American Prayer-book by the Executive Committee," 12mo., 358 pages, 75 cents. An edition of 2080 copies.

The Committee confidently believe that this is a book which will prove creditable to the Society, and satisfactory to its friends. Every page bears evidence of the learning, research, and industry of the author. But it is particularly valuable as setting forth in the main, the views of the Society, and the pure unadulterated doctrines of the Gospel.

"The Committee to whom was referred the annual Report of the Executive Committee" presented a Report from which we make the following extract:

"In relation to the books published by the Executive Committee, this Committee have found only one to which their attention has been particularly drawn, ('Key to the Prayer Book,' including the Tract on Baptism extracted from it,) to which there seems to be any serious objection. With this exception they believe that the selections have been valuable and useful. Of that one they find a large portion which is truly excellent, and they doubt not that its author is entitled to much of the praise accorded to him by the Executive Committee, as a learned and Evangelical Divine. But with so much that is excellent in this publication, your Committee find mingled some sentiments and expressions which are inconsistent with the principles laid down as the basis of the Society's organization and operations.

In view of which facts your committee feel constrained to advise the prompt withdrawal, for the present, of the above named work, and the Tract on Baptism, taken from it, and that it be submitted to the Committee for such renewed and further revision as may, and it is believed will, adapt it, to the great ends contemplated by our organization. We recommend this course with an entire appreciation of the difficulties in the position of the Committee, and award to them our warmest gratitude and thanks for their labors. In conclusion, the Committee recommend to the Board the adoption of the following resolution:

Resolved, That the work entitled, "Key to the Prayer Book," and the Tract on Baptism, taken out of it, be, for the present, withdrawn; and that the same be submitted to the Executive Committee for further revision."

That there are books on the shelves of "the Sunday School Union" which some in the church would desire to suppress we know full well. If these could have ruled in that society, as they rule in their new sphere, there would have been no "Evangelical Knowledge Society." But we are confident there are no books on the shelves of "the S. S. Union," which have been condemned by the authorities to whom this judgment is wisely committed. If there are, let the fact be plainly spoken, and then we shall undertake "to institute a comparison."

The following Notice was received too late for last week's paper. We are happy to add that the Bishop is convalescing rapidly.

The Bishop of New Jersey, in consenting to perform Episcopal duties in the Diocese of New York, during the month of November, was governed by the desire to gratify some of the dearest friends he ever had, in acting at the consecration of the Church of the Holy Cross in the city of Troy. He deems this statement due to those who have confided so much to him, in the education of their Children: the only trust he feels at liberty to add to his Parochial and Episcopal Charge.

Riverside, Nov. 15, 1848.

CONTRIBUTION FOR WESTERN MISSIONS.—If our feeble appeal in behalf of the West brings no other response than the following, we shall still be thankful that it was made.

We have already received more than one acknowledgment of Charitable contributions from "the Hannah More Academy." Though we are not able to speak from observation of the character of this Institution, we may argue that "the good seed of the word" must be there faithfully planted, and duly nurtured, to bear such fruits as these. God's blessing will surely rest upon the young hearts which feel so deeply for the wants, and minister so cheerfully to the necessities of His poor Missionaries.

We have forwarded the amount enclosed to the Treasurer of Domestic Missions. We cannot withhold the letter in which it was conveyed.

TO THE REV. FREDERICK OGILBY.

Dear Sir,—Enclosed you will receive $11. A small amount given by the Young Ladies' of this Academy in answer to an appeal made by the Right Rev. Bp. Kemper, in behalf of our Domestic Missionaries. And we would rejoice were the sum a thousand instead of so small a mite. It will shew what Church Institutions can do for the Church if the attempt is made, when we say, the request was scarcely made until responded to by each one giving of her pocket money.

"Tis more blessed to give than to receive," and let us all remember we are but stewards of our Lord's money, and we think our Missionaries would not be left again a year, or even six months without their salaries.

Hannah Moore Academy, Balt. Co., Md.

Foreign Intelligence.

The papers received by the last steamer, contain little intelligence concerning church matters of general interest.

We condense the following from the English Churchman's news of the week.

The affairs in Austria still continue in an unsettled state; but there seems to be more hope than formerly of a peaceable solution to the difficulties of this large, but disunited and unwieldy Empire.

It is a remarkable fact that the House of Hapsburg have obtained the major part of their dominions by marriage and not by conquest. Whether the Emperor, who is residing at Olmutz, will be able to reduce his dominions into any tolerable degree of order, remains to be seen. Auersperg, Jellachich, and Windischgratz have surrounded Vienna with troops; and the city was said to have been bombarded by the latter, on the 24th of October, but this proves to be a false report. These events at Vienna are likely to have an important effect at Berlin, where the elements of mischief are very ripe.

Lord Palmerston, as usual, is allowing the Russians to have their own way in Moldavia and Wallachia, much to the disgust of the Turks, who complain that the English are deserting them.

Constantinople has suffered from a dreadful fire. The greater part of Pera is burnt to the ground.

Noureddin Mirza has been proclaimed Shah of Persia; but he does not seem likely to wear his crown in peace.

In France, the President is to be elected on the 10th of December. Louis Napoleon has by far the best chance, and is already beginning to assume the state and exclusiveness of official rank.

A Congress is to be held at Brussels for the settlement of the affairs of Upper Italy.

The Sicilians, as we anticipated, are not satisfied with the Constitution of 1812, under the Vice-royalty of one of the Neapolitan Bourbons.

The Carlists are making such progress in Arragon and Catalonia, that General Narvaez has left Madrid for Barcelona.

It is reported that foreigners are distributing Communist pamphlets in London. If this be true, it is a breach of hospitality on their part, and they should be ordered out of the kingdom immediately.

In Ireland, the Pope has condemned the "Godless Colleges," with the hope of inducing the Government to assist him in founding there an exclusive Romish University, similar to Louvain. It is said that the four rebel leaders are not unlikely to succeed with their writ of error; in which case they have a chance of escaping scot-free. If we have a second O'Connell case, the Irish Law Officers may "hide their diminished heads."

New Publications.

THE SACRED POETS OF ENGLAND AND AMERICA for Three Centuries. Chronologically Arranged, with Biographical and Critical Notices. By Rufus W. Griswold. Illustrated with Steel Engravings. One handsome 8vo. vol. New York, D. Appleton & Co., 200 Broadway. Philadelphia, Geo. S. Appleton, 164 Chesnut Street.

This is a well printed volume, richly and solidly bound. The worth of its contents is declared in its title.—"The Sacred Poets of England and America for Three Centuries." The editor is admirably qualified for the task of preparing such a work. The selections are judicious and the biographical notices, though brief, afford the desired information.

It is a book well suited for a useful gift, and those who receive it not from others, will do well to bestow it upon themselves.

HOLIDAY HOUSE: a series of Tales, by Catharine Sinclair, authoress of "Modern Accomplishments," &c., &c. From the fifth London edition. By the same publishers.

We have submitted this attractive looking book to the judgment of those for whom it was written, and it has secured the hearty approval of its little critics. The smiles and tears which its merry or affecting Tales drew forth are the best proof of its merit. Few living writers understand the method of interesting and instructing children better than Miss Sinclair. "Holiday House" will be a useful and pleasant companion for the approaching holidays.

BUDS AND BLOSSOMS FOR THE YOUNG. By Mrs. Hughes, Author of "Aunt Mary's Tales," "Ornaments Discovered," &c., &c. With numerous illustrations.

This is a collection of several Stories, the subjects of which promise no little interest. We are not able to speak of their particular character, not having had time to examine them with sufficient care. The book is very attractive in appearance, and the illustrations are good.

ST. JOHN'S CHURCH, NORTHERN LIBERTIES.—We have been requested to state that it is intended to have a Sale of Fancy articles on the 12th of December, in Swaim's building. The proceeds are to be applied to cleaning and repairing St. John's Church. It will be remembered that the seats in this church are ALL FREE. This fact, together with the interest felt in the respected and devoted Rector, must ensure the success of this undertaking and command a large amount of solid sympathy.

Any donations may be sent to Mrs. Osman Reed, No. 2, Franklin Square.

We invite the attention of our readers to the advertisement of Mrs. Twiggs. This lady has given us the opportunity of perusing her testimonials which are highly commendatory and from the most respectable sources.

From a PASTORAL LETTER addressed by the Bishop, "to the Clergy and Laity of the Diocese of Toronto."

We find in the last number of "The Church" an admirable letter from the Bishop of Toronto, to the Clergy and Laity of his Diocese, in reference to the anticipated coming of the Cholera. After showing how many provocations there are to merit this same judgment, and setting forth more general counsels, the Bishop thus proceeds with the peculiar subject of his letter. These are wise practical counsels, earnestly and faithfully expressed, which all Christians should lay to heart at this time, though many of them are no less suitable at all times, whether "of our prosperity or adversity."

"But we now turn to the more immediate object of this letter, the probable appearance of the Cholera at no distant period. And let us not despond at this awful prospect, for the Lord God Omnipotent reigneth, and notwithstanding the falling away of many, we trust that we have still thousands of true hearts among us, as there were in the gloomy days of Elijah, prepared to resist the world, the flesh, and the devil."

Our Holy Catholic Church still spreads aloft her banner of love over the land, and God stands pledged that the gates of hell shall not prevail against her. She offers to all a refuge from the storm; and should her believing members be comparatively few in number, yet she may supply her twenty, or at least her ten righteous persons to save us from this approaching destruction, and shew by their courage and untiring works of love and mercy to an unbelieving world, that they who rest upon God in Christ enjoy a confidence which can never be broken, and which is able to sustain them under the most afflicting calamities. Nay, such feel themselves sheltered in the bosom of infinite mercy; and they are prepared and ready to meet every contingency, not only poverty and sickness, but even death itself, as the messenger that conveys them to the more immediate presence of their Redeemer, and the long sought rest of His eternal kingdom.

And should you at any time fall into darkness and despondency, say not, that your sins are too many and grievous to be forgiven, and that the pestilence will find you naked and without hope. For though repentance deferred to the last gasp be a most discouraging thing, and a sick bed or the time of God's visitation not a fit hour for making our peace with our Redeemer—yet even then, blessed be our Father in heaven, the door is not absolutely shut, nor is repentance forbidden—nay it is not even at such a time unlawful, nor does this late period make it insincere, although our sin has been grievously aggravated by delay, and it may seem to others as well as to ourselves, not a little suspicious. The prodigal never thought of returning to his father till he was ready to perish. And Christ seems to relate the parable to meet among others, such cases as must frequently happen in times of pestilence, that He may touch with hope the hearts of the greatest sinners, and make them aware that He will receive them, however late, and by whatever necessity or distress they are driven to Him, and that if they come with faithfulness of heart He will in no way cast them out, but graciously receive them. Do not therefore yield to despair, however sinful you may have been. Confide in your Saviour. Pray to Him for pardon, and He will hear you. Submit yourselves to His will, and be resigned in all things except one—the loss of your immortal souls. To this you must never be resigned, but you must strive night and day to obtain an interest in Christ—the remission of your sins, the sanctifying of your hearts, the saving of your souls, and then you shall be enabled through the influence of His holy spirit to perform your work were it even at the last hour, and as Jacob said to the Angel "I will not let Thee go except Thou bless me," neither ought you to leave off crying to Jesus, till you have made good your title to eternity.

But great as were the evils, which the cholera brought upon us in its former visitations, and awful as is the contemplation of its return, we must not forget that it has been over-ruled by divine mercy for good, and been productive of many valuable social advantages, which are of a permanent character, and will yield much benefit to mankind, when the calamity itself shall have been long forgotten.

Not only have we become far better acquainted with the nature of the disease, and the means of its cure and avoidance, but it has been the cause of introducing many improvements which will add much to the physical comfort of the community. Far greater attention is now paid to the cleanliness of our towns and cities—to the purifying of the atmosphere, to the better ventilation of the houses of the poor—to the encouragement of temperate habits—to the supply of warm clothing to the needy, and nourishing and healthy food. The kind sympathy of the rich has been called forth to the assistance of their more unfortunate neighbours, and the distance between the different classes of society has been lessened by acts of generous kindness on the one side, and grateful acceptance on the other. Moreover it has been shewn that cholera in its first stage is by no means unmanageable by simple remedies, and prompt recourse to medical assistance. One matter of great importance appears to be set at rest, namely, that cholera is not contagious, and that there is no risk in attending upon the sick and the dying. Now this is a most valuable discovery, for it will give confidence to the weak and timid to nurse their friends and neighbours, and the inmates of their families, without fear or apprehension. During the two last visitations of the pestilence, the poor were frequently much neglected. Pity was swallowed up by fear. The healthy members of the household got so terrified at the sudden attacks and deaths around them, that they either became hardened or incapable of discharging the various duties required in attending upon a sickness so fearful and loathsome. They beheld death over their heads and in their houses—staring them in the face, and clutching them as it were in its grasp—hence their alarm at touching the infected, and their inability to assist and comfort the unhappy sufferers.

Now it is decided, by the best authorities, that there is no ground for this alarm, and that there is far less danger in watching a Cholera patient than one in typhus fever. But were the danger certain, as has been formerly held, it would prove no hindrance to the care and watchfulness of the truly religious. Such are ever found bold, active, kind and considerate in the day of calamity; they feel convinced that if God sends the judgment, He likewise puts it into the hearts of His children to love their neighbours as themselves, and to manifest their devotion to him by obedience to His laws, that is, by doing all in their power to assuage and to remove the affliction.

It is true that unbelievers, and such as have never felt the power of the Gospel, have frequently asserted, in their deplorable ignorance, that the pious are inactive on such trying occasions, and more disposed to sit with folded hands in stupid amazement or selfish indifference, than to employ themselves in assisting and comforting the diseased.—But let such truthless scoffers learn, that as the friends of Christ firmly believe that every calamity comes from God, they likewise believe as firmly that God can stay its progress in a moment, and that among the means of staying it, is the active exertion of all the Christian charities, fearlessly applied to the amelioration of suffering.

As to you, my Brethren of the Clergy, the Scriptures exhort you to improve, for spiritual purposes, all the divine dispensations: and for this our Church makes the most beautiful and effective arrangements.—After providing, in the most ample and interesting manner, for public worship on Sundays and Holydays, and for hallowing the different steps of our earthly pilgrimage, she takes order for the appointment of the most suitable religious exercises to meet extraordinary emergencies.

I therefore recommend the following prayers to be used in all the congregations of this Diocese, immediately before the General Thanksgiving at Morning and Evening Prayer.

They are the same which the late Archbishop of Canterbury, of blessed memory, appointed to be used in England when threatened with the Cholera in 1832, and where, it is believed, they were attended with a special blessing. And may we not, in all humility, hope that a like blessing will follow them here if used in a devout frame of mind, with sincere repentance for our sins, and firm resolutions of amendment in heart and life.

It is during periods of great public affliction that men's hearts are tried, and especially the Ministers of God's Word and ordinances.—Therefore, to your Sunday prayers and duties, my brethren, you must add active and untiring labour during the week. And this not merely in answering promptly every summons to the bed of sickness and of death, but going un-called, on finding any of your flock attacked; nay, it is your bounden duty to make frequent inquiries, that no one may lose the benefit of your presence to administer the consolations of religion, and to satisfy the anxious cravings of the Soul in the hour of departure.

And here I may observe, that in the faithful discharge of these important duties, the Church allows her Clergy no discretion—no questionings about personal danger, family ties, and the like: or that such visits can be of little efficacy to the sufferer on the bed of death,—it is our duty and privilege to act, and neither to hesitate nor to judge. The Church gives countenance to no selfish apologies or excuses for holding back on such trying occasions: we are emphatically the Soldiers of Christ, and especially bid, in fighting under his banner, to stand in the front of the battle, and woe be to us if found less devoted than the Soldier who boldly marches to the cannon's mouth, in defence of his earthly Sovereign.

But past experience, my brethren, assures me of your fidelity, in the discharge of this perilous duty, to the requirements of your Ordination vows. And I trust in God that we have many Aarons among us, ready to go forth with censers in their hands, to stand between the living and the dead, and fervently to pray that the plague may be stayed—and to shew to the lukewarm and unbelieving world that we have a divine arm on which to lean—a hope that may not be broken, but which is able to support the most feeble, though all the powers of darkness were leagued against them. "Thou shalt not be afraid for the terror by night, nor for the arrow that flieth by day: nor for the Pestilence that walketh in darkness, nor for the destruction that wasteth at noon-day.—A thousand shall fall at thy side, and ten thousand at thy right hand, but it shall not come nigh thee."

With my humble and earnest prayer that the Pestilence may be averted from this Province, and commending you to the merciful protection of God,

I remain, my dear Brethren,
Your affectionate Diocesan,

JOHN TORONTO.

Bp. Strachan

Toronto, 4th Nov., 1848.

THE GOSPEL MESSENGER comes to us wearing the external marks of sorrow. The cause of its mourning is told in the following brief Postscript, which will sadden many hearts.

It was not our privilege to know personally the Rev. Dr. Rudd. We have long admired and honored him, as a brave and faithful soldier of the cross, a veteran in the christian warfare who had never "turned back in the day of battle." Though firm and uncompromising in maintaining the truth, he had that courteous demeanor and kindly spirit by which hostility was disarmed. We have always heard his intimate friends speak of him with enthusiasm, as one to be dearly loved, while those who differed from him used no words expressive of bitter feeling towards him. This last is much to say of one who so long occupied the Editorial chair, and who fulfilled its trying duties with so much faithfulness.

We trust, while his memory is treasured by the Church in whose service his long and useful life was spent, the bright example he has left on record shall not be lost upon those who come after him. Awaiting a fuller notice from some one better qualified to do justice to the interesting subject, we append the following brief announcement.

POSTSCRIPT.

The Venerable Editor of the Messenger is no more. The present contains his last words to the Church, for whose instruction and welfare he has so faithfully toiled. He expired at his residence in this city, at half past eight o'clock, on Wednesday evening. His recent severe indisposition, assuming constantly a more serious type, finally put an end to his mortal life. Yet, notwithstanding the trying nature of his disease, its protracted term, and the consequent waste and exhaustion of nature, he yet labored to the last, and dictated a brief editorial note only the day previous to his death. With truth may it be said of him, that he toiled at his post until his Master called, and then hastened to His presence with his armor on.

We have only time for making this painful announcement before the Messenger goes to press.

We have been requested to publish the following.

The Forty Eighth Annual Report of the Female Association for Relieving the Poor.

The time has arrived when we are once more called upon to present a statement of the operations of the Female Association for another year. Few changes have taken place among the pensioners, with the exception of the addition of seven more families, who have been visited and relieved by the managers.

This Society has lost by the hand of death, one of its oldest patrons and one of its latest elected members. In the parlour of the Rev. Dr. Green this Association was first formed, and to him are we indebted for its constitution; during an absence of twelve years from the city, he ever remembered his contribution, thus manifesting his deep and continued interest in its welfare, until the last year of his life.

Our late President Mrs. Rush, who so faithfully served in this cause for many years, will also be remembered with much affection by us all.

Short as was the sojourn of our late Manager Mrs. J. C. Smith among us, deeply will be felt the loss of one so well fitted to aid in this work of charity and love. While our hearts are thus called to mourn, may we be stimulated to renewed efforts in behalf of the helpless and infirm, who have known better and happier days, ever remembering that we must "work while it is day, for the night cometh when no man can work."

Formula of Private Devotion.

TO THE PRAYING CHRISTIAN, No. V.

On first awaking in the morning, say,

"May I open my eyes on the blessed light of Heaven, in the name of the Father, and of the Son, and of the Holy Ghost. Amen."

"I thank thee, oh Lord, that thou hast guarded over us during the past night, preserving us from Fire, Robbers, Sin and all evils: preserve us this day from all spiritual and temporal danger, and bring us at last to Eternal Life, through Jesus Christ, our Lord. Amen." Then say the Morning Prayer, as set forth by the Church,—viz: 1. The Confession. 2. Lord's Prayer. 3. Versicle, "Oh, Lord open thou our lips" &c., then, The (4) Benedictus, ("Blessed be the Lord God of Israel.") Then the (5) "Te Deum;" or, these two last may be said during the day, and after, "May the Lord be with us, and with our Spirits," may be immediately said. 6. The Collect for the Day (being that of the preceding Sunday, or it may be, for the day specially.) 7. "Oh, God who art the author of Peace, &c." 8. "Oh God who hast safely brought us to the beginning of this day, &c." 9. For "the President of the United States, &c." Omit the two next prayers, as the Litany, (or, if the Litany,) is to be said during the day, (would advise its being always said every day.) But, note, that the two omitted prayers, that is, "Oh, God from whom all holy desires, &c." and "Oh, God, the Creator and Preserver of all mankind," are to be said, with the rest of the Evening Service. In short, the service is to be exactly that of Sunday, or any Litany day, in the Church, the prayer specified above, to be followed by the (10) General Thanksgiving, (11) Prayer of St. Chrysostom, &c.

The Litany to be said every day. It is an excellent noon-day service, or, can be said whilst walking, or in the intervals of occupation.

Always read the Psalter for the day, morning and evening. The Scriptures may be read according to the Calendar.

"Pray without ceasing."

It is a great help to spirituality, to abound in good forms of devotion. Try to turn every thing into an occasion of prayer. The habit of ejaculatory prayer, is most useful. For instance, when you hear the clock strike, say "Grant, oh Lord that the knell of Judgment, may summon me to a joyful Resurrection, &c." When you enter a house say, "Grant, oh Lord, that I may have my residence with Thee, in that mansion which thou hast builded in the Heavens, through, &c.;" when you leave a house, say, "Grant, oh Lord, that I may emerge from time to eternity with joy and not with grief, through, &c.;" also, say the Lord's Prayer, and say the Lord's Prayer and the Collect for the day, every hour. Let the passing of a corner of a street, the ascending and descending of a pair of stairs, in short, let every thing, be an occasion of prayer. The benefit of such a habit, will be incalculable, and, both here, and hereafter, will have its "own exceeding great reward." The "Evening Prayer" of the Church, should be recited, with the same punctuality as the "Morning Prayer." If you put this system into practice, you will have the satisfaction of reflecting, when you retire for the night, that you have prayed for each, and all, of the human family, under all the possible circumstances of life. Every public and private evil has been deprecated, every general and special blessing has been implored: God has been glorified, man has been aided, and the christian has conscientiously, "understandingly," and "spiritually," discharged the most solemn and important duty which can engage the attention of an immortal soul!

Let me recommend an excellent work entitled the "Christian's Manual," by Jones of Nayland, republished in America, by Bishop Hobart. And also Rev. Mr. Odenheimer's excellent edition of Bishop Wilson's "Sacra Privata." The Devout Churchman's Companion.

Selected from Grimshaw's Etymological Dictionary.

ANTHEM. A hymn, sung in alternate parts; any holy song. Greek, anthimnos; from anti, opposite to, and humneo, to sing in verse, or to praise.

ANTIPHONY. The answer of one choir to another, when an anthem or psalm is sung by two choirs; alternate singing; the words given out, at the beginning of a psalm, to which both the choirs are to accommodate their singing. G. anti, against, and phone, a song.

ANTISTROPHE. In grammar, the changing of things mutually dependent on each other. Amongst the ancients, that part of a song or dance, before the altar, which was performed by turning from west to east, in opposition to the strophe. G. anti, opposite, and strophe, a turning.

CHAPEL. A house for public worship. French, chapelle. It is said, that the Kings of France, in war, carried into the field St. Martin's hat, which was kept in a tent, as a precious relic; whence, the place took the name of capella, a little hat, and the priest, who had the custody of the tent, was called capellanus, now chaplain.

CLERK. In the dark ages, preceding the revival of letters, the clergy engrossed every branch of learning, and were peculiarly remarkable for their knowledge of law. The English judges were therefore, usually created out of the sacred order, and all the inferior officers were supplied by the lower clergy; which has occasioned their successors to be denominated clerks, to this day: and hence the same title is given to all persons employed in any subordinate office, that requires a knowledge of writing or accounts. Latin, clericus, a clergyman: G. Kleros, a lot, or office.

FUNERAL. The solemnity which attends the consignment of a body to the grave. L. funeris, gen. of funus, a funeral: from funis, a cord; because lighted cords or torches were carried, by the Romans, before the bodies which were interred by night.

PARISH. The particular charge of a secular priest; the district which contributes to the support of a clergyman of the established church. Low L. parochia: French, paroisse: G. parokia: para, near to, and oikeo, to dwell; referring to an ancient convent: the inhabitants of which had the charge of a district, such as we now denominate a parish.

PSALM. A holy song. G. psalmos, a tune for a musical instrument; from psallo, to strike [the harp-strings:] psallo signifies, also, to praise in song—the harp being originally used for songs of praise; as by David.

RUBRIC. Directions printed in books of law, and in prayer-books; originally distinguished by being in red ink. L. rubrica; ruber, red.

SARCOPHAGUS. Originally signified a stone, in which dead bodies, when inclosed, consumed, and wasted away, bones and all, except the teeth, in about forty days. It now signifies a sepulchre of the usual kind. L. sarcophagus: G. sarx, flesh, and phago, to eat.

SECULAR. Relating to affairs of this world; not spiritual:—in the Church of Rome, not bound by monastic rules. L. secularis: seculum, an age or period of man's life: secula, a scythe, (from seco, to cut;) alluding to the emblematical scythe of time.

Thirty-second Annual Report of the Female Episcopal Benevolent Society

Again we meet to unite our voices in thanksgiving and praise to our merciful Benefactor, "plenteous in goodness and truth," by whose Divine grace we have been preserved during the year which is past, and by whose favour we, as your Managers, are enabled to lay before you the brief record of what has been done since we last met.

Seed-time and harvest, summer and winter have passed with their accustomed vicissitudes:—yet have they brought no changes in our relations towards each other, nor have the objects of our mutual solicitude ceased, in any wise, to require our aid and protection.—Twenty-eight pensioners, aged or infirm women, have been, during the past year, the recipients of our bounty—and one who hitherto shared it, Mrs. Bond, has, as we hope, entered into her eternal rest.

In our last report, it was intimated that certain modifications were contemplated in our system of distribution. Until then, food, as well as clothing, had been measured out in kind, according to the apparent necessities of the individual: but experience had shown that diversities of taste and disposition might better be gratified by allowing to our pensioners a certain degree of freedom in the choice of their allotments, and that this very desirable object could be effected without any sacrifice of economy. Each pensioner, consequently, is now permitted, with the approbation of the Local Committee, to purchase for herself at a prescribed place, and to a given amount, such commodities as she may prefer:—and if, by her superior economy or self-denial, her bills fall below the given amount, she is entitled to draw the remainder of her allowance in money, to be expended at her pleasure. Up to this time, we have reason to be entirely satisfied with the results of this system; and as our oversight is immediate, the existence of abuses is scarcely to be apprehended as yet, none have been suspected.

In view of our present undertaking, it cannot be necessary to offer a word of argument or persuasion to the members of a society, each individual of which has enjoyed the training of our common church in the knowledge of the paramount duty of alms-giving. In the terse language of a contemporary, "It is a means of grace as much as prayer. Scripture ascribes to it a tremendous influence upon the soul, and upon its destiny. You cannot give too much, unless you impoverish your own. The more you give away on earth, with motives which are right, the more you will have in heaven. Do good unto all men. Give first to your own parish poor, and then to the rest of the poor of your church, and then scatter abroad."

In pursuing the objects of our present association, the path of duty is plain. They who look to us for succour are of our own household of faith—of our own parishes—to whom we are bound by every tie of christian charity. Many are the privations and hardships which they endure, and it is a blessing for which we can never be sufficiently thankful, that our Heavenly Father, in his goodness, has granted to us the happiness of being able in some degree to alleviate these sufferings. Who, then, can forbear to give piously, liberally, gladly; not from paltry motives of ostentation, nor even to indulge the sensibilities of a gentle nature; but from the trustful obedience which becomes the children of Him who hath said, "Be merciful after thy power—If thou hast much, give plentifully—if thou hast little, do thy diligence to give gladly of that little—and then the face of the Lord shall not be turned from thee."

PASTORAL LETTER, IN BEHALF OF DOMESTIC MISSIONS.

Dearly beloved in the Lord,

The solemn Advent season is again at hand: to remind us of our merciful redemption in Christ Jesus; to forewarn us of the awful judgment. Not for a mute and passive acquiescence, in the one; nor for a dead and barren consternation, at the other, but to arouse us to repentance; and to that living faith in Him, which brings forth "fruits meet for repentance." The text is clear and plain, as in those words of holy Paul, which are the opening verse of the Epistle for the season: "owe no man any thing, but to love one another; for he that loveth another hath fulfilled the Law." The duty, positive and paramount: "as we have opportunity," to "do good unto all men, especially unto them who are of the household of faith."

The opportunity, beloved, is present, instant, urgent. Our brethren in the West are pining and perishing, for help. In the earnest language of our first Missionary Bishop, the diligent, the devoted, the inestimable, Kemper; "we, in the West, in the midst of our labours, so important, so promising, are almost left to perish." And this, when, in the language of the same Bishop, "Wisconsin, the youngest diocese, exceeds, in the number of her Clergy and communicants, twelve or fourteen other dioceses; and Indiana, with more than twenty parishes, shows what can be done, with the blessing of God, in a country, where, thirteen years ago, the Church was unknown." Who can resist this double argument; on the one hand, of necessity; and on the other, of encouragement? Certainly, not the Churchmen of New Jersey!

I adopt, then, as my own, the request, presented in a recent circular, addressed "to the Bishops, Clergy and Laity of the Protestant Episcopal Church," by the Domestic Committee of the Board of Missions: and affectionately ask, that this Pastoral Letter be read in the Churches of this diocese, on Sunday next; and, that, the alms at the Offertory in every Church, on Advent Sunday, be appropriated, not without prayer, to the support of the Domestic Missions of this Church. "Freely ye have received; freely give."

Affectionately and faithfully, your Pastor, and servant in Christ,

GEORGE W. DOANE, Bishop of New Jersey.

Riverside, twenty-second Sunday after Trinity, 1848.

Western New York.—CONFIRMATION.—On Sunday Nov. 12th, Bishop DeLancey, visited Zion church, East Bloomfield. In the morning prayers were read by the Rev. P. M. Stryker, the missionary of the station, who also administered adult baptism to six persons. The Bishop read the ante-communion service, and preached. In the afternoon the Rev. Mr. Stryker read prayers and confirmation preface, and the Bishop preached and confirmed twelve persons, including one sick person in private.—Gos. Mess.

Connecticut.—CONSECRATION.—The church recently erected in the village of Winsted, was consecrated under the name of St. James' church by the Rt. Rev. the Bishop of the Diocese, on All Saints day November 1st.

The Bishop was attended on the occasion by the following clergymen; the Rev. Drs. Fuller and Williams; the Rev. Messrs. Watson, Covell, Chauncey, Coxe, Nicholls, Atwill, and Frisbie, of the Diocese of Connecticut, the Rev. Mr. Wright of Mass., the Rev. Mr. West, agent of the Foreign Committee of the Board of Missions; and the Rector of the parish.

The procession was formed at the house of the Hon. Wm. S. Holabird soon after 10 o'clock, A. M. As the Bishop and Clergy entered the Church repeating the 24th Psalm, the Congregation rose and seemed throughout the whole to participate with deep interest in the services. The instrument of Donation was read by the Rector of the newly formed parish. The consecrating prayers were said by the Bishop, and the letter of Consecration was read by the Rev. Mr. Watson. Morning Prayer as far as the second lesson, was read by the Rev. Dr. Williams, and continued to its close by the Rev. Mr. Chauncey. The Bishop then proceeded with the Ante-communion service, the Commandments being read by the Rev. Dr. Fuller, the Epistle by the Rev. Mr. Frisbie, and the gospel by the Rev. Dr. Fuller. The sermon was preached by the Rev. A. C. Coxe, from Gen. xxviii. 17: "This is none other but the house of God, and this is the gate of Heaven." This most appropriate and eloquent sermon was listened to with the deepest interest.

After the sermon the Bishop administered the rite of Confirmation to four persons, the Rector reading the Confirmation preface. The edifice thus set apart to the worship and service of Almighty God, though small and plain, is neat and appropriate, and possesses all the essential features of a church. It is of the pointed style of architecture, corresponding most nearly with that which is commonly designated Early English. It consists of a nave, chancel, and tower, being placed east and west with the chancel at the east end, and the tower at the west. The nave is fifty-seven feet by twenty-eight from out to out. It has a single alley five feet wide, and the seats are open and so arranged as to perfectly convenient for kneeling. The roof is open timber, of a simple, but it is thought most excellent design. There are five sets of principal rafters with three purlins on either side. These principals are framed at the foot into tie-beams, which rest upon the plates, and rise so as to intersect one another at some distance above their middle point. Each tie is framed at the upper extremity into the opposite principal and strongly fastened by an iron stay. The spaces between the principals and ties are ornamented with trefoils and quaterfoils. At the east end of the Nave are the Reading Desk and Pulpit, the former on the north the latter on the south. At the west end is a Singing Gallery with a recess in the Tower for an Organ. The windows are in good proportion, being twelve feet long by two wide, and are filled with red-tinted enamelled glass. The walls are blocked and colored in imitation of stone. The inside wood work is grained black walnut.

The Chancel is thirteen feet deep by fourteen wide, corresponding in style to that of the Nave. It is raised three steps above the Nave. The window in the east end is a triple lancet, the middle compartment being wider and higher than the side. Directly under the window and against the wall is the altar. The work of the chancel is all neat, but the only ornament is a small gilt cross directly back of and above the altar. The Altar rail is within the Chancel about one third of the distance from the west end.

The Tower is nine feet square upon the ground, and is surmounted by a beautiful octagonal spire which rises to the height of eighty-two feet and terminates in a finial. At the corners of the Tower as well as of the Nave and Chancel there are flaring buttresses, surmounted by pinnacles and finials. The covering of the Church is plank, placed horizontally, and grooved in imitation of blocks of stone, and painted and sanded of the color of New Jersey free stone.

On the north side of the Church there is a Vestry room, and on the south another room of the same size which will answer the purpose of a Library room. The nature of the lot is such as to have required basement walls under fifty feet of the east end; we have thus a very fine room under the Church which is at present designed for a school room; this arrangement however does not injure the good appearance of the Church.

The little Church in Winsted is the result of the combined offerings of many Churchmen, united with the quite liberal contributions of the people of the place. A parish was formed a few days before the consecration and commences with good courage, although it is necessarily small at the outset. A goodly number of people have been already gathered into a congregation, and it is thought that the prospects of the parish are encouraging. The planting of the Church, however, in any place is a work of time; and we trust that those who have given their alms for the promotion of this object will not cease to offer their prayers for its success.—Witness.

Maryland.—A PASTORAL LETTER TO THE CLERGY AND LAITY OF THE DIOCESE OF MARYLAND.—Dear Brethren—I have been once more appealed to by the Domestic Committee of our Board of Missions, to call your attention to the demands of that portion of the work of the Church.

I cannot think it needful again to go over the ground on which our duty to meet those demands has been so often urged, as well by me, in my annual Addresses to the Convention of the Diocese, and in previous Pastoral Letters, as by other and more efficient advocates. Personal observation and inquiry have satisfied me that there are few among us, who yet require to be convinced of the duty of supporting the provisions made by the Church for supplying the necessities; the remotely scattered; the ignorant; the uninformed and prejudiced, and the indifferent, with means and inducements to work out their own salvation in the way of God's appointment. We are deficient, not in a sense of duty (such as it is) but in prompt, efficient, steady discharge of duty. The son in the parable, who owned his father's bidding, and did it not, is too nearly our representative.

The remedy for this is, in some degree, in the keeping of the clergy. Their general agreement in any mode of presenting to the Laity their duty with regard to the several branches of the missionary work of the Church, and faithful, untiring, and unintermitting prosecution of that mode, would undoubtedly in time bring about a better state of things.

With this end in view, I have repeatedly urged, and now again do urge, the regular use of the offertory, with collections after morning sermon, (or that of the afternoon, where there has been no morning service,) and the frequent presentation, in sermons and addresses, of the duty of contributing a portion of our worldly goods to the support and extension of the ministry and ordinances of the Gospel.

With that same end, the Board of Missions and its Committees have, in former years, specified certain days as suitable for general collections for determinate objects; that at such times, at least, the attention of the whole Church might be fixed upon those objects, and an effort of the whole Church be obtained in their behalf.

As such a day for general effort, ADVENT SUNDAY NEXT is now named by the Domestic Committee, in the hope that throughout the Church, the Clergy will on that day afford to the Laity an opportunity of contributing to the maintenance of the Domestic Missions of the Church under the management of its General Board; and that the Laity will show themselves disposed gladly and liberally to avail themselves of the opportunity thus given.

In the hope of the Committee, as regards this Diocese, I humbly and heartily join, and do affectionately and urgently solicit my brethren of the clergy throughout the Diocese, that they will take such measures that every parish and congregation may be found contributing its proportion, be it more or less, as God shall have given the many or the few composing it ability and will, to the Advent Collection for Domestic Missions.

Faithfully and affectionately

Your Servant in CHRIST JESUS,

WILLIAM ROLLINSON WHITTINGHAM,

Bishop of Maryland.

Virginia.—ST. JOHN'S CHURCH, PORTSMOUTH.—On the 28th of October, the corner Stone of St. John's Church, in the town of Portsmouth, was laid by the Rev. DAVID CALDWELL, Rector of St. Paul's Church, Norfolk city, the Rev. Geo. D. Cummins, and Rev. John McCabe, each taking part in the religious services, after which, appropriate masonic ceremonies were performed. Our beloved Bishop Meade was expected to have been present, and to have laid the corner stone, but circumstances beyond his control prevented his arriving in this part of the diocese until the succeeding day. The Box deposited in the corner stone contained, the Holy Bible, the Book of Common Prayer, the proceedings of the Diocesan Convention held in Norfolk in May last, the constitution of the Protestant Episcopal Society for the promotion of Evangelical knowledge of Virginia, the last number of the Southern Churchman, the last number of the Episcopal Recorder, sundry ancient and modern coins.

Also the following memorandum:

This Corner Stone of St. John's Church, was laid on the 28th day of October, 1848, by the Rev. David Caldwell, Rector of St. Paul's Church, Norfolk City, the congregation of St. John's Church being at that time under his pastoral care.

Michigan.—A NEW CHURCH.—We are glad to learn, from a secular paper, that St. Luke's Church, Kalamazoo, Michigan, was consecrated to the service of Almighty God on Wednesday, the 18th ult., being the Festival of St. Luke the Evangelist, by the Rev. Dr. McCroskey. The procession was formed at the vestry-room door, consisting of the Bishop of the Diocese, of the Rev. Mr. Cole, Rector of the Church, and formerly of the Diocese of Rhode Island, and the Rev. Messrs. Cuming, Taylor, Selkrig, and Elder, of the Diocese of Michigan, of the Rev. Mr. Brown, of the Diocese of Indiana, and of Messrs. Underwood, Selkrig and Krause, of the Church choir. As the procession passed around to the front entrance, the 122d Psalm of David, from the Psalter, was sung to a gregorian chant. The Bishop was received at the door of the Church by the Messrs. Hoskins and Clapham, wardens, and by other of the vestry and congregation. The Bishop and Clergy then proceeded to the chancel, repeating the 24th Psalm. When seated in the chancel, the Bishop received the request to consecrate, from E. Hoskins, Esq., senior warden, and laid the same upon the communion table. The sentence of consecration was read by the Rector of the Parish, and also laid upon the communion table. The Rev. Mr. Cuming began the Morning Prayer, the Rev. Mr. Selkrig read the Lessons, the Rev. Mr. Taylor read the creed and following collects, the Rev. Mr. Brown read the Litany, the Bishop began the ante-communion service, the Rector read the Epistle and the Gospel, the Bishop preached and administered the Holy Communion, assisted by the Clergy present; the Rev. Mr. Elder, from indisposition, was prevented from taking part in the interesting services.

On the afternoon of the same day, after Evening Prayer by the Rector, assisted in the Lessons by the Rev. Mr. Brown, of Michigan City, Indiana, the Bishop preached and confirmed eight persons.

In the evening, after service by the Rev. Mr. Taylor, and sermon by the Rev. Mr. Cuming, the Bishop pronounced the Benediction. The music, which was extremely good, added much to the interest of those services.—Witness.

CLERICAL CHANGES.—The Rev. M. C. Lightner having resigned the charge of Christ Church, Danville, and accepted a unanimous call to the Rectorship of St. David's, Manayunk, requests that his letters and papers may be directed to the latter place, after the 3rd of Dec. next.

The Rev. N. G. Allen, having accepted a call to St. John's Church, East Boston, requests all letters and pamphlets for him to be directed accordingly.

The Rev. Timothy F. Wardwell, having closed his engagements as assistant Minister of St. Luke's Church, Rochester, and removed to St. Peter's Church, Dansville, requests his letters and papers to be addressed accordingly.

The Rev. Charles Tomes having accepted a call to the Rectorship of Christ Church, Nashville, Tennessee, requests that his letters and papers be directed accordingly.

Recantation.—Mr. Henry Gerald Spillan, formerly a writer in the Tablet, Mr. David O'Leary, a student from Maynooth, and other Roman Catholics read their recantation in St. Thomas' Church, Dublin, on Sunday week.

"Be Pitiful."

BY THE REV. EDWARD C. JONES.

Servant of Christ—alas! how oft,
With languid faith and senses dull,
Hast thou the import large forgot,
Of those sweet words—"Be Pitiful,"

And yet how binding is the Law,
Which love of self can ne'er annul,
The Law, which, taxing every heart,
Would bid each pulse—"Be pitiful."

"Be pitiful"—for, longing eyes,
Moist with such tears as Pilgrims shed,
Through blinding drops look up to Thee,
When Hope is wrecked, and sunlight fled.

And he, who, in temptation's hour,
Poor child of frailty, strayed and fell,
Shall in thine ear with quivering tone,
His tale of sad defection tell.

Say not—'tis hard to stoop to woe,
Nor yield but stunted sympathy;
Go, condescend to lowliest deed,
When sin abused a God for thee,

Not sleep to woe? Yon sunbeam bright,
Can nestle in a flower's breast,
The Star can give itself to Earth;
When mirrored 'neath the billow's crest,

Those Rainbow tints which paint the cloud,
Can linger on the dancing spray,
The Bird which carols far aloft,
Can chirp in quiet glens its lay.

So, child of Jesus, speed to bless,
The humblest soul that craves thy care,
Mindful, that for each gentle act,
Thou shalt a Saviour's favour share.

Then, chronicled beyond the stars,
"Thy righteous dealing" all shall be,
And Mercy, in the day of ire,
Shall spring, a healing stream, for thee.

Selections.

From The Bishop of Oxford's Charge.

THE BISHOP AND HIS CLERGY.

The actings of this office are, as I have said, circumscribed and narrowed amongst ourselves until there scarcely is left to it any authority, save that which man gave not, and which man cannot take away—its spiritual authority, amongst those who believe it to be God's appointment, and who honour it for His sake. As far as regards the withdrawal of many of those external aids which heretofore increased its sway, it may be, that the wisdom of God has permitted their gradual removal, in order thus to free it from the secularity which, so soon as the powers of the world are on her side, is always ready to creep over the offices of Christ's Church. It may be, that He is intending thus to call forth within the Church of this nation a more lively sense of that dispensation of His Spirit which He has verily bestowed upon her; and to teach her to trust in things divine more simply to that promised Presence of Himself with her, in which alone, and not in any arm of flesh, can be her strength. Certain it is, that wherever this apostolic office has been administered in faith and prayer, with singleness of aim and humility of soul, and where have gathered around it a faithful Laity and Clergy, seeing in it God's appointment, that there it has been ever found to be at once the living spring and tempering rule of united, and therefore effectual action for our Lord and Master.

It is as holding, however unworthily, such an office, that I come to-day amongst you; desiring greatly to be amongst you, through the aid of God, as a partner of your labours, a sharer of your griefs, a lightener of your anxieties, a helper of your joy; earnestly entreating your prayers that I may have grace so to fulfil the duties of my office, that, at the great day, I may give up my account with joy; and bespeaking, my reverend brethren, your forbearance towards the infirmities and errors which may attend my administration, your candid interpretation of much which, as years pass on, suspicion might distrust, or maliciousness pervert; your confidence in the singleness and simplicity of my desire to discharge its duties, as in God's sight, and your full and cheerful co-operation with me in the due fulfilment of our great common trust.

It is as having this trust in common that we meet here to take counsel together as to our common interests. That we should so consult together, I deem most important; for without such united counsels, that union which is essential to our strength must be impossible. And, on this account, I greatly lament the change which has gradually passed over these our Diocesan gatherings.

Excellent as in many respects is the working of that law of necessary publicity to which almost all action is now subjected, it is, undoubtedly, a great hindrance to taking counsel when it must be taken in public: and a Bishop's visitation would be another, and for his Diocese, I believe, a far more effectual instrument of good, if he then spoke only to those immediately concerned with the matters as to which he speaks, and consulted with those only with whom he has to work.

Such an institution, however, a visitation cannot now be; and the impossibility of its being so makes me the more desire to supply this lack of free intercourse by other provisions. It is with this view that I have proposed to the Rural Deans and other officers of the Diocese, what their kindness has enabled me hitherto to carry out, that we should spend annually some days together at Cuddesdon, for common prayer and common counsel.

Greatly should I rejoice to carry out this practice further amongst the body of the Clergy, should it be desired by any number of them. The spirit of earnest piety has, I believe, been kept alive in other branches of Christ's Church, favoured far less than we are in purity of faith and doctrine, by nothing so much as by such habitual meetings of the Bishop with his Clergy, for some days of separation from all worldly business, for mutual counsel and prayer, and reading God's word, and meditation, and partaking together of the holy Eucharist.

It is, moreover, to give practical reality to this close connexion between myself and those who labour in the several parochial charges of the Diocese, that I have required,—as I have already stated to you through the Archdeacons,—that I should be consulted before any unlicensed Clergyman officiates more than three times within the Diocese: and, for the same purpose, I now express my desire that in this Diocese, as in many others, no formal nomination should be given to a Curate until the Incumbent has consulted me upon his fitness for the proposed cure.

To secure further this inter-communion, and, as far as possible, to make the Episcopal office felt in your several parishes to be a living reality, and not a mere abstraction, it is moreover my desire, my reverend brethren, to join as often as possible in your parochial services. I wish that I could hope to be occasionally with all; but this the extent of an English Diocese makes well-nigh impossible. But it will be my endeavour to be from time to time with as many as opportunity allows in their ordinary Sunday services. These and our other meetings will, I trust, give us many opportunities for that free intercourse and closer converse which I am most anxious to maintain with you, and which many circumstances render little possible at this our mere official meeting. Whilst, however, it no longer affords scope for this, we may, through God's aid, render it not a little useful. We may profitably take together a more general view of our position,—of its strength, and of its weakness, of its duties and its blessings.

INFLUENCE OF THE CLERGY.

The Confirmation progress which carried me to so many places in the Diocese, showed me our parochial system in actual exercise. I saw in the work which God is enabling us to do, much for which heartily to thank Him; I saw, as was natural to a fresh eye, charged with such an oversight, many of the weaknesses which mar our full success.

And of these, my reverend brethren, there is one upon which for many reasons, I desire to speak to you with all plainness—I mean our frequent want of union amongst ourselves; a want which too often grows into absolute disunion.

There is much in his very position which tends unless he is watchful against the danger, to separate the English parochial Clergyman from his brethren. He has his own charge, his own circle of duties and difficulties, his own way of meeting and performing them; his brethren have theirs. He has no concern in their parishes; they have none in his: thus his sympathies become narrowed: he is a little sovereign in his own realm; he views with some dislike customs which vary from, and perhaps condemn, his own; he does not feel that he is administering one part of a common system; he has the independence, and with it, rely upon it, he has the weakness of individual action. The chief external guards against this danger seem to be, (1) in the living action of the common Episcopate, by which each separate ministry may feel itself drawn up into a common head: and, (2) in a greater amount of intercourse, upon directly religious and parochial subjects, between the Clergy themselves. To promote this, the Rural Deans have kindly acted upon my request, in inviting their brethren to the rural chapters, at which they may partake together of the highest act of Christian worship and communion, and discuss with friendly openness all the various questions which arise in the course of every ministry.

Here then is a special work for us, to be at once the advocates and correctors of the poor; to watch for them and their right: to witness for them and their claims, to those who have, as stewards, what is too soon likely to seem to them their own; and yet, at the same time, instead of flattering the poor by the false pretence that all is right in them, and all wrong in those above them, to seek to train them, in their special duties of patient contentment and obedience; to stimulate and to guide the consciences of all, by plain, homely, earnest, real preaching from God's Word, which shall reach both rich and poor, by bringing home to each, in their actual present temptations, their sin and their Saviour, their separation and their brotherhood. A true Christian sympathy is the golden key which will open hearts to us: we must use it in the Church, in the school, in the cottage,—in the last as much as in the first. If England is to be preserved in the peace and happiness which more than any other land she has so long enjoyed, it must be by God's blessing on our labours, and on the instruments which we have to use. Much as legislation may do in many ways, it cannot do all, or nearly all, which must be done. Laws will not reach men's hearts; and nothing short of reaching their hearts will meet our needs. We must aim at reaching these; and it is mainly through the ties and affections of family life that we can hope to reach them; and through these we must bring to bear upon them the higher influences of the spiritual life. Thus must we win from them a hearing for the Word of God, thus bring them to holy Sacraments, and so leading them on from things earthly to things heavenly, bring them indeed under the healing hands of Christ our Lord. For in all our efforts at social improvement, we must bear in mind this our highest object.

Now, in looking practically into the degree in which, as a body, we are enabled to succeed in this our work, I am led to think that what, above all other things, we need, is the power of kindling amongst our flocks a warmer spirit of devotion. Here, I am convinced, is our great deficiency. We have many who respect us, and listen to us; who are decent, orderly, well-behaved; but we want more decided converts from the love of this world; more who are really won to the love of God in Christ; and, as the result of this, more and heartier worshippers, instead of merely decent listeners, within our Churches. This gift, of course, like every other, must come of God: but it is our duty to see whether any lack in us prevents our receiving it, or whether we can do any thing more earnestly to seek it.

HOLY COMMUNION—BAPTISM.

Believing as we do, that this great ordinance is not merely a well-contrived invention for exciting our religious sympathy or sensibility, but that it is also a special means of grace, in which the souls of the faithful are strengthened and refreshed by the body and blood of Christ, as our bodies are by the bread and wine, I see not how we can expect our people to flourish in things spiritual, with the scanty opportunities of such refreshment allowed them in too many parishes. This state of things is in fact, the painful consequence of a time of coldness and unfaithfulness, from which we have I trust, through God's great mercy, passed; and I would earnestly beseech you, my reverend brethren, by gradual alterations, so to restore the older and better custom as to let the monthly Eucharist be, in every parish, the least frequent celebration of this holy feast; and where the number of communicants required by the Rubric is oftener to be found, to multiply still further, as you see expedient, these opportunities of communion. I cannot doubt but that a new era of spiritual life would be attained in many a parish, if such an increase in the number of celebrations were introduced with plain, earnest, and affectionate addresses and explanations to your people, as to the great privilege thus secured to them, and the love of Christ in its provision.

In close connexion with this subject, let me strongly urge upon you a strict observance of the rule laid down for us by the Church, that we administer holy Baptism on Sundays and holy-days in the face of the congregation. In parishes where this rule has become obsolete, it will of course require judgment, gentleness, patience, and kindness to restore the true use without giving injurious offence to those for whose sake it is observed. But this offence may, I am convinced, be prevented, by full explanations, both public and private, of the obligation and benefit of the rule, and by gentleness in its enforcement; by commencing, for instance, at least, with holding, on one Sunday in the month, a public baptism in the course of the service, and on other Sundays winning all who can be won, to remain and take their part, immediately after the public service, in the prayers with which these little ones are brought to Christ.

THE SWEETEST MUSIC.—Music is sweetest when heard over rivers, where the echo thereof is best rebounded by the waters. Praise for pensiveness, thanks for tears, and blessing God over the floods of affliction, make the most melodious music in the ear of heaven.—Fuller.

Order of Divine Service in the Primitive Church.

SIR.—"The order of celebrating public worship in the ancient Christian Church of the first three centuries can hardly fail to be of interest to all your readers. As the books in which the accounts of it are to be found are rarely to be met with, it may be acceptable to many, both of the laity and clergy, to have before them the following paper, setting forth the exact rules, or, as we now commonly call them, rubrics; extracted from the first volume of the Collection of Ecclesiastical Councils, by Labbe and Cossart.

Yours truly,

ARTHUR PERCIVAL,
Queen's Chaplain.

Little Bookham, Sept. 7, 1848.

All being properly seated, and there being silence, let the reader in the midst, from a raised place, read the Books of Moses, Joshua, Judges, Kings, Chronicles, Ezra on the return of the people, Job and Solomon, and the sixteen prophets. After every two lessons let another sing the Psalms of David; the people joining at the beginning of the verses. Then let the Acts of the Apostles be read and the Epistles of Paul: and then let a presbyter or deacon read the Gospels. And when the Gospel is read, let all, clergy and people, stand in solemn silence.—(Apost. Const. ii. 57.)

After the reading of the Law and the Prophets, and Epistles, and Acts and Gospels, let the Bishop salute the Church, saying:

The Grace of our Lord Jesus Christ, and the love of God the Father, and the fellowship of the Holy Ghost, be with you all!

People.—And with thy spirit.

After this salutation let the presbyters separately, and last of all the bishop, address to the people words of exhortation. And when the bishop has finished his teaching, let all stand up, and let the deacon ascend the platform and proclaim:

Let none of the hearers, let none of the unbelievers remain!

And, silence being made, let him say:

'Catechumens, pray!

And let all the faithful pray earnestly for them, saying:
Lord have mercy!

Let him minister for them, saying:

Let us all pray God for the catechumens. [Here follows what is called a bidding prayer, in which the deacon specified the different blessings for the catechumens, for which he made the prayers of the Church, ending with these words to the catechumens.] Bow down and receive the blessing!

At every one of the things which the deacon proclaims as above, let all the people, but especially the children, say:

Lord have mercy!

And when they have all bent their heads, let the bishop bless them after this fashion:

[Here follows a prayer by the bishop in answer to the bidding of the deacon:]

After this, let the deacon say:

Catechumens, depart in peace!

When they are gone out let him say:

Pray, ye that are vexed with unclean spirits!

Let us all earnestly pray for them. [Here follows another bidding prayer for these persons, ending as before.] Bow down and receive the blessing!

And let the bishop bless them, saying:

[Here follows a prayer for the vexed by the bishop, corresponding to the bidding of the deacon.]

Deacon. Ye that are vexed, depart!

After these, let him proclaim:

Pray, ye that are instructed for Baptism.

[By these are meant persons whose catechising was completed, and who were waiting for the season of Baptism, in those times ordinarily administered at Easter or Whitsuntide.]

Let all the faithful pray earnestly for them. [Here follows another bidding prayer for these persons.]

When they have signed themselves unto the Lord through His Christ, let them bow down and receive blessing from the bishop after this fashion:

[Here follows a prayer by the bishop for these persons.]

Deacon.—Ye that are instructed for Baptism, depart!

After this let him proclaim:

Pray earnestly, ye that are in repentance, [i. e. under ecclesiastical censure.]

Let us all make supplication for the brethren in repentance. [Here follows another bidding prayer for the penitents, ending.] Bow down and receive the blessing.

Then let the bishop pray for them thus, with imposition of hands. [Here follows a prayer for the penitents by the bishop.]

Deacon.—Ye that are in repentance, depart!

Deacon.—Let none of them who ought not, depart! Let all the faithful bow the knee, and let us all pray God. [Here follows a bidding prayer for the faithful, all estates of men in the Church, and all enemies and persecutors.]

Chief Priest.—[Here follows a prayer beginning, "Almighty and Most High Lord.]"

Deacon.—Let us attend!

Bishop.—The peace of God be with you all!

People.—And with thy spirit!

Deacon.

Salute ye one another with an holy kiss!

Then let the clergy salute the bishop; the men the men, and the women the women. Let the children stand on the rise, and let another deacon be over them, that they make no disorder. Let other deacons walk about and observe the men and the women, that there be no noise, nor nodding, nor whispering, nor sleeping. Let some deacons stand at the doors by which the men come into church, and sub-deacons at the women's entrance, and take care that no one go out, and that the door be not opened during the time of the Offertory, not even for one of the faithful. Let one of the sub-deacons minister water to the priests to wash their hands, in token of the purity of their hearts, which are dedicated to God.

Then immediately let the deacon say:

Let none of the catechumens be present! nor any of the hearers! nor of the unbelievers! nor of the heretics! Let those who are permitted to hear the first prayer depart! Let the mothers attend to their children! Let no one harbour evil against another! Let none be present in hypocrisy! Let us stand upright to make offering before the Lord with fear and trembling!

When these things are done, let the deacons present the gifts to the Bishop at the altar; and let the presbyters stand on his right hand and on his left, as disciples in attendance on their master. Let two deacons stand one on each side of the altar, having fans of thin skin, or peacocks' feathers, or fine linen, to drive away the small insects, lest they fall into the cup.

Then let the chief priest, when he has prayed privately with the priests, clothed in bright garments, stand at the altar, and when he has made the sign of the cross on his forehead in the presence of all the people, let him say:

The grace of the Almighty God, and the love of our Lord Jesus Christ, and the communion of the Holy Ghost, be with you all!

Let all with one voice say:

And with thy spirit!

Chief Priest.—Lift up your hearts.

People.—We have lift them up unto the Lord.

Chief Priest.—Let us give thanks unto the Lord.

People.—It is meet and right so to do.

Chief Priest.

It is very meet and right above all things to praise thee. [Here follows a long enumeration of causes of thanksgiving, concluding thus.] The cherubim and six winged seraphim, with two wings covering their feet, with two their faces, and using two for flight, say, with thousand times thousand archangels, and ten thousand times ten thousand angels, crying without cessation or interruption:

Let all the people say together:

Holy, Holy, Holy Lord of Sabaoth, heaven and earth are full of thy glory. Blessed be Thou for ever. Amen.

Chief Priest.

For Thou art truly holy and most holy, the highest and most exalted for ever, thine holy and only begotten son, our Lord and God Jesus Christ. [Here follows an enumeration of the mercies of Jesus Christ to men under the earlier dispensations and under the new, until His Ascension.] We, therefore, being mindful of the things which He underwent for our sakes, give thanks unto Thee, Almighty God, not as we ought, but as we can: and fulfil his appointment: "For in the night in which he was betrayed," [here follow the words of institution, ending] "till I come." We, therefore, being mindful of His sufferings and death, and resurrection from the dead, and His return into heaven, and of his future second coming, in which He cometh with glory and power to judge the living and the dead, and to reward every man according to his works, offer, according to His appointment, this bread and this cup to Thee, the King and God, giving thanks to Thee through Him, in that Thou hast made us meet to stand before Thee, to minister unto Thee. And we beseech Thee, O Thou God, who standest in need of nothing, favourably to look upon these gifts placed before Thee; and be Thou pleased with them in honour of Thy Christ, and send Thy Holy Spirit, the witness of the sufferings of the Lord Jesus, upon this sacrifice, that He may make this bread the body of Thy Christ, and this cup the blood of Thy Christ, that they who partake of it may be established in godliness; may obtain remission of sins; be delivered from the devil and his errors; may be filled with the Holy Spirit; may become worthy of Thy Christ, and obtain eternal life, Thou, Almighty Lord, being reconciled to them.

Yet again we pray Thee, O Lord, for thy Holy Church, from one end of the earth to the other. [Here follows a collection of prayers in which all the objects are sought which have been enumerated by the deacon in his bidding prayer.]

People.—Amen.

Bishop.—The peace of God be with you all!

People.—And with thy spirit.

Deacon.

Again and again let us pray God through His Christ, over the gift offered to the Lord God. [Here follows a short bidding prayer.]

Bishop.

O God, great, and of great name. [Here follows a supplication for the mercies specified in the deacon's bidding prayer.]

People.—Amen.

Deacon.—Let us attend!

Bishop.—Holy things for holy persons!

Let the people attend.

Bishop.—One holy, one Lord, one Christ, to the glory of God the Father blessed for ever more. Amen.

Glory to God in the highest, and on earth peace, good will towards men! Hosanna to the Son of David! Blessed is He that cometh in the name of the Lord, God and Lord who hath appeared unto us! Hosanna in the Highest!

Then let the Bishop receive, then the presbyters, deacons, sub-deacons, readers, singers, ascetics; and of the women, the deaconesses, virgins, and widows; lastly the children; and then all the people in order, with modesty and reverence, without noise.

When the bishop giveth the oblation, let him say:]

The body of Christ!

And let him that receiveth say: Amen.

Let the deacon hold the cup, and when he giveth it, let him say:

The blood of Christ! The cup of Life!

And let him that receiveth say: Amen.

While the people communicate, let the thirty-third Psalm [English version, 34th] be recited. When all, both men and women, have communicated, let the deacons take what remains into the sacristy. [Eng. Vestry.]

The Psalm being ended, let the deacon say:

Let us who have been partakers of the precious body and the precious blood of Christ give thanks. [Here follows a short bidding prayer.]

Let the Bishop give thanks.

O Almighty God, the Father of the Christ the blessed Son. [A thanksgiving corresponding with the deacon's bidding.]

People.—Amen.

Deacon.—Bow down to God in his Christ, and receive the blessing. Bishop.—O Almighty God, true and incomparable. [Here follows a prayer for blessing.]

People.—Amen.

Deacon.—Depart in peace!

*NOTE.—The reader will here observe the scrupulous care taken by the framers of this primitive service that none but communicants should be admitted to the privilege of the Offertory. The ancient ecclesiastical records abound with rules to the same effect. It was accounted pollution and profanation that the sacred services, or buildings, or widows, and orphans of the Church, should be sustained by the alms of any not such. They were not received, neither into the sacristy, nor into the more common treasury; in all cases where it was possible they were returned; and where that could not be, applied for the lowest office of procuring fuel. For which reference was made to Levit. vii. 17-19, and xix. 6, 7. Those who would see more upon this subject, not without interest at the present moment, (which allusion will be understood by those whom it concerns,) will find a valuable collection of ecclesiastical authorities upon it in a note to the twenty-eighth Canon of the Council of Eliberis (A. D. 305), in Labbe and Cossart's Magna Concilia, vol. i. pp. 1195-1199.*

A Funeral Discourse.

On the Rev. JOHN C. RUDD, D.D. By the Rev. WILLIAM BERRIAN, D.D., Rector of Trinity Church, New York. Preached at St. John's Church, Elizabethtown, New Jersey, Nov. 19, 1848.

The venerable servant of the Lord who so long ministered among you, my brethren, and who has since, in another sphere, been such an honored instrument in promoting the glory of God and doing good unto men, has at length finished his course, and now rests from his labors. Though for a great many years he had been broken down in body, he was nevertheless unconquered in spirit; continuing his services to the Church till almost literally the last breath of his life, and dying in the midst of his usefulness. He had reached that term when we naturally long for quiet and repose in the active exercise of his intellectual powers, and impressed his own thoughts on thousands, at a time when most men are lost sight of, if not absolutely forgotten.

It will be a melancholy pleasure to give a true and faithful portraiture of the man, who was the friend of my youth and my companion in riper years, and with whom, under all the changes of time and place, I was accustomed to take sweet counsel, till the very stroke which has separated us from each other.

John Churchill Rudd was born at Norwich, Connecticut, in 1780. The precise condition of his parents, and the circumstances of his education, are matters of which, notwithstanding the length of my intimacy with him, I am in a great measure ignorant. I have always supposed, however, that he was one of those active and enterprising men with which the State in which he was born so greatly abounds; who, conscious of their strength, firm in purpose, and persevering in their aim, are bent on making their way in the world not only with the lack of patronage and support, but in spite of all the obstacles which may oppose them. The outset of his life was a constant struggle with difficulties. For it appears that he was for several years engaged in the humble but honorable occupation of a teacher, with a view at once to provide for his immediate wants, and to prepare himself for the higher vocation, to which, in the grace and providence of God, he was afterwards called. With what diligence and success he overcame the disadvantages of his situation, may be fairly inferred from the estimation in which he was held by one of the most acute and sagacious men who ever lived,* and from his speedy settlement in a parish at all times remarkable for its intelligence, refinement, and taste.

My acquaintance with him commenced a short time previous to this event, but did not ripen into intimacy till several years after. By a train of circumstances which it is here unnecessary to explain, I was then brought into such close relations and such frequent intercourse with him, as to enable me to form a just estimate of his mind and character, and of his standing and influence among the people committed to his charge.

Sobriety in his views, soundness of judgment, and a desire to turn all his labors to a practical account, marked even the earliest efforts of his ministry, as they have, in a more eminent degree, distinguished him in his subsequent course. From the very beginning, he seems to have formed his opinions with the utmost care, and then to have held on to them with an unflinching tenacity. Whether for right, or for wrong, it is an element of greatness, without which, as a general rule, no man can attain a lasting ascendancy over the minds of others. What he was at five and twenty when I first knew him, he continued to be at three score and ten—steadfast, immovable, and in every essential point entirely unchanged.

* Dr. Hobart.

He was a Churchman, after the pattern of him whom he regarded as the embodiment of sound Church principles, and whom personally he loved and venerated above all men living. "Evangelical truth and apostolical order"—the motto of the leader whom it was his glory to follow, he regarded as inseparable in the appointment of God, and while he therefore preached the one with fidelity, he set forth the other with fearlessness, and yet, at the same time, with charity and prudence.

But though soberness, soundness, and practical good sense, were the distinguishing features of his mind, yet he was by no means deficient in fertility of invention, and sprightliness of thought. Indeed these qualities were so striking in all his earlier compositions, as to make their union with those higher gifts somewhat remarkable. He particularly excelled in his delineation of scriptural characters, where his active imagination, aided by his nice and accurate observation of human life and the human heart, enabled him to fill up the brief sketches of the sacred volume with so much skill, and to adorn them with such touches of feeling, as to give them an unusual degree of interest and truth. From his persuasion that these were among the happiest of his productions, which was strengthened no doubt by the opinions of his friends, he had entered into some communications with myself and others with a view to their publication, but a very short time before his death.

It is proper, however, to remark, in connection with the character of his discourses, that much of their just and natural effect was lost in their delivery from the pulpit by certain physical disadvantages under which he labored, even before his health was impaired, and by the want of that ease and freedom which the most thorough education can alone impart. But still, as there was gravity, sincerity, conscientiousness, together with an earnest desire that they might be profitable unto those to whom they were addressed, and as the matter of them was always fitted to make them so; they were listened to by his flock with respectful attention, and followed, by God's blessing, with the fruits of good-living.

But the power and influence of this excellent man over the minds of his people were owing more to his social character and the kindness of his disposition, than to his intellectual gifts. To those who have only known him in the feebleness and infirmity of age, when from almost incessant pain he rarely had that placid air which naturally belonged to him, and when his tongue with difficulty gave utterance to the thoughts which were still prompted by the warmth of his feelings, no adequate conception can be formed of him, as he appeared to his parishioners and friends in early life. Then the openness and benignity of his countenance, were in perfect harmony with the frankness of his manners and the benevolence of his heart. His kind and gentle words fell pleasantly upon the ear, and his cordial sympathies with every human being, with whom he stood in any endearing relation, touched tenderly upon the heart. There was nothing that in any way affected them, whether for weal or for woe, in which he was not concerned; and though in "the changes and chances of this mortal life" he had much to endure, and therefore much to blunt his sensibility in regard to others, yet to the very last he retained the same kindness of feeling, and in this respect, at least, left most men his debtors.

He was called to this parish* in 1805, and left it in 1820, from considerations which seemed to justify the measure, though nevertheless with lingering regret and inexpressible pain. And here, after a circle of twenty years more, his thoughts fondly returned to the scene of his early labors, and it was his especial request several months before his death, that his remains should be brought hither, in order no doubt that he might receive the tribute of grief and affection from the friends who should survive him, and that his ashes might be mingled with those of his people.† The tenderness of the thought, cannot fail to awaken a corresponding emotion in the hearts of those who hear me. For how intimate were the ties which, though temporarily loosened, still bound you to each other! With the exception of a very few, who are far advanced in life, and of the strangers who since his removal have come in among you, there is perhaps scarcely any one present who does not stand towards him, in some of the most sacred and endearing relations which can subsist between men. The greater part of you were through his ministry engrafted by baptism "into the body of Christ's Church, and regenerated with his Holy Spirit." You were afterwards taught, in his simple and happy way, the value of the privileges which were thus secured for you, and affectionately urged to hold fast of them to the end, by leading "a godly and a Christian life." In sickness and sorrow he was your guide and your comforter; and in health and gladness the helper of your joy. When life was all hope, and the future was bliss, he joined you in those holy bands which death alone could sever; and when hope was blighted, he buried your dead and soothed your pangs. All this, and more than I can tell, will rise up before you in sweet and sad remembrance, as his mortal remains lie before you. May none of his wholesome instructions, his godly counsels, his affectionate admonitions, his acts of kindness and love, ever escape from your minds, or fail of their effect upon your hearts and lives! May you still keep up in death, as in life, your communion with him; but in a higher and holier degree, than can ever be realized while our friends are in the flesh!

On his removal from Elizabethtown he went to Auburn, in the Western part of the State of New York, where, being appointed the Rector of Trinity Church, he continued to officiate for several years. But the malady with which he had long suffered, particularly affecting the organs of speech, he felt an increasing inability to exercise with any degree of comfort and ease the public duties of his office, and he was, therefore, anxious to turn the powers with which God had endowed him, to some other account, which might, nevertheless, in a measure, be conducive to His glory. For several years before he relinquished the charge of his former parish, he had added to the multitude of his duties the editorship of a periodical work, entitled the Churchman's Magazine. This work was conducted with such ability, judgment, and prudence, as to indicate a more than ordinary fitness for this species of literary labor, and to draw attention to him, in case of any other project being started, of a similar kind.

About this period, a lady of moderate wealth and of great piety and beneficence, who entertained for Bishop Hobart the utmost reverence and affection, made him the residuary legatee of a considerable portion of her fortune. The Bishop, who was for ever on the alert for the good of the Church over which God had made him an overseer, thought that the establishment of a religious paper, with a view to this end, would be an object, to which a portion of this trust might be suitably applied and in entire conformity with the designs of the donor. He accordingly suggested the plan to Dr. Rudd, who cordially approved of it; and, after making a sufficient provision to establish the press and to furnish an annual income in order to aid it in its continued support, he requested the Doctor to carry it out.

For more than twenty years at Auburn and Utica he labored in this work with indefatigable zeal. It is almost impossible for any human being to form an adequate conjecture of its actual results. It was simple and unpretending in its character, neither aiming at learned criticisms nor elaborate discussions, but the general good of the great mass of those for whom it was more especially designed. But time and experience, the sure test of utility in all undertakings have fully established the value of this, and clearly shown that though withdrawn in a measure from the immediate duties of his ministry, he nevertheless has not labored in vain. In seasons of tranquillity and repose, and in times of excitement and trouble, he has, for the most part, pursued, in the conduct of it, "the even tenor of his way," neither ruffled unduly by the violence, the scorn, and reproaches of others, nor provoked to the bitter recrimination by which these attacks are so generally followed. Partly in consequence of this tone of moderation, and of the judgment, shrewdness, and discretion with which it has been uniformly edited, and partly in consequence of its simplicity and fitness for the class of readers for whom it was more peculiarly designed; it has gone into hands which works of higher pretension and greater ability would have never reached, and therefore, in its very humility has been exalted.

From the strong good sense, the sober discretion, and accurate knowledge of men and things which were shown by him in the management of this paper, as well as by the soundness of his views, in all the questions which have arisen both in the Diocesan and General councils of the Church, in which from an early period of his ministry he took a decided and active part, he had acquired a degree of respect and consideration which, but few men, in the rank of Presbyters, ever attain. But even a circumstance so gratifying to a person of the humblest mind, like most of the blessings of life, was not without its disadvantages.

He was one of the most hospitable men I have ever known. Where there were congenial feelings, and kindred views, every one who entered under his roof was welcome to his fireside and his board. It was so, as I personally know from the long continued exercise of it toward myself in the outset of his life, and it was so to multitudes throughout its course, with no small inconvenience and discomfort no doubt from the narrowness of his means, both to himself and others. For even his "failings leaned to virtue's side." His social feelings, his generous impulses, his affectionate sympathies, were always withdrawing him from the consideration of himself, to the comfort and happiness of those around him. Of the various ways in which this was manifested, I am forbidden to speak, both from delicacy to the living and respect to the dead. But I may safely say, after an intercourse of forty-three years with our departed friend, I have observed no fault in him, excepting the infirmities which are common unto man, but that which arose out of the undue exercise of the most amiable and virtuous feelings of our nature, and which, under other circumstances where it might have been lawful to indulge them, would have redounded to his honor and praise.

From the shortness of the time since I was requested to perform this sad though delightful duty, and from the absence of every one who could furnish me with minute details, I have been compelled to rely almost entirely upon my own recollections.

It so happened, however, that during the very time of the sickness and death of my dear old friend, I have been engaged in arranging the letters and papers of my whole life, and that in our unbroken correspondence these recollections have been most tenderly revived. If in the foresight of this event I could have had an opportunity of applying the points of interest in it, with greater fulness to the present occasion, I should have probably made it more acceptable to you and satisfactory to myself. But in this, as in other things, God's will must be done.

But after all, in the delineation of a character deserving of admiration, if the general truth of it from personal observation and well known facts be sufficiently established, these minor circumstances are of little importance. For the same reasons I have not thought it worth while to touch upon the points which, though the most essential to the Christian character, are taken for granted in the case of a minister of God. If he has lived without the imputation of hypocrisy, we may believe that he was sincere; and if he has passed through the rigid ordeal of public opinion till three-score and ten, we may also believe that he has died without reproach.

But, with you and with me who knew him so well, the evangelical piety, the fervent devotion, the purity of heart, and holiness of life, for which he was distinguished, together with all those social virtues with which in a remarkable degree he was so eminently adorned; will be enough to make us regard him as a godly example, and to cherish him in our hearts as an object of dear and abiding affection.—New York Churchman.

The Streets of Canton.

(From the Dublin University Magazine.)

As there is no part of the world so densely populated as China, so there is no part of the empire so densely populated as Canton. The streets are exceedingly narrow, and in many places hardly sufficient to allow the crowded population to pass. There are no wheel-carriages to use. The passenger walking through the town is constantly jostled by the chair-bearers of the mandarins, or wealthy merchants. Recovered from such a shock, a coolie or porter, bearing a burden, knocks him against the wall with a sort of grunt, while he is shuffled in an opposite direction by a second. Peculiarly curious to English eyes are the number and variety of live stock which are exposed for sale in those narrow streets—puppy dogs yelping in bamboo cages, kittens mewling, rats squeaking, fowls clucking, ducks quacking, geese cackling, and pigs grunting. Fish swimming, and earth worms, slugs, &c., variously disposed, are exhibited in tubs and earthen pans. A barber close by twangs his iron tweezers to call his customers near him; another operates upon a patient customer, seated on a tripod-stand—plaiting his tail, cleaning his ears, shaving his head and face, extracting all long and superfluous hair from his eye-lashes, eye-brows and nose, and finishing off by a good thumping of his back, and cracking his joints. Hard by is an itinerant vender of cooked food, with an enormous reed umbrella, dispensing rice, fat pork, and stews swimming in oil and soy, which he serves out in small bowls and basins to his hungry customers, who devour the mess with an epicure's gout. Beside this merchant is seated a brother itinerant, the vender of sweet-meats. A little farther on stands a bookseller, exposing his library, the contents of two boxes which he hawks about. In this vicinity is a fortune-teller, in the act of unfolding the future to an anxious dupe, and a doctor decorated with a string of human teeth around his neck, extending below his waist, while his box of drugs hangs before him. Then an aged woman may be seen, with feet three inches long, seated under an umbrella, mending old clothes, while a passer-by wanting a button sewed on, repairs to her, and remunerates her with "cash."

Not far distant, a leprous beggar exhibits his disgusting sores, and rattles two pieces of bamboo to attract attention. Suppose the air filled with the noises, cries, and vociferations of these various vendors, and of the constantly changing throng of human beings, and some slight conception may be formed of Canton on approaching the Hog Lane. Going through this thoroughfare, which is occupied by spirit shops and stores of all kinds, announcements such as the following arrest the eye:—"Ingli is ere spok;" "Jack all ting ere find will;" with other of a similar orthography. This street is frequented by sailors, and being the resort of the very lowest and most depraved, Jack often gets robbed, and becoming crusty, uses his fists, when a general scrimmage takes place.

Counsels to Teachers.—Bishop Doane

xi.—Few things are so important in life, as a just estimate of the value of time. Every thing in a course of education should promote its attainment. It will be learned or unlearned, practically, every day. If a teacher is in his place, at the minute; if he has every scholar in his place; if he has all instruments and apparatus ready, down to the chalk, the pointer, and the black-board-wiper; if he begins at once; if he goes steadily on, without interval or hesitation; if he excludes all other topics but the one before him; if he uses his time up, to the last drop: such an one is teaching the true value of time, as no sermon can teach it.

xii.—Gossip is the besetting sin of some good teachers. The thread of their association is slack-twisted. It is apropos to every thing. Gossiping should be banished from every recitation room.

xiii.—Nothing can be more radically wrong in education, than the attempt at false appearances. It rots the hearts of children, and makes them chronic hypocrites. And it fails of its immediate end. The children know, and tell it. The teacher, who has crammed his scholars for an examination—assigning this proposition to one, and that passage in an author to another—is like the silly bird, that hides its head, and thinks that it is not seen.

xiv.—In all good teaching, "multum, non multa," is the rule: not many things, but much.

xv.—Teachers, must not lose courage, at slow progress. The best things come, little by little. "Gutta, non vi, sed sæpe cadendo." xvi.—Teachers that are teachers, cannot be paid. Alexander's conquests would have been no compensation for Aristotle's instruction. Their name is written in heaven.—The Missionary.

LIBERALITY IN THE WEST.—The St. Louis Herald, in speaking of the liberality of Christians in the West, states the following facts:—"We know of one gentleman in the West, who gave $20,000 to endow a professorship. We know of another who erected a church, costing some $15,000, wholly at his own expense. We know of another who erected a church costing $30,000. We know of another instance where a city church, in an important locality, could not be completed for want of funds; an aged man, with a large family and a moderate fortune, embarked in business, finished out and out the edifice, and now waits the convenience and prosperity of the Church to be repaid." May we not indulge the hope that, as the wealth of the West increases, such instances will become as common as they now are in the East.

ASSUMPTION OF ROBES BY A WESLEYAN MINISTER.—A "sensation" was caused among the Dissenters in this town, on Tuesday, by a statement that Mr. Tucker, the minister of the Wesleyan chapel in Green-street, had on the previous day performed the burial service at the cemetery in a white surplice! On inquiry, we find the assertion to be correct. The gentleman met the corpse at the gate of the cemetery, and preceded it to the grave in the costume above-mentioned.—Cam. Chron.

* St. John's, Elizabethtown.

† "It is our desire," he wrote in a letter to a friend, "to be buried in the cemetery of old St. John's, Elizabethtown, in any one of the vaults that can be allowed us for our resting place, till the day when the earth and the sea shall give up their dead."

MEANS OF SUCCESS IN THE MINISTRY. Such is the title of "a sermon preached before the Synod of Pennsylvania, at its meeting in York, Pa., October 17th, 1848." We find it published in "the Christian Observer." The text is from Zechariah iv. 6. Although this discourse contains, in our esteem, some sins both of omission and commission, yet on the whole, its tone and spirit are good, and there are many wise practical suggestions forcibly and eloquently expressed.

The sermon fails to develop its important text—"Not by might, nor by power, but by my Spirit, saith the Lord of Hosts"—by omitting to show the particular "means" which the Ministry must employ to secure "success." This blessed result they can only effect when, casting aside all other "might" and "power," they obtain the intervention of the "Spirit" of the Lord of Hosts. This they can only do by using faithfully the means of grace, as "Stewards of the Mysteries of God," not only "setting forth His true and lively Word," but "rightly and duly administering His holy sacraments." The preacher speaks of "the presence of the Holy Spirit in Ministers" as "essential to the success of the Gospel" as if they were themselves the only means of grace appointed by Christ! Consequently "the means of success in the ministry" resolve themselves chiefly into "the influence of character" in ministers of the gospel, and the "element of power in preaching." We need not now pause to show how poor a chance the gospel has of large success if such be the true state of the case. We did not advert to this sermon to enter into a particular criticism, but rather to give one or two extracts from it by which our readers may be edified. There is sound practical good sense in them. We rejoice to hear such truths from the quarter whence they come.

[The Preaching of the Present Day.]

"1st. Does not the doctrine just advocated, lead naturally to inquire whether much of the preaching of the present day is not naturally defective?"

"Are not the sermons on which the highest eulogies are pronounced, characterized more by the intellect they exhibit, and the literary taste and accomplishments of their authors, than any thing else? Do we not hear that upon certain great occasions, certain great divines are expected to 'lay themselves out?' Do we not hear of grand efforts, where men equal themselves, or more than equal themselves? Take many of our printed discourses, and we ask, not whether the truth is taught, but what is the legitimate impression felt upon the mind of the reader; or, rather, how they affect the heart? Is Christ exhibited? Is the truth made glorious? Do we rise from their perusal, spiritually edified, quickened? or, is it not too often the case, that the author has won our admiration, but has not led us to Christ or duty?"

"The classic lore, the grand poetic diction, the chiselled, well-turned period, the fresh and startling proposition, all remind us of the scholar, but not of the gospel. The gospel was there, to be sure, but in the back ground! It had the desired effect, it gave prominence, it gave the proper relief to him who proclaimed it. The cross was there, but the ambassador had stepped before it, lest the dignity of his person should be obscured!"

"Ah, brethren! 'Barbarism is (not) the first danger of the age!' It's intellectualism—it's transcendentalism, in opposition to a direct, masculine, strong common-sense, symmetrical exhibition of practical Bible truth; and the consequence is, that ministers, exalting human reason and philosophy (vainly so-called,) wander from the simplicity of the faith once delivered to the saints; and the people, getting itching ears, demand a gospel, rationalistic and theoretical, or, an imaginative gospel, and cease to inquire for the 'old paths,' 'the good way.'

"Let us here appeal to facts. Are sermons of the style referred to—and it is the popular style—promotive of the great end of preaching, the glory of God in the salvation of souls? Is it invidious to say of some of our most distinguished intellectual preachers, 'these are clouds without rain,' men who are doing almost nothing in the way of converting sinners?"

"If it is insisted, that such a course of preaching establishes the credit of the gospel! and gives ministers a name, and thus increases their influence for good, and enables them to secure the attention of 'ears refined,' and, if these be proper motives, then let it all be understood, and let the course be pursued—but first 'go and shew John again those things which ye do hear and see,' 'THE POOR have the gospel preached to them.'

[Worldly Policy in the Church.]

"3d. Again: If the doctrine advanced by true, does it not rebuke the worldly policy and fastidiousness of very many churches at the present day?"

"By fastidiousness, we mean the kind of ministers and the kind of preaching so universally demanded. It is not enough when a pulpit is vacant, to refer to a preacher and say he is 'a good man and full of the Holy Ghost,' (Acts xi. 24,) and preaches in demonstration of the Spirit and with power; but is he elegant in manner and polite? Will he 'draw a select audience?' will he gather the intellectual, the fashionable, the wealthy? And last, though by no means the least, is he financier enough to extinguish a troublesome debt? We admit that what we have placed here as direct questions, are often insinuated and put by circumlocution, but here is the edge of the satire—here is the mortification—the questions are asked!"

"And is it so, that he who should be a Divine legate, a minister plenipotentiary from the highest court in the universe, 'an ambassador to negotiate between God and man?' nay, who comes to command men to be reconciled with their offended sovereign—that such should stoop to the character of a mountebank, an actor on the stage, a thing of finance! Expected to gain customers, to win the admiration of those who come to be amused, or subserve the interests of those who own pews, or are implicated in the liabilities of church corporations?"

In connection with, and somewhat in opposition to, the florid exhibition of the Presbyterian Divine, we present to our readers, as showing a subordinate "means of success in the ministry" suited to "the poor," the following plain and simple statement of a clergyman of the Church, whose "titles," "credentials," "surplice and lawn," and "hierarchical aspirations" are very cautiously designated in the above named discourse. We find the extract in "the English Churchman," it is from a Pamphlet on "National Education," by the vicar of Harwell. It may afford some practical hints to those similarly placed in a rural district; at all events it will show that the clergy of the Church of England do something more than talk about "the poor."

"In this place it may not be amiss for me to mention, an experiment made by myself some years ago, to try if it were not possible to remedy this great and grievous evil by carrying on after leaving school, something like a course of instruction, in most cases, as it were, only begun at school and ended just when the real development of the nature and character of the individual may be said to begin.

On coming into possession of a small piece of preferment some years ago, at S—, in the county of Bucks, I found the poor in a most debased and disorganized state. Indeed, I believe in the year previous, some scores of them had been sent to prison or expatriated, for open riot; burning farming implements, machines, stacks, &c., and other acts of insubordination, being the order of the day amongst them. In my parish there were several conventicles, such as they were; and my congregation was consequently very thin and meagre, few attending except the farmers; and their attendances were, 'like angels' visits, few and far between.' I had not been at my new residence very long, before I observed, that at a certain hour in the evening, the shrill notes of a fife, accompanied with the beat of a drum, might be heard, as coming from a neighboring barn. Actuated by a very natural curiosity to know what was going on there, I visited this rude hall of festive mirth; and there beheld, to my surprise and deep regret, some fifty or sixty young people of both sexes dancing, shouting, and rioting by the light of a lantern suspended from the roof of the barn, to the rude music before mentioned. I said nothing, but returned to my quiet home in great pain and incertitude of mind as to what was best to be done with people in such a state of semi-barbarism. At length I determined what to do, in order that I might, if possible, put a stop to these nocturnal revelries by diverting their thoughts into another and a better channel. I bethought me of the miseries of their homes, and of the little share of comfort that there awaited them. I pictured to myself (for at that time there was much abject poverty in the land) the condition of their humble homes. I there beheld, and alas! it was no uncommon or unreal picture, the dogged, morose, half-starved father sitting by his miserable hearth; his children shivering and crying with cold, all crowding around its few and half-extinguished embers; and in many cases, I fear, calling upon that wretched parent in vain for bread. I heard the mother scolding one, and slapping another; and ever and anon abusing the miserable partner of her life for his apathy, and sullen unconcern. With fearful oaths and violent gesticulations I saw that parent rise from his seat, snatch up his hat and rush out of the house in quest of his only place of solace—the beer shop—for alas! we had several in the village, and those not of the best stamp. Now, such was the home of many of these young creatures. Was it, then, much to be wondered at, that finding no comfort there, they should seek it elsewhere? Education had done nothing for them (although they had most of them been at the National School of the parish) except to prepare them, as brands for the burning. I therefore bethought myself of a plan, not only to contribute to their comfort, and put an end to their licentious pursuits—for I had but too many proofs that they were so, to a fearful extent—but also to effect a reformation of their morals, by still carrying on the work of instruction. To convert, you must first civilize; to look for the crop, you must first till the soil, and then take care, that the seed you sow is of a suitable kind and quality.

Now, at that time, my old vicarage house was still standing; in which there was one really good, and spacious lower room; large enough, I should say, to afford sitting room for some fifty or even sixty people. This room I fitted up with stools and benches; and after airing it for a few days with a good fire, I made known (through my clerk) to every family in my parish, that on the following Monday evening I should be very glad to meet my young parishioners; where, round a good fire, I could talk with them and read good and amusing books to them; and if there were any who really wished to be otherwise taught, I would do the best I could in the way of their instruction; not requiring, as they termed it, book-knowledge or reading, from them, but promising them something in the way of reading and agreeable instruction from myself.

Feeling thoroughly convinced, that all my efforts to do them good, and stay the prevalence and progress of crime amongst them, would be of no avail—in simply contenting myself, with reading and explaining the Scriptures to them, and calling them to the sweet work of prayer and praise—(anything but sweet to them in the heathenish state they were in) sensible as I was that in so doing I should, but subject myself to their scoffs and sneers; and call down upon my head the anathemas of certain preachers or teachers amongst them, as seeking only to proselytize and mislead the people; I caused it to be understood, that my endeavors to benefit them, would simply be confined to reading good and amusing books to them—giving them good and friendly advice—answering their questions as I read, whenever the meaning of any word was not clearly understood by them—and if desirous of reading at home, either by themselves or to their families, lending them suitable, easy and entertaining books, &c., for that purpose. I need not say the intelligence spread through my parish like wildfire; all marvelled, many sneered; some shook their heads, and others, I verily believe, thought me a little touched, that is to say, cracked, as they termed it. At length the night of trial arrived (the hour of meeting was six, and our visit was to close at eight or half-past); I was at my post, the stools and benches all duly arranged—my little desk, chair, and books, all snugly placed in a corner, and my first essay as a public teacher, in that way, was about to begin. The hour came, and the gathering hum of voices without told me that my proclamation had been heard and attended to. The doors were opened, and at the expiration of a quarter of an hour (the time allowed for assembling, some having to come nearly two miles) they were again closed, and to my great delight mustered twenty-five auditors.

I commenced my task by asking them a few questions, in as easy and kind a way as I could, as to their names, ages, occupations, families, &c., and then proceeded to read a paper to them from Sturm's Reflections, on the benefits and blessings of knowledge, simplifying and explaining the language as I went on. I then descended with them into a salt mine—skipped over the deserts of Arabia, in search of coffee—made a descent upon China, and gave them an account of the tea plant—read a brief biographical sketch of a distinguished individual, who had risen from obscurity by the exercise of his talents, industry and good conduct—and ended by recommending them to follow his great and good example: and if they were satisfied with their visit, to prove it by coming again, bringing their companions with them; and going that night at least to their homes in peace and comfort, as I should do—for that we had all, through the blessing of God, endeavoured, as every human being ought, to do our duty.

After appointing the following Wednesday and Friday evenings for our next meetings, we then separated; all going home direct, in peace and good order, for never was the parish more quiet and peaceable than on that eventful evening. According to appointment we met again on the Wednesday evening, when our muster was thirty-seven; a similar course to the first was pursued, and the like happy results followed. On the Friday evening our number was forty-eight; on the succeeding Monday fifty-four, and the next time seventy-two; indeed, my room was so crowded, that I could scarcely breathe; and I was compelled to request the females to discontinue their attendance; the nights being very dark, and the season of winter near at hand—promising to lend them books to read at home; and, if possible, in the spring, to make arrangements for their occasional attendance at my readings. I also drafted off all children under ten years of age, lending them tracts, &c., to read at home; and even the old men (for certain of my auditors were beyond seventy years of age) received sundry hints that I feared, coming out in the evening air, and lastly leaving my warm room, would be prejudicial to their health. After this, all went on very smoothly; my audience averaging about sixty. The barn-floor orgies ended the first week—the beer-shop keepers railed bitterly against me the next, for their craft was in danger; indeed, I may say nearly destroyed, many parents staying at home to be amused with the parson's "werry nice books." Nay, even the very farmers said "it was a right good plan," for the parish was in peace. But, best result of all; in the course of one quarter of a year my congregation—I may truly say—was nearly trebled; some coming to Church who were in the habit of boasting that they had never set their foot in one; and many others, who had not been there for many years past. Thus encouraged, I went on perseveringly with my plan; and with increasing success, until late in the following spring, when the services of most of my hearers were required in the fields abroad, and their gardens at home; and before the close of the year a small but very useful addition to my income, in the shape of preferment, took me away from a people I at first regarded with pain, and now left with sorrow and regret.

My readings were chiefly confined to the pages of Sturm's Reflections, Dodd's Beauties of History, Blair's Class Book, travels, biographies of eminent persons who had meritoriously risen from obscurity, natural history, &c., the Saturday and Penny Magazines, and Penny Traveller. I ought also to mention, that one very taking mode of conveying information, was through the medium of a very excellent Phantasmagoric lantern, (the gift of a friend,) with many slides; containing representations of wonderful places at home and abroad—singular birds and beasts, &c.—and last of all, the kings and queens of England, assisting me much in my little historical and other lectures, or rather explanations; and delighting them so much that a sight of its wonders was very frequently requested. Besides which, I had a good supply of small interesting books and weekly publications for their perusal at home, and I was glad to find they were in constant request.

So much for my evening readings at S—; would that every brother Clergyman could and would do the same for the benefit of his people, where needed; but "who is sufficient for these things?" for now, alas, when the pressing cares of life are around me, and the infirmities of age are fast approaching, I feel that I am not; still I may say with the Apostle, "Having obtained help of God, I continue to this day," and "am thankful that I am what I am."

THE CHURCH AT KEY WEST.—In the usual place of such records will be found the notice of the death of a young man, in the Hospital at Key West. A private letter from the zealous Missionary gives a brief account in relation to this notice. Sad thoughts must be stirred within every feeling heart by such a record. The reason given by the Missionary for sending this notice to the Banner is this, "The inmates of this Hospital who die there, have their names reported in no public Journal, and their friends never know what becomes of them." It seems a dreary lot indeed to die far from home and kindred, to spend our last weary hours of life among strangers, and then to be laid, without a tear, in an unknown grave.

How greatly is the sadness of such a lot relieved, when a faithful minister of the Church is at hand to cheer the loneliness of the dying with the comforts of our most holy Faith. It is blessed to think that there is a sympathy more extensive and wider in its reach, than natural affection. That the charity which the Gospel pours into the cold heart of man will warm into life those feelings which turn strangers into brothers. Wherever a faithful minister of Christ is at hand we need not fear that sickness or misfortune shall fall upon us without the help of brotherly offices, or that we shall die in a strange land uncheered by human sympathy.

On these grounds we think that not only Christian duty and charity urge us to provide Churches and Ministers for seamen, but natural affection calls upon all those who have friends or kindred in this perilous calling, to do their part in a work of mercy whose benefit may be first enjoyed by a brother or a son.

We think in this respect the Church at Key West, a place visited by so many vessels, and where so many wrecks constantly occur, has peculiar claims upon our sympathy. The Missionary was in this city some time ago, and received help from churchmen here. It will gratify these to learn the progress which has been made in this work, and it may perhaps encourage some to do more. We have seen a letter from the Missionary to a gentleman in this city, in which he thus speaks. "We have gone forward and so far completed our edifice that it is occupied for service. Thus far not a dollar is due, we have five dollars in the treasury. Meanwhile we need very much that work should be done about the chancel to the amount of one hundred dollars. I have on my own responsibility contracted for a part of it, say fifty-five dollars, and it must come out of my Missionary stipend, if those who ought, do not pay it. I say those who ought. This parish has a claim, setting aside the highest one of the Gospel, upon the Church of Philadelphia. The mail which takes this letter takes another to the Editor of the Banner announcing the death of a son of one of the members of a Pennsylvania Church. Every year more or less members of the congregations in Philadelphia come here to sicken and die in our hospital." Again he says, "As sailors come here from all points of our Union, so are all points interested in keeping up the services of religion in this Island."

In relation to the young man whose case is referred to, the Missionary says, "His father, (who is a paper-hanger,) was a member of St. Paul's church, in some town near, or suburb of Philadelphia. Through your paper information of his death will probably reach them. I saw him several times in sickness, and buried him as a child of the Church."

CORRECTION.—We regret that for the second time, the notice of a meeting of a Convocation has been turned by our Printer, into that of a "Congregation." As the proof of the last page seldom comes to the Editor, we would advise those who desire to have their notices correctly printed to send them legibly written. We sometimes are compelled to express mentally the thought uttered in the pulpit by Rowland Hill, upon the receipt of some illegible notice. "The writer of this may be a Pharisee, but he is certainly no Scribe."

We feel it to be a duty to caution the public against a young man, calling himself George Bartlett, who on the plea of taking a blind mother, Eliza Bartlett, to her friends, has been for years drawing on the sympathies of the benevolent. She has at several times, for three years past, obtained aid from us, and we have reason to believe, has been recently aided by the Rev. Dr. Pyne, of Washington, the Rev. Mr. Newton, of Philadelphia, the Rev. Mr. Starr, of Trenton, and the Rev. Dr. Higbee, of New York, and probably by many other clergymen, if not by other persons. On investigating the case, with the aid of his honor the Recorder, we find it to be one of ingenious and gross imposture. The woman, if she be the mother of George, is not blind, and the stories of both are inconsistent and contradictory. They have admitted the imposture, and promised to return to their friends, and to a better course of life.

New Publications.

KEBLE'S CHRISTIAN YEAR.—The Messrs. Appleton, (Phila., 164 Chesnut street; New York, 200 Broadway;) have published a beautiful edition, with appropriate illustrations, of this favorite book. We need not do more than announce the fact. This work of the Christian Poet is so well known and so highly appreciated, that it would seem like presumption to attempt to commend it.

From the same publishers we have received a work in two volumes, entitled "ESSAYS AND REVIEWS, BY EDWIN P. WHIPPLE." We can only acknowledge the reception of this Book at present. We shall speak of it more particularly, after we have had time to examine its contents. The "Essays and Reviews" are upon a great variety of interesting subjects.

The same publishers have sent us two neat and interesting little works for children. One is called "THE BOOK OF ANIMALS, for the amusement and instruction of young persons. By T. Bilby, illustrated with twelve elegant designs. This book is made interesting to children, not only by the faithful pictures of the animals, but by the anecdotes with which the history of each animal is illustrated.

The other work is called "THE HAPPY CHILDREN: a Tale of Home for Young People." We have submitted this work to our young critics, and they pronounce a most favorable judgment upon it.

THE GOSPEL PROMOTIVE OF TRUE HAPPINESS. By the Rev. Hugh White, A. M. From the fifth London edition. Philadelphia, Herman Hooker, 206 Chesnut Street. 1848.

This seems to be an excellent practical work, developing very fully its important subject.

We merely announce its publication at present, intending to give it a larger notice before long.

A CHRISTMAS CAROL, for 1847; Daniel Dana, Jr. New York. This is an attractive little Book, intended as a cheap present for the approaching Holidays.

Dual Unity.

MR. EDITOR:—

Probably the foregoing superscription is too postulatory; but I cannot think of any that is completely adapted to my subject, viz., the two-ness and the oneness of persons like the Siamese Twins. That monstrosity has occurred more than once; whether frequently, I know not. One other case, at least, is on record; as will be found in Littell's Living Age, No. 236, p. 346. The article is a reprint, from the Dublin University Magazine, of a review of a remarkable work of Dr. Madden, a respectable Irish clergyman, (1730) ending with a notice of two other publications of his; in one of which, speaking of the wranglings of the Protestant and Romish parties in Ireland, and their duty to become united and one, he remarks: "It often puts me in mind of the poor Italian in London, who had a little twin brother that grew out of his breast, whom he carefully nourished and cherished, being sensible that when his brother died, he could not long survive him." With the politics or polemics illustrated by the fact related by Dr. Madden, (who is highly commended by Lempriere and Dr. Johnson,) I have nothing to do, but only with the fact itself—that there was, a century before the Siamese brothers came into note, a pair of united twins who lived to manhood—these resembling those, perhaps entirely, except that one of them much outgrew the other. Possibly there have been more such abnormalities; but that point my reading (or memory) does not enable me to determine. Falling casually, however, on this latter example, has awakened me from the mere wonderment with which I have hitherto regarded the Siamese phenomenon, the Dual Unity, now living in North Carolina.

Yet with intelligent wonder the cases are replete. In both sets of twins, we find two living human animals in one; for they are, respectively, two animals in most of their functions; while they are one animal in some functions, as nervous and instinctive reciprocation, and especially in the grand particular, that they must live and die together. There are two bodies, yet so united as to be in many regards one body. There are two lives, yet so interwoven and mutually dependent, as to make, practically, one life. Two minds there are, yet so fused together by sympathies and blended instincts, as often to be one mind, as veritably as are the peculiar thoughts and promptings of an individual. And there are two souls, yet occasionally with so intimate a mutual responsibility that none but the Omniscient can ascertain, in all particulars, for what elements and developments of character each of them is distinctively and separately to be judged. There are, in short, two natures, in the inclusive meaning of the term, two complex human constitutions, yet the two so largely involved as, in a notable degree, to be one nature.

A comparison to parasitical plants will hardly be offered: the unity in each animate duality is far too great for such an analogy. Or, if it should be insinuated, only the phase, not the amount, of the wonder will be changed. A vast marvel would it be if mind and soul were even quasi-parasitical. And the mistletoe, I believe, can be torn from the oak without harm to the latter.

Speaking then in a pretty broad, though not in the sacred and unrestricted or large, sense, each pair of these twins offers to our notice—two substances (bodies) in one substance; two persons in one bodily substance; two substances, or rather four, the two bodies and the two souls, in either two persons or one person; aye, two persons in one person. Verily we seem on the verge of awful ground; observation explores where reason cannot follow. And it is a created not the Eternal reality, it is outward, open, visible, perceptible creation, that conducts us thither.

We reach not the lofty enclosure of the great hallowed Mysteries. Yet we are carried towards it; and we silence, before entering that astounding revelation, the objections of the infidel and the heretic. And there is a defence exterior to this. When these "gainsayers" upbraid the doctrines, that there are two substances or natures, Godhead and manhood, in the one person of Christ, and that there are three Persons in the one nature or substance of Jehovah, we first meet them at the outermost barrier,—the fact, that in every man there are two substances, material and spiritual, two unlikes, body and soul, in one person: which inexplicable verity ought to annihilate the plea, of difficulty or incomprehensibility, they make, concerning the Incarnate and the Trinity. And then we interpose the "strange things" offered in this paper, of peculiar native intricacies in regard to substance and person, entirely beyond the solution of mortal wisdom or ingenuity. All this, before reaching the citadel of the argument, that God's nature is not to be measured or defined by the nature of the creatures He has formed; that His individuality, self, very-ness, cannot be circumscribed by the limits and capacities of ours: so determines natural religion itself; and that binds confessedly every man except the atheist. Ample, therefore, is the protection of these transcendent articles of belief.

As a protection of the cardinal doctrines, the cases of Dual Unity may justly be propounded. To the infidel and the heretic, we offer these unaccountable yet undeniable phenomena, these "fixed facts," that they may unravel the earthly mystery, ere they intrude upon the heavenly mysteries, of the Three in One, of God manifest in the flesh. Let them pronounce, not with hypothesis and assumption, but philosophically, clearly, incontrovertibly, (and if inductively it will be all the better,) concerning these strange realities in the creatures. Around these subjects of thought there is no awe of divinity, and their minds may handle them as they will, or—as they can. Are there two bodies, or only one, a double organization? for each is more essential to the other than an arm or a leg is to an ordinary man, each as vital to the other as the head, the stomach, the lungs, the heart, to the regular human fabric; and we do not know that animal buds may not become one by mutual engrafting, (inosculation, anastomosis,) like "wild olive branches grafted" upon the "olive" of culture. Further: Are there, in these wonderful cases, two souls, completely individual, as are the souls of completely individual men? or rather, can science prove it? Yet again: Do two souls animate, inform, conjointly two conjoint bodies? and is this complex mutuality of four substances, two bodies and two souls, perfect or imperfect? Here are questions enough to occupy an adversary of the lofty disclosures of the Bible till he shall finish his "walk by sight," and depart to that world where those who have "faith" will see it kindled into knowledge. Here are difficulties concerning substance, whether body or soul, concerning their union, and of course concerning personality, that may tame the presumption of overweening scepticism and overeager philosophy.

More especially, and in view of the difficulty of defining what "person" is, it cannot be denied that, in some sense, and that not an unfair one, each pair of these twins is both one person and two persons. Not that we doubt the individuality of the four men in the sight of God; that point is irresistibly claimed by reason and by faith. But, to human consideration, and judged by human faculties, their individual personality is obscured by a cloud as real, though not so finally impenetrable, as the threefold personality of the Lord of Hosts, and as the one personality of Him who was both perfect God and perfect man. The word "person" seems best explained as—that, in an intelligent being, to which intelligent actions are ascribed; or, with regard to the intellectual creatures—that, in an accountable being, to which actions to be accounted for are imputed. And in the Siamese Dual Unity there are, as obviously as man can perceive, as clearly as man can determine, both a separate and a mingled responsibility, two persons and one person.

Most incontrovertibly, nature (as we phrase it) is a teacher of mysteries. That truth has often been remarked and abundantly proved by examples. And here is a further example, not unworthy, I respectfully submit, of a place among her memorable instructions.

Bishop Doane

P. S. In the Banner of the Cross for January 14, 1843, (p. 15.) is a paper concerning the Nestorian Bishop. In this paper when touching on the disputed orthodoxy of that church, at issue in the expression "two persons and one bursupa"—the meaning of which word is not clearly known, it being sometimes rendered "aspect," yet also translatable "person"—it is remarked, "I see no objection to the repetition of that word, thus making the Nestorian tenet to be, that Christ is two persons and one person, i. e. two persons in one sense, and one person in another sense. And this proposition comes too near the sound expression of the doctrine (two natures and one person) to be deemed heresy." The remark "two persons and one person" was at the time considered by able friends as feeble than gratuitous. But may there not now be referred to, as drawn from fact, an adumbration of the meaning there generously vouchsafed to the Nestorian creed?

American Tract Society.

This institution is called a Tract Society, and as such societies are apt to do, has been tempted in its strength to depart from its design and become a large book-publishing concern, one of the largest in our country. It professes to furnish religious books at cost, and perhaps when the expenses of its 400 colporteurs and the large salaries of its many agents and clerks are reckoned into the account, this may be found true. Its publications are certainly sold so near their cost that all private enterprise and capital must fail in any attempt to publish at similar rates. Here then is a society with its many hundreds of agents and servants, with mouth so large that nothing can fill it, and with tongues so various and many-toned, that you can hear nothing else, crying to be supported on the charity of Christian people, and yet doing nothing to support itself. Its hired emissaries, its devouring presses, are fed at the hand of charity—a weak, ill-judging, yet generous charity. Well, what is the result? It has paralysed the enterprise of individuals lawfully engaged in publishing religious and useful books. It has, to an extent many times exceeding the means and influence of the society, driven the capital of publishers into new channels, and caused directly and indirectly the circulation in cheap forms of more useless and injurious books than the society with her thousand hands and tongues and charity boxes can ever counteract. This is no idle and unmeaning view of the case. Every bookseller knows the danger and impolicy of publishing or keeping on his shelves, religious books. The entire book business has undergone a change. Wholesale dealers who supplied country booksellers, seldom got an order, five years ago, which did not include many religious books. Now it is a rare thing that a single book of a religious kind is called for by houses that formerly sold thousands. They say, they cannot sell them, that the demand has ceased. This is known to be true through the whole country as a change in the times. They can now only sell school books, novels, picture books, and standard books, and none others pay for publishing. This is the general statement of men engaged in the trade. It is caused by the action of religious societies, and most of all by this book making tract society. Wherever they can sell a book they send a man with it, and when he takes pay for it, he asks for a donation, if there is any appearance of ability to give it. Thus he puts in and takes out, always taking more than he gives if he can. Well, this method supplies every family that can be reached with a few religious books, and fleeces it of what charity it can, and, as religious books are not necessities of life, what is gotten in this way supplies and satisfies, so that there is seldom a call on booksellers, and if they should happen to be called on, unless the desired book is at the society's low rate, it is declined, or bought with a conviction that an exorbitant price has been charged.

This then is a brief sketch of this society's influence. But they say you show that we make books cheap and are very diligent in circulating them. Is not that a good? What care we for the booksellers? Well, booksellers don't want your care, but they would like you to have sense as well as religion. That is all. But what sense is there in your doing by charity what individual enterprise would gladly do, and make books cheaper to the people than you do, if you add to your prices the charities they give you. There is no cheapness in your system but what lies in appearance: it is an expensive system to the public. It taxes the poor as well as the rich. You would take money from the poorest if you could get it, and you often can, for poverty is generally charitable. You can gather apples of thorns. But I would have you know it is a waste of Christian charity that is spent on you. If you used the economy that good men should, if you did not try to do more than a prudent business sagacity dictates, if you charged the prices for books by which industry can thrive and be rewarded, now that you are made so great, every stream of charity might turn from you to other and more legitimate ends, and you be left with means enough to do a great and successful business. And if, to what you might do in that case, you add what others would do in the same cause, and in a fair field of competition, more religious books would be read and published than now is, and an amount of capital, a thousand fold greater than yours, would be turned from catering to the corrupt appetite of the people, to spreading useful and religious knowledge.

I think your vocation, as you have turned it into bookmaking, is a bald superfluity; and if I could convince the religious public of it, I should think I had done a great good. There are objects enough, every one knows, of more needful charity than you are. You may call your vocation preaching, but I do not.

God has instituted a Church and ministry to convert the world and keep up a knowledge of himself, and if the charity that is given you were expended in educating ministers to proclaim the word; in building churches and attracting people into them; in supporting missionaries and pastors, many of whom are laboring with constitutions broken and minds enfeebled by the cares and griefs of an inadequate support, I think that the skies over us would brighten in approbation of the change. How many poor shepherds of Christ's flock are there, who hunger for bread, who cannot buy a book to replenish their exhausted minds, whose ministry is made feeble and unproductive by causes like these; who might speak living tracts, if fed each with a moiety of the charity you claim?

What business have Christians to give their charity to do that which business enterprise and capital would do, if let alone, quite as well and cheaply? None at all, till it can be shown that there are no neglected and more useful channels for their charity to run in. It is bad economy to do any thing with the funds of charity which ready and unemployed hands would do with their own means. But does any one suppose that a demand for religious books would be unsupplied? No. The coffers of infidelity itself would be readily opened to supply the want. Should we not employ the unsanctified talent and wealth of men for such an object? Of course we should when we can. It is a weak, stupid, though it may be a well meaning, charity which would do any work of this kind.

This society furnishes the Church no books which she does not pay more for than the same would cost if she left book publishing to take its own course. Men are not justly called upon to aid this society. It should stand in its own strength and live by its own business or not at all. It does nothing, when it goes out of its sphere, as it has, which the church needs, and it is an abuse to ask the religious public to sustain it. It is an abuse, because such misdirected charity drives a great amount of funds out of the service of religion and turns it against the well-being of society. Yet the agents of this begging institution will tell the people you must give us money to publish good books to counteract the influence of bad ones now so numerous, when it is the policy and agency of the society which has so multiplied bad books of late years. It is a common sentiment of booksellers that this is the fact; and I trust I have made it sufficiently apparent by exhibiting the false and injurious principles on which the business of this institution is conducted.

Apply the same principles to any other branch of business, and it would and must ruin it. Suppose you get up a great charity-box and call it a work-shop, and have apartments for various arts, and say we will supply the poor and rich at cost, I reckon we could get agents enough to work in it by paying them well, who would be very zealous in calling it a benevolent and useful institution; and if the public chose to supply its demands in this way, it would soon be the ruin of all engaged in the same business. Is there any more legitimate branch of business than that of publishing and selling useful books, and is there so little that we can do with our charity, or have we so much of it, that we must drive every man with his means from this field? When will good people see the folly of establishing any such publishing concern without requiring it after a fair start to support itself by the sale, at proper business prices, of what it produces, giving away only of its acquired ability? This is the only live and let live principle that can apply to the subject, and I will add, the only just and sensible principle that can apply to it.

I might extend the application of these principles and show their injurious action, show that they all land us in evil and folly by means of our own charity. Our charity is a talent which is to be improved wisely or not at all. Any thing that touches the motives of human industry to weaken them, any thing that charity does that would be done if she let it alone, is a positive evil, and the law which makes it so is written by the finger of God, and we are bound to see its characters in his word, yea, sinking into the very flesh of our nature. A Prayer of Mary, Queen of Scots.

"The respite of the night she passed in prayer."—W. PETER.

The royal daughter of the royal race of STUART, so unfortunate in her life and in her death, is said to have composed, not long before her execution, the following brief and expressive prayer:

O DOMINE DEUS, speravi in Te!

O care mi JESU, nunc libera me!

In dura catena,

In misera poena,

Desidero Te!

Languendo, gemendo, et genuflectendo,

Adoro, imploro, ut liberes me!

Of which the following is an almost literal version, by Mr. Peter, given in his notes to his translation of Schiller's celebrated Tragedy of Mary Stuart:

O gracious Lord God, I have trusted in Thee!

O dearest Lord JESUS, now liberate me!

In captivity's chain,

In want, exile, and pain,

I desiderate Thee!

Groaning, languishing, weeping, and bending the knee,

I adore Thee, implore Thee, to liberate me!

Sentences from Bishop Taylor.

"No great sin is a sin of excusable or unavoidable infirmity. Because whosoever hath received the Spirit of God, hath sufficient knowledge of his duty, and sufficient strengths of grace, and sufficient advertency of mind, to avoid such things as do great and apparent violence to piety and religion. No man can justly say, that it is a sin of infirmity that he was drunk."

"Sins of infirmity, as they are small in their instance, so they put on their degree of excusableness only according to the weakness or infirmity of a man's understanding. So far as men, without their own fault, understand not their duty, or are possessed with weakness of principles, or are destitute and void of discourse, or discerning powers and acts—so far if a sin creeps upon them, it is as natural, and as free from a law, as is the action of a child, but if any thing else be mingled with it, if it proceed from any other principle, it is criminal, and not excused by our infirmity, because it is chosen; and man's will hath no infirmity, but when it wants the grace of God, or is mastered with passions and sinful appetites: and that infirmity is the state of unregeneration."

"The violence or strength of a temptation is not sufficient to excuse an action, or to make it accountable upon the stock of a pitiable and innocent infirmity, if it leaves the understanding still able to judge; because a temptation cannot have any proper strengths but from ourselves; and because we have in us a principle of baseness which this temptation meets, and only persuades me to act, because I love it."

"No habitual sin, that is, no sin that returns constantly or frequently; that is repented of, and then again committed,—no such sin is excusable with a pretence of infirmity; because that sin is certainly noted, and certainly condemned, and therefore returns, not because of the weakness of nature, but the weakness of grace. The principle of this is an evil spirit, an habitual aversion from God,—a dominion and empire of sin. And as no man for his inclinations and aptness to the sins of the flesh is to be called carnal, if he corrects his inclinations, and turns them into virtues; so no man can be called spiritual for his good wishes, and apt inclinations to goodness, if these inclinations pass not into acts, and these acts into habits, and holy customs and walkings and conversation with God."

"If we did not wink hard, we must needs see that obedience to supreme powers, denying ourselves, humility, peacefulness, and charity, are written in such capital text letters, that it is impossible to be ignorant of them."

Sentences from Archbishop Leighton.

"There is not a treasure of the merits of saints in the Church, as some dream, but there is a treasure of the precious experiences of the saints, which every believer hath right to make use of; and these we should be versed in, that we may have them in readiness at hand, in time of need, and know how to use them; both to draw comfort from them to ourselves, and arguments to use with God."

"Were the matter left to our modelling, we would assign the Church constant peace and prosperity for her portion, and not consent that the least air of trouble should come near her. We would have no enemies to molest her, nor stir against her; or if they did stir, we would have them to be presently repressed, and these, in our judgment, would be the fairest and most glorious tokens of His love and power, whose spouse she is. But this carnal wisdom is enmity against God, and to the glory of God, which rises so often out of the wrath of His enemies."

"Big threatenings are unhappy presages of very ill success."

"The most compendious way to be safe from the violence of men, is to be in terms of friendship with God."

"The fear of God begets the true courage: the breast that is most filled with it, abounds most in true magnanimity."

"The hammer of the law may break a stony heart in pieces, but it is only the blood of Jesus can soften it. And wherever it is effectually poured, either upon a wounded soul, it heals it, or upon an hard heart, it mollifies it."

"A man may have much common knowledge of Christ, and may understand well, yea,—may preach well, concerning His worth and graces, and yet not love Him. But there is a particular knowledge of Him by the infusion of the Spirit; and where the smallest measure of this is, it presently wins the affection."

"Grace destroys not the natural passions of the soul, but corrects them only, by destroying their corruption, and so they become not only not contrary to grace, but are made the subject and seat of grace."

"There is a certain company of small stars in the firmament, which, though they cannot be each one severally seen, yet being many, their united light makes a conspicuous brightness in the heaven, which we call the milky way: so, though the shining of every private Christian is not so much severally remarkable, yet the concourse and meeting of their light together, will make a bright path of holiness shine in the Church."

"Many that have some truth of grace are, through weakness, filled with disquieting fears; so, possibly, though they perceive it not, it may be in some point of wilfulness, a little latent, undiscerned affection of scrupling and doubting, placing much of religion in it. True, where the soul is really solicitous about its interest in God, that argues some grace; but being vexingly anxious about it, it argues that grace is low and weak: a sparkle there is even discovered by that smoke; but the great smoke still continuing, and nothing seen but it, argues there is little fire,—little faith,—little love."

"What if one should be always questioning his friend, whether he loved him or no, and upon every little occasion were ready to think he doth not; how would this disrelish their society together, though truly loving each other! The far more excellent way, and more pleasing both to ourselves and to God, were to resolve on humble trust, reverence and confidence, most afraid to offend, delighting to walk in his ways, loving Him and his will in all, and then resting persuaded of his love, though He chastise us."

"The heart of a man is not sufficient for self-support; therefore naturally seeks out some other thing to lean and rest itself on. The unhappiness is, for the most part, that it seeks to things below itself."

"God is unchangeable; and, therefore, faith is invincible, that sets the heart on Him,—fastens it there on the rock of eternity:—then let winds blow, and storms arise, it cares not."

"I know some men are, by a stronger understanding and moral principle, somewhat raised above the vulgar, and speak big of a constancy of mind; but these are mere flourishes—an acted bravery, somewhat there may be that will hold out in some trials, but far short of this fixedness of faith."

"The life of man is a warfare: and it is much better, in the midst of enemies and dangers, to be acquainted with one fortress than with many inns. He who knows how to pray may be pressed, but not overwhelmed."

MR. EDITOR:—

Your correspondent "Sacerdos" seems to speak very positively as to the rubrical meaning of the term read as used in our Prayer Book. He says: "The rubrical term 'say' is the antithesis to 'sing,' whilst the term 'read' comprehends either saying or singing." He then remarks in conclusion, that it is as rubrical to sing the Psalter as to read it. Now I would only observe, if it be as rubrical to sing the Psalter, as to read it, then it is equally rubrical to sing the Holy Scriptures, as to read them; as the rubric in both cases directs them to be read.—The Preface in the order of Confirmation, the Exhortation in the Ante-Communion Service, the Epistle and Gospel, and other parts of our service are directed to be read. It would sound strange enough to hear any of these portions of our service sung.

Although the word 'read' is used as synonymous with 'say' in our rubrics; as in the Baptismal Service, in the reading of the Sentences during the offertory, in the Exhortations, &c., &c.; yet, I have never found the word read used as synonymous with sing. Can "Sacerdos" show me a single example taken from our Prayer Book.

You remark, Mr. Editor, that you would like the rubric to be pointed out which makes our present method of reading the Psalter responsively, by minister and people, rubrical. But I would ask, if it be not as proper, as to sing it antiphonally by Priest and choir, as it is frequently done in England, and where the rubric directs it to be said or sung. By the way do you not think, that our present method, originated in the antiphonal chanting of the Psalter? Which do you think is the most preferable and instructive, the responses by the people, or by a choir?

We leave "Sacerdos" to answer for himself, as "he is of age." We asked for a Rubric, not for what is "as proper." We certainly do not "think that our present method originated in the antiphonal chanting of the Psalter," ergo, there is as much authority for the latter as for antiphonal reading. The last question we answer in the words of the Psalm:

[ED. BAN.]

With one consent let ALL THE EARTH
To God their cheerful voices raise;
Glad homage pay with awful mirth,
And sing before Him songs of Praise."

The facts stated in the following figures are of deep concern to this country. We take them from "the Colonial Church Chronicle."

EMIGRATION.—It is impossible to print the following official Table without a few reflections. Nothing can more strongly show the vast influence which the British Isles are exercising over the world than this array of figures. Including the probable emigration of this year and the next, we may put the number of persons who have left the country within a quarter of a century, at two millions, of which one-half have gone to the United States, and the other to British Colonies.

The present character and the future condition of whole provinces must needs be much affected by the emigrants from Great Britain. We owe it therefore to our own mother country, and to the countries peopled from it—but, above all, we owe it to God, by whose blessing we have multiplied thus exceedingly—to see that the new Colonies everywhere rising up be wisely and religiously planted; and we may well be stimulated to fresh exertions at home, by reflecting how much the better education, the improved moral habits, and every step made in our own social and religious progress, will become a blessing more and more widely diffused by the streams of emigration now flowing so rapidly to the Colonies of the West and the South.

Diocesan Intelligence.

Pennsylvania.—On Sunday, Dec. 3, 1848, Bishop Potter admitted five persons to the holy rite of confirmation in St. Matthew's Church, Francisville.

Maryland.—CONFIRMATIONS.—On Sunday, the twenty-first after Trinity, November the 12th, in Christ church, Cambridge, eight persons.

On Monday evening, November 13th, in Christ church, Easton, one person.

On Sunday, the twenty-third after Trinity, in Trinity church, Elkton, six persons.—Church Times.

Virginia.—ORDINATION.—On Wednesday, November the 29th. Mr. Rodney S. Nash, Instructor in the Episcopal High School of Virginia, was admitted to Deacon's orders, by the Bishop of this Diocese, in Christ church, Alexandria. The candidate was presented by the Rev. E. A. Dalrymple, and the sermon preached by the Rev. Dr. Sparrow.

CONTINUED SERVICES BY BISHOP MEADE IN THE NORTHERN NECK OF VIRGINIA.—After service in the White Chapel, in Lancaster County, on Monday, the 13th of November, where one person was confirmed, and the Lord's Supper administered, the Bishop proceeded to old Farnham church, in Richmond county, where one was confirmed; thence on the following day, to the church at Richmond Court House, where one was also confirmed; thence to Yeocombe church in Westmoreland co. This is a very plain but strong brick church, built in the year 1706, and which has probably, since its erection, never until now, needed repairs to the amount of one hundred dollars. The roof, windows, pews, chancel, and pulpit, are the same which were there at its erection, 143 years ago. They however, now so greatly need repair, in order to their preservation and the comfort of the congregation, that it is designed soon to shingle the house anew, and to lower and repaint the pews with slight alterations in the interior.

On the two following days the Bishop and other ministers were engaged in Divine Service, at a new and neat brick church, at Nomini Ferry, built on the site of the old Nomini church, which has long since disappeared. Old Nomini Hall, the seat of Counsellor Carter, generally called Nomini Carter, is a few miles off, and likely to remain for a long while a monument of the faithful workmanship of former days. The region of country around is unsurpassed in beauty and agricultural advantages by any in the Northern Neck, and is well filled with a most respectable population, which crowded into the new church on the day of its consecration. A good hope is cherished of the permanent prosperity of the congregation at this place.

On the following Sabbath, and the day after, services were held and well attended at Westmoreland Court House, where two persons were confirmed. There is no church at this place, the Court House having thus far supplied the place of one. We are happy to be able to say that this will no longer be necessary when a few months shall have passed away. The Episcopalians and Methodists have both determined to build houses of worship with all possible speed. The Rev. William McGuire is now officiating alternately at Westmoreland Court House and Oak Grove about sixteen miles off, and also in Westmoreland county. At Oak Grove a new and excellent brick church is in the course of erection and will soon be ready for use. At this place services were held on the 22nd and 23rd, when two persons were confirmed and Rev. Wm. McGuire admitted to priest's orders.—Southern Churchman.

Rhode Island.—EPISCOPAL ACTS.—On the 7th of September, one person was confirmed in Ascension church, Wakefield. The preface was read by the Rev. J. H. Carpenter, rector.

On the 27th of the same month, a sick person was confirmed belonging to Grace church, Providence.

Nov. 9th, three persons were confirmed in St. Philip's church, Crompton Mills. Evening prayer was conducted by Rev. Messrs. Randolph and Carpenter, the preface was read by Rev. Charles E. Bennett. The Bishop delivered a sermon and an address.

On the 22nd Sunday after Trinity, six persons were confirmed in Christ church Lonsdale. The service was said by Rev. Elisha F. Watson, minister of the parish; a sermon and an address were delivered by the Bishop.—Witness.

CLERICAL CHANGES.—The Rev. Joseph S. Large has resigned the Rectorship of Trinity parish, Mercer, Michigan, and accepted an invitation to the Rectorship of Trinity church, Fort Wayne, Indiana, and desires all letters and papers for him directed accordingly.

The Rev. Henry S. Kepler, having accepted the charge of St. John's church, Richmond, and removed to the latter city from Baltimore, desires that his letters and papers may be addressed accordingly.

The Rev. James W. Hoskins has been transferred, by letters dimissory to the Rt. Rev. the Bishop, to the Diocese of Delaware.

The Rev. Dwight E. Lyman has been transferred by letters dimissory to the Rt. Rev. the Bishop, to the Diocese of Pennsylvania.

The Rev. William P. C. Johnson has been transferred to the Diocese of Mississippi, by letters dimissory to the Standing Committee, acting as Ecclesiastical Authority of the diocese.

The Rev. S. T. Carpenter having removed to Churchtown, Pa., requests letters and papers for him to be directed to that place.

The Rev. Wm. J. Timmer, having accepted a call to Trinity church, Appalachicola, requests all letters to be sent there.

The Rev. Joseph I. Elsegood has been called to, and accepted the rectorship of Christ church, Danville, Columbia co., Pa. All letters and papers intended for him will hereafter be addressed to him at Danville.

The Rev. Alexander D. Jones, late assistant minister in St. Mary Anne's Parish, Cecil co., Md., has resigned that station, and become connected with St. Timothy's Hall.—P. O. Cantonsville, Balt. Co.

The Rev. Alfred B. Beach, having resigned Christ church, Cooperstown, and accepted an unanimous call to St. John's church, Canandaigua, has removed accordingly.

The Rev. S. H. Battin, having resigned St. Stephen's church, New Hartford, and accepted a call to Christ church, Coopers-town, Otsego county, has removed accordingly.

The Rev. Charles H. Gardiner, having received an unanimous call to St. Stephen's Church, New Hartford, has removed accordingly.

Miscellaneous.

Effects of Imagination.

The following anecdote was related by the celebrated father Taylor, in the course of recent lecture:—

"It happened years ago, in the days of old-fashioned meeting-houses, with their pews like pens, and their pulpits perched up at an elevation which placed them without the pale of human sympathy, and when a fire for the purpose of warming a church was a thing unheard of, that some enterprising young men who had worshipped in such a church, determined to have the house warmed by stoves. But the project encountered the most violent opposition from all the old people. They declared that it should not be; that stoves were not a Gospel ordinance; that the congregation must suffocate. The young men, however, prevailed; and one sabbath the congregation beheld in the church two formidable black stoves, with the pipes traversing the entire length of the house. The old men and women looked on with horror, and held their breath for the result. The exercises of the Church proceeded. Soon a lady fainted away, and in a few moments another gasped for breath, and was carried out of the church, and then another. At last a stout burly man swooned and fell. The frightened minister at once dismissed the Church, and there was a general rush of the indignant people toward the stoves. The windows were thrown open, and they were about to precipitate the offenders from the house, when, lo! and behold! the stoves were cold! and not a particle of fire had been kindled in either of them. The masons had not quite time to finish putting them up, and no fire had been made. The triumph of the young advocates of stoves was complete."—Albion Monthly Advertiser.

GROANING AND CRYING.—A French surgeon lately published a long dissertation on the beneficial influence of groaning and crying on the nervous system. He contends that groaning and crying are the two grand operations by which nature allays anguish, and that he has uniformly observed that those patients who give way to their natural feelings, more speedily recover from accidents and operations than those who suppose it is unworthy a man to betray such symptoms of cowardice as either to groan or to cry. He is always pleased by the crying and violent roaring of a patient during the time he is undergoing a severe surgical operation, because he is satisfied that he will thereby soothe his nervous system as to prevent fever, and ensure a favorable termination. He relates a case of a man who by crying and bawling reduced his pulse from one hundred and twenty to sixty in the course of two hours. That some patients often have great satisfaction in groaning, and that hysterical patients often experience great relief from crying, are facts which no person will deny. As to restless hypochondriacal subjects, or those who are never happy but when they are under some course of medical or dietetic treatment, the French surgeon assures them that they cannot do better than groan all night and cry all day.

I have been reading over the text, "Then the same day at evening, being the first day of the week, when the disciples were assembled for fear of the Jews, came Jesus and stood in the midst, and saith unto them, Peace be unto you," John xx. 19. I have been reflecting on the circumstance of "the doors being shut," and some pleasant though somewhat fanciful thoughts have come across my mind.

Do you wish that Jesus would come into your heart saying, "Peace be unto you?" Look well to it, that the "doors" and windows are "shut;" for if your ears are open to take in all the vain babbling that prevail in Vanity fair, and your eyes are open to stare at all the fine things there are set forth, your heart will soon be as full as the inn at Bethlehem, and there will be no room for Jesus. Either keep the doors and windows shut or watch them carefully. It is cold work watching, especially when darkness is round you. Many a weary hour will you have while other folks are merry-making; but when he comes you shall see that the morning Sun of Righteousness is better than the midnight lamp of revelry.—Old Humphrey.

THE RESURRECTION.—I have stood in a smith's forge, and seen him put a rusty, cold, dull, piece of iron into the fire, and after a while hath taken the same piece, the very same numerical, individual piece of iron out of the fire, but bright and sparkling; and thus it is with our bodies, they are laid down in the grave, dead, heavy, earthly; but at the resurrection this mortal shall put on immortality; at that general conflagration, this dead, heavy, earthly body shall rise, living, lightsome, glorious; which made Job so confident. "I know that my Redeemer liveth."—Fuller.

THE FLOATING CHURCH OF THE REDEEMER.

THE FLOATING CHURCH OF THE REDEEMER, of which the above is a faithful representation, is now nearly completed. It is in the progress of erection at Bordentown, New Jersey. C. L. Dennington, of New York, is the Architect. When completed it will be towed down the river to its position in the harbor of Philadelphia, and no more beautiful vessel ever floated upon the waters of the Delaware. The Rev. R. S. Trapier, formerly a lieutenant in the U. S. Navy, is to have this most interesting and important Pastoral charge. Note. The Church had to be sold. the idea given up in 1853

The Noble Mariner.

BY THE REV JAMES GILBORNE LYONS, LL. D.

It will be remembered that, when the ship Ocean Monarch was burned off Liverpool, FREDERICK JEROME of New York saved fifteen lives by an act of unequalled courage and benevolence.

Spread the noble seaman's name,
Deeds like his belong to fame;—
Cottage roof and kingly dome
Sound the praise of brave JEROME:—
Let his acts be told and sung,
While his own high Saxon tongue,
Herald meet for purest worth,
Fills and rules the conquer'd Earth.

Madly roll'd the giant wreck,
Fiercely blaz'd the riven deck,
Thick and fast as falling stars,
Crash'd the flaming blocks and spars;
Loud as surf, when winds are strong,
Wail'd the scorch'd and stricken throng,
Gazing on a rugged shore,
Fires behind, and seas before.

On the charr'd and reeling prow,
Reft of hope they gather now,
Finding, one by one, a grave
In the vex'd and rapid wave:—

Here the child, as if in sleep,
Floats along the raging deep;
There the mother sinks below,
Shrieking in her mighty wo.

Britons, quick to strive or feel,
Join'd with chiefs of rich Brazil,
Western freemen, prompt to dare,
Side by side with Bourbon's heir,
When that burning torrent fell,
Came with succour long and well,
But JEROME, in peril nurs'd,
Shone among the foremost—FIRST.

Through the redden'd surge and spray,
Fast he cleaves his troubled way,
Boldly climbs and stoutly clings,
On the smoking timber springs,
Fronts the flames, nor fears to stand
In the lorn and weeping band,
Nor once seeks that post to shun,
Till his glorious work is done.

Noble man! immortal work!
See THY HERO, proud New York,
Shaming, on that kindled board,
All who wield the pen or sword.
Who, that bears a Christian's name,
Who, that loves a good man's fame,
Would not spurn long years of life,
For one hour of such a strife?

A Female Ledyard in Persia.

LETTER FROM THE REV. J. PERKINS.

OROOMIAH, Persia, Aug. 3, 1848.

A few evenings ago a knock at the door of our mission premises was soon followed by the quick step of a native, who came to Dr. Wright with the statement that there stood, in the street, a woman, who knew no language, and was entirely unattended, except by a Koordish muleteer. A moment afterward another native came with the additional statement, "the lady is dressed in English clothes and says, in your language, will you give me a little water?"

Dr. Wright, whose curiosity and astonishment could hardly be otherwise than highly excited, by the announcement of a lady in European costume, speaking English, in the street, at night, and unattended in this remote and barbarous land, where the appearance of a European man is a thing of very rare occurrence soon had ocular proof of what his ears were so reluctant to admit—a bona fide European lady standing before him, having a letter from Mr. Stocking from an acquaintance of his at Mosul, which introduced us to Madame Pfeiffer, of Vienna, who had performed the circuit of the world, thus far alone, and was now hastening towards her home.

Who then is Madame Pfeiffer! she is a German lady, fifty years old, of great intelligence and most perfect accomplishments, and to appearance thoroughly same on every subject, unless it be her style of travelling, which is at least somewhat peculiar.

Madame Pfeiffer, leaving her husband and her two sons. (one of them an officer of government, and the other an artist,) about two years ago started on her tour around the world. An aged gentleman of her acquaintance accompanied her for some time, but finding that she was obliged to protect him instead of his protecting her, she left him and proceeded alone.

From Europe Madame Pfeiffer went to Brazil, where she admired the brilliant flowers and the magnificent forests more than almost any thing else that she had seen, and where she came very near being murdered by a black ruffian, who attempted to rob her. She still carries scars of the wounds then received, but states, with evident satisfaction, that she had cut off three of his fingers in self-defence, when several persons providentially came to her rescue.

She had intended to cross the continent, from Rio to the Pacific Ocean; but finding things in too disordered a state to admit of it, she took passage in a sailing vessel at Rio, in which she doubled Cape Horn and went to Chili; and after a short stay at Valparaiso she took passage in another vessel for Tahiti where she made an agreeable visit, among the mementos of which she has Queen Pomate's autograph.

From Tahiti our heroine traveller proceeded to China, where she visited several of the points most accessible to foreigners, mingling socially with the missionaries there, whom she mentions familiarly by name, as Dr. Bridgeman, Dr. Ball, Mr. Gutzlaff, &c., the autograph of the last named she has in Chinese. One of the strongest impressions which she seems to have brought from the "celestial empire" is the imminent insecurity of foreigners at Canton.

From China, Madame Pfeiffer went to Calcutta; and from that city travelled over land, across British India, to Bombay, passing through a great variety of incidents and adventures on the way, and holding much pleasant intercourse with Protestant missionaries (though herself born and educated a Catholic) at various stations and of different nations.

From Bombay Madame P. went in a steamer to Bussorah; and thence in another steamer to Bagdad; and from Bagdad she travelled in company with a caravan up to Mosul, as a memento of which place she has a sculptured figure of the human head, taken from the ruins of ancient Nineveh. From Mosul she crossed the formidable Koordish mountains to Oroomiah, a caravan journey of twelve days, (but protracted in her case, by tedious delays, to twenty days,) in company with a Koordish muleteer, on a route of greater exposure, humanly speaking, than any other she has travelled, during her circuit of the world.

After a visit of one day with us, Madame Pfeiffer hastened on toward Tabreez, intending to go thence through Georgia to Tiflis and thence across the Caucasus, through European Russia, to Vienna, hoping to reach her home about the first of November.

The adventurous circumstances of Madame Pfeiffer, during many parts of her tour, invest it with the most romantic and thrilling interest. Think, for instance, in her passage across the wild Koordish mountains, of a savage Koord, pointing to the tassel on the Turkish fez (cap) she wore, to which he took a fancy, and demanding it of her by the significant gesture of drawing his hand across his throat—meaning of course, "give me the tassel as you value your head;" and she in turn repelling the demand by gestures, unable to speak to him a word orally, in any language he could understand. Through many such adventures she made her way safely to Oroomiah, carrying about her person a large sum of money, (by accidental necessity rather than choice) over the wild regions of Koordissan, in a manner which seems to us truly marvellous. Her practical motto is, never betray fear; and to her strict adherence to that she expresses herself as greatly indebted for her success in travelling.

On the road Madame Pfeiffer in these regions wears the large veil, concealing most of the person, which is commonly worn here by native females, when they go abroad, and ride astride, as they also ride, but her other garments, (with the exception of the Turkish cap above named) are sufficiently European in appearance to distinguish her from natives. Her language on the way, in these lands, is wholly the language of signs, dictated by necessity, and which she seems often to have made very expressive. On the last day's ride, before reaching Oroomiah, for instance, the stage being two ordinary stages, and the muleteer, at one time, proposing to halt till the next day, she would rest her head upon her hand, as emblematical of sleep, and repeat, Oroomiah; and when the muleteer, from regard to his tired horses, still insisted on halting, she added tears to her gestures; and the obstinate Koord's heart, according to his own statement, was then irresistibly subdued—so much so that he went promptly and cheerfully.

Her helplessness and dependence, on well known principles, did much doubtless, at once to win for her kindness, among the bloody Koords, and ward off danger. Madame P. has however, intrinsic elements of a good traveller. Though she had ridden on the day she reached Oroomiah, almost incessantly, from 1 o'clock A. M., till 8 o'clock P. M., at the wearisome rate of a caravan over a very dry, hot, dusty region, a distance of near sixty miles, still on her arrival she seemed little tired—was buoyant and cheerful as a lark (which is probably her habitual temperament) and was quite ready, the next day, (the only day she stopped with us,) to take a pleasure ride on Mt. Seir.

Madame Pfeiffer occupies but a single horse on her journey; her small trunk being slung on one side of the animal, and her scanty bed on the other, and she riding between them. Her fare on the road, moreover, is extremely simple—consisting of little more than bread and milk—a regimen not more convenient to the traveller, on the score of economy, than conducive, as she says, to her health, and certainly to her security. To those who may be curious in regard to the expenses of her tour round the world, I may repeat her statement, that she had expended, when here, just about one thousand dollars.

A passion for travelling is the ruling motive that carries Madame Pfeiffer so cheerfully and courageously through all her manifold hardships and perils. She, however, has minor objects, makes large collections of insects and flowers. She is already an authoress of some celebrity, having published a work on Iceland, and another on Syria and the Holy Land, the fruits of her earlier travel; and the copious notes and observations which she is making, during her tour round the globe, will, of course, in due time be given to the world. "A small affair," she pertinently remarked, "would it have been for me to sail around the world, as many have done; it is my land journeys that render my tour a great undertaking, and invest it with interest."

Madame Pfeiffer expressed her purpose, after visiting home and resting a while, of taking North America in her next tour. Possibly this Female Ledyard will meet with some in our native land, under whose eyes this notice may fall; if so, we would bespeak for her their kind offices, and pledge them in return, a rare entertainment in making her acquaintance.

As ever, very truly yours,

Cur. N. Y. Observer.]

The Idle Corner.

Who that lives in a village or country town does not know the Idle Corner?—the place where the thoughtless or evil are fond of standing in the vacant hour, or the evenings, or on Sunday. I speak not of the place where neighbors, after the day's work is over, stay a little while together to chat before they go home to their firesides; nor yet of the place where the youth gather for some hearty manly game in a leisure hour. But I mean what every body knows by the name of "That Idle Corner," where young men stand laughing against a wall or a gate, encouraging each other in loose jests and foolish sinful talk; or, perhaps, rudely laughing or mocking at the quiet passer-by; till decent people hardly care to pass more than they can help. How much mischief is planned there, how much wickedness first thought of! It is usually the first step to the beer-shop; a sort of recruiting place for drunkards, and thieves, and poachers. Many a man in his sorrowful old age, looks back with bitter remorse to that idle corner, as he says in the anguish of his heart, "I was almost in all evil in the midst of the congregation and assembly." (Prov. v. 14.)

The idle corner seems to have been well known of old in the towns and villages of Israel. One would think that holy David was warning every one against that corner, when he said in the first Psalm, "Blessed is the man that standeth not in the way of sinners;" and I often wonder how that verse, when read in church now, does not strike such young men as are fond of standing there "in the way of sinners." Another of God's servants seems warning young men against that corner when he says, "Go not in the way of evil men;—avoid it, pass not by it; turn from it, and pass away." (Prov. iv. 14, 15.) I earnestly wish young men would do so: they would save themselves a world of sorrow and guilt if they would. The idle corner is the place where the Bible saith that Wisdom goes to look for the simple (or foolish) ones, for there they are sure to be found: "She crieth at the gates, at the entrance of the city (or village) at the coming in of the doors; she standeth by the way, in the places of the paths; she crieth in the chief place of concourse, in the openings of the gates,"—saying "How long ye simple ones will ye love simplicity? and the scornors delight in their scornings, and fools hate knowledge?"—Prov. i. 20, 22; iii. 2, 3.) There the bad, the self-willed, and the mischief-makers, used to get together of old, just as they do now:—"The ungodly is so proud that he careth not for God, neither is God in all his thoughts: he sitteth lurking in the thievish corners of the streets." (Ps. x. 4, 8—Prayer-book.) At the idle corner, of old time as well as now, the foolish, the giddy, the light, and the lewd—whether men or women—well knew that they should find one another: the guilty still lie in wait at that corner, and the "simple ones void of understanding," passing through the street, still meet with temptation, and fall into ruin and sin at that corner. (Prov. vii. 5, 12.)

There—at the idle corner—stand the Sabbath breakers. The quiet and church-going people of a village as they are on the way to God's house, see them laughing there,—a disgrace to a Christian land,—the open and avowed servants of God's enemy, wearing in their looks the mark of Satan, who hates the Lord of the Sabbath. Perhaps they stand bold or daring with a pipe in their mouth, scoffing, or passing a rude jest to annoy the quiet church-goer; or, if not so lost to shame, at least shewing that they have no care for the Sabbath, and for him who gave them the Sabbath, and laid down his own life to save them.

You may always know the idle corner lads or young men; there is a stamp upon them which they carry about at work or any where, all day long; a stamp, a sign, a brand, which makes one think of Satan's mark. And yet they have been given to Christ in their baptism; and have been signed with the sign of the cross, in token that they were Christ's soldiers and servants unto their life's end, to fight against sin, the world, and the devil. Oh, why will they forget their Saviour's mark, and take on them the awful mark of him who goeth about to devour their souls!

Let us look about a village and listen to what goes on. A master wants a servant; a stout lad is mentioned: the master answers, "Yes, that's a strong active lad; but then he is one of those that stand at the idle corner, and is sure to have bad companions and idle laughing habits—I dare not trust him in my house." Many lose good situations because they are seen to stand at that corner. I say to a farmer, "Such a young man is out of work, can none be found for him?" Often have I heard the answer, "Oh, he is one that I see at the idle corner as I go to church; there he stands instead of going to church, with all the loose fellows of the village—I won't have him on my grounds: steady lads who keep out of idle company for me."

Let us ask a parent why we seldom see his eldest son at church? the answer is almost sure to be—"Ah, sir, the boys at that corner have drawn him in among them, and he won't be ruled by me."

I go to see a poor widow, and she pours out her sorrows to me: she has scarce bread to eat, or fire to warm her, and no friend on earth to comfort her. "Well, but your son is twenty years old, and has good work, surely he helps his mother now." She replies in an agony of tears,—"Ah, no sir! he was as good a boy as ever was; after his poor father died he was my comfort and friend, till he got to stand at that corner with the idle lads; and now he spends his money at the beer house, and won't listen to me; I never see him now till bed time, and he hardly gives me money enough to buy food for him, let alone any to help the rest of us. He never talks to his lone mother now, and I fear he will be drawn in to join in some wickedness."

A boy grows up and leaves the Sunday-school steady and promising; for a few months perhaps he is always in his place at church along with his friends; I hope soon to prepare him for confirmation, and trust that there is something more than merely outward good conduct about him. At length he is no longer regular at church, and I enquire, and find that he has taken to stand at the idle corner.

A poor girl, steady and respectable, happens to miss a place, and is at home for a few months before her mother can find a proper situation for her. At first she is always at church: then I see her seat often empty; I learn that she has grown light: I hear that she is disgraced. "Ah!" says her agonized mother, "Ah, sir, she passed along the street, and at length she was enticed to stop a little, as she passed that corner, and thus she fell into wicked company; and oh! what shall I do now for shame and sorrow of heart!"

Alas, that idle corner! Who can tell how much guilt, and shame, and bitter trouble, have their source from it! Is a young man taken before the magistrates for poaching—for rioting—for pilfering? It always happens, that he is one of those who are to be found at that corner. O young men—why will you rush into Satan's net? Why not occupy yourselves in your gardens, or with the books which are always within your reach, or with harmless and manly games? I wish my voice could warn all of you against the idle corner. I have only spoken to you on common sense grounds, which you can all understand; I need not tell you how ruinous to your souls are the ways and habits which belong to that corner. Let me but remind you that at the day of judgment, you may find that you have lost, for ever lost, your souls; and you will then perhaps look back and remember how much the idle corner has had to do with your everlasting misery. It will be too late then: but it is not too late now: give up, at once give up, the ways, the habits, the company which belong to the idle corner: shake off from you the stamp of the idle corner.

Lambeth Palace.

On the Surrey side of the Thames stands that ancient building, which has, for centuries, been the residence of the Archbishop of Canterbury, and has been the scene of many transactions which will continue to occupy a place in history to the end of time. The building, or rather the congeries of buildings, was not erected at one time, nor by one person. A portion of it is exceedingly ancient, and other portions quite modern; but the modern portions being Gothic, and of that dingy hue which seems to be the go of this age, it does not interrupt the general effect. The whole wears the aspect of antiquity, and inspires the stranger with veneration and awe.

In Maitland's History of London, published in 1739, we have the following account of the origin of the Palace:—"The first part of the Archiepiscopal Palace which was erected, is that on the north side, which consist of the Lollard's Tower, Chapel, Guard-chamber, the Archbishop's apartments, library, and cloisters; but when or by whom the same was built is unknown. However, I am of opinion that all, or part thereof, must have been built before the year 1250, when Boniface, Archbishop of Canterbury, for his mal-treatment of the Sub-Prior and Canons of St. Bartholomew's Convent, was obliged, privately, to make his escape to Lambeth, for fear of the enraged Londoners." As the conjectures of ancient historians, after the lapse of time, usually become undoubted facts, so has it happened in this case; it now being set down in the books without a peradventure, that Archbishop Boniface was the original founder of Lambeth Palace. In "A View of London, about the year 1560," in Maitland, Lambeth, for a great distance east of the palace, seems to be a field, and we notice, about midway between the palace and London Bridge, those remnants of barbarism, amphitheatres for "bull bating" and "bear bating."

The palace has been enlarged by the different archbishops, until it is a huge pile, and covers a vast area of ground. The park and garden contain about thirty acres, and are laid out with great taste. The whole presents the aspect of vast opulence. It is correctly enough called a palace, and the occupant might as well be called a prince. His income, functions, and style of living, very dimly shadow forth a successor to the laborious and self-sacrificing Paul. The income of the Archbishop of Canterbury has heretofore amounted to between thirty and forty thousand pounds sterling per annum.

We visited Lambeth Palace on the 31st of August, 1846. Our host, Edward Corduroy, Esq., on application to "His Grace, the Archbishop," obtained permission to visit the palace, "with some friends from abroad." We were accordingly admitted through "the ancient gateway," and conducted through the different departments. The chapel, the banqueting-room, the guard-chamber, the presence-chamber, the long gallery, the great dining-room, the drawing-room, the library, the Lollard's Tower, &c., &c.

The library contains twenty-five thousand volumes, and eleven thousand manuscripts. Many of the books were scattered among the different colleges during the Protectorate; but have since been restored. Here are the likenesses of all the archbishops since Laud; and a great painting of King Charles I., with his queen and children, in a group.

But decidedly the most interesting object to be seen, is "the Lollard's Prison." The following description is from the old historian Maitland:—

"In the uppermost part of the Lollard's Tower is a very strong room, of the length of twelve feet, and breadth of nine; the walls whereof are lined with thick elm planks, (wherein are fixed eight strong iron rings,) and the ceiling covered with those of oak. This is the place wherein, it is said, that Archbishop Chicheley, the implacable enemy and persecutor of the Wickliffites, or Lollards, used to imprison them; from which prison the tower received its name."

And that same "prison," with the "iron rings,"—large enough for bull-rings in a butcher's slaughter-house—the elm plank walls and the oak ceiling, and a door, of perhaps five or six inches thickness, hung upon vast iron hinges, and filled with spikes with large heads, the whole as impregnable "as the bars of a castle." And here were chained, to these rings, holy confessors and martyrs—the victims of Romish intolerance, high up toward the heavens, in the archbishop's palace. We grasped one of those old rusty cold iron rings in our hand, and reflected upon the scenes which had here transpired centuries back. Our reflections were aided by the rude letters, words, and sentences, which are carved upon the wall in old English characters by the prisoners. Several names are visible. Ah! names which are written in the Lamb's book of life. And among the sentences which are inscribed, we deciphered, "He that endureth to the end, the same shall be saved." What words of comfort were these to the poor victims of intolerance, who were here deprived of the light of day, and of the liberty equally the right of all good subjects or citizens! How precious now were the truths of the Bible which had been stored up in the memory of these holy men, when they had no longer the privilege of access to the precious volume! Thank God, that the iron age, which chained men to "iron rings" for reading the Scriptures, has passed away from the British empire; and we hope will soon be known in no land upon the globe, except in history.

From the top of the Tower we surveyed London, as well as we could through a London atmosphere. St. Paul's, Westminster Abbey, the new Parliament House, and a countless number of spires, towns, monuments, and other splendid objects, were before us. The Thames, meandering through the great city, spanned by bridges as firm as the rock of Gibraltar, gives fine effect to the general prospect. We remarked, to our friend, that "if we only had an American atmosphere, the prospect would be truly glorious." This, as was expected, excited a smile, and called out the remark, that if we wanted a clear atmosphere in London, we must get out at six o'clock in the morning, before the chimneys begin to vomit forth their vast volumes of smoke. But not being able to get upon any high point at that early hour, we were obliged to be satisfied with dim views of the exterior glories of London.

We left Lambeth Palace in a thoughtful mood, having received impressions from this visit, which are likely to remain.

We may, at intervals, as we are able to consult and decipher our notes, give our readers other brief sketches of objects and scenes in Europe.—Christian Advocate.

"Folly and subtlety divide the greatest part of mankind; and there is no other difference but this, that some are crafty enough to deceive, others foolish enough to be cozened and abused: and yet the scales also turn, for they that are the most crafty to cozen others are the veriest fools, and most of all abuse themselves. They rob their neighbor of his money, and lose their own innocence; they disturb his rest, and vex their own conscience: they throw him into prison, and themselves into hell."—Bp. Taylor.

"The spirit, as I now discourse of it, is a principle infused into us by God when we become his children, whereby we live the life of grace, and understand the secrets of the kingdom, and have passions and desires of things beyond and contrary to our natural appetites, enabling us not only to sobriety, which is the duty of the body, not only to justice, which is the rectitude of the soul, but to such sanctity as makes us like to God."—B.

For the Banner of the Cross.

Mr. Editor:—

The following extract from the Protestant Churchman, N. Y., is so appropriate at this time, in illustrating the importance of the Mission which the "Churchmen's Missionary Association for Seamen of the Port of Philadelphia," have undertaken, that I am induced to send it to you and ask the favor of an insertion. I have no fear but that it will produce the proper effect upon those who are anxiously desirous of the establishment of the Redeemer's Kingdom throughout the world, and show the utter hopelessness of accomplishing comparatively anything in the cause of Foreign Missions, until you begin at home, and bring under the influence of the Gospel, the very men who are truly the representatives of christian nations to the heathen world; for the heathen will pass by all abstract reason when the Gospel is presented for his acceptance, and pointing you to your own people in the persons of unchristian sailors, will say with truth the well known proverb, "Physician heal thyself."

Those interested in the success of this Mission have now an opportunity of manifesting it by sending their contributions to the Treasurer, Wm. C. Kent, Esq., 146 North Third street, or to the Publisher of the Banner of the Cross, as the Board of Managers are still deficient in funds towards completing the "Floating Church of the Redeemer," now in course of erection. A few weeks it is hoped will witness its completion.

"The following extract from the Journal of the Chaplain of the Floating Church of our Saviour, which I have been permitted to read and copy, I think may be interesting to your readers, and will I trust show to those of the community who are not aware of them, the impositions and enticements to which the poor sailor, when he arrives in port, is exposed, and will exhibit some of the details of the labors of their Missionaries."

"During both parts of yesterday's services (Nov. 14,) said the Missionary in his Journal, 'my attention was drawn to two sailors sitting together on one of the front seats of our Chapel, apparently recently in from sea, who seemed deeply interested in the prayers and the sermon and deeply affected. They came to church half an hour before the services commenced, in the morning and afternoon. As is my custom before the services, (as I am always at church an hour earlier than the congregation,) when there is an opportunity, seeing these men sitting alone in the afternoon, as I wished from my observation of them in the morning to know something of their circumstances, I began to converse with them about coming to God's house on this holy day. The history of these poor sailors is that of many whom I have seen at our chapel, and if the young men of our society could only see one hundredth part of the scenes I witness, and know the history of one in a hundred of the men who come broken-hearted and ruined, on a Sunday, to the house they have committed to my charge, and which they have provided for the spiritual benefit of sailors in New York, they would be animated to go on in their work, and instead of aiming for the support of only two chapels on our waters, would give the members of our congregations and others no peace until the number was increased for the 40,000 seamen and boatmen who visit our port."

"A. B. and his companion, the men to whom I allude, for I need not mention their real names, have just returned to the shores of America, after a three years cruise in the United States sloop of war Bainbridge. He landed and was discharged at Norfolk only twelve days since, and went to board with one of the sailor boarding-house keepers in that city. Like all sailors just discharged from our public ships, (and many, it may be added, from merchantmen,) and from the stern discipline of a man of war, with their pockets full of money, they were just like boys let out from school after a long day of confinement at their tasks, and with no more restraint over their elated feelings: the only difference between them being, that in the one case, they were reckless sailors accustomed to drinking and the indulgence, when an opportunity occurred, of their burning lusts."

"It was several days before their ship's crews were paid off. In the meantime their landlord kept them night and day in a state of beastly intoxication, and would supply them with money to spend in the stews, in which probably he had a pecuniary interest, knowing these men had a large amount of money to be paid them in a few days by the purser of the ship. If any one should be at a loss to understand to what kind of places I refer, let them pass through Water street, when most of the places of business are closed, and the business men have returned up town to their homes: there they will see many cellars and rooms, which have been to all appearance closed all day, lighted and enlivened with music and dancing, and the presence of inebriated sailors and abandoned females. Such places are the dens into which many a poor sailor is enticed, and ruined in body and soul, in a short time. These men had been encouraged to drink every day, at sea, at the national grog-tub, provided by act of Congress, on board their ship, and now with all the chains of a quarter-deck discipline and restraint shaken off, it can hardly be supposed they would abstain when at this 'rum hole,' on shore, where every encouragement is given every hour to 'treat' a shipmate, and indulge themselves freely while they 'have liberty.' The landlord's bill for board and sundries to A. B. for less than one week, indeed he says on the fourth day, amounted to sixty-three dollars."

"When they were both paid off, (the other had less to receive, for he had taken up while absent most of his wages,) A. B. was paid FOUR HUNDRED AND TWELVE DOLLARS, the balance of the amount of his wages for the three years cruise. He took off his black silk neck-cloth, which he had on, and the purser filled it with pieces of silver and gold, and it was so large and heavy, that it hardly could contain the sum and bear the weight. He took it home to his boarding-house. He was here invited every half hour to drink or treat, by his landlord and the other wretches whom he kept in pay around him for the purpose of robbing men in just his circumstances, elated with their freedom from restraint and with their pockets full of money, in gold and silver. After he got his money he could not give much account of himself for the next four or five days."

"All he knows, is, that he awoke one morning a short time since, in dreadful pains and sickness, and found himself on board a schooner bound from Norfolk to New York, coming out of Chesapeake Bay, shipped for the run. He was ordered about to do his duty, when he could hardly stand, and feeling more wretched than any fiend in hell. The wages of three years were all gone from him, though ten days ago he had in his pockets, of his own money, earned by the toils of thirty-six months at sea, in storms and hard duty and danger, day and night, on board a man of war, in the United States service—FOUR HUNDRED AND TWELVE DOLLARS!

"Broken-hearted and desolate, without a friend in the city, he and his companion determined yesterday morning to come to the Floating Church, in New York, of which they had heard in a foreign land, and if they had a chance, to speak to the minister and tell him their wretched, degraded, and lost condition. After your sermon in the morning, sir, said A. B., I felt more than I ever did before, and was determined to tell you how I felt, but there were others talking to you, so that I didn't get a chance, though I don't know if I should have had the courage to have done so. You began yourself to talk to me just now, and I was glad of it, and I determined to tell you every thing. I have been, sir, a very bad man, and I wish with my companion here, for him and me feel just alike, to reform, if I only knew how. I don't know if there is any hope for me and him."

"Poor fellows! I said all I had strength and opportunity to say to them at the time, for the bell was just beginning to toll for the afternoon service. They both promised me that they would come to my house to-morrow evening, took my number on a slip of paper and seemed deeply affected with what I had said. After the services, when the men came up to the chancel rail for books, I gave them, among the rest, each the Life of John Newton to read, again encouraged them to come to me, and promised I would be their friend, and try to help them with my advice and show them what to do. I urged them however that night to seek mercy of God, and to go to the Saviour of sinners, who came to seek and to save the lost, and assured them if they truly repented God would forgive them for Christ's sake, and that I had known many quite as abandoned in sin, and lost, as themselves, who were now rejoicing in a christian hope and walking in the way of salvation."

"While they were waiting for books, after service in the afternoon, my dear wife, to whom I had pointed them out sitting on the front seat, took the opportunity to talk to the poor fellows. I observed them when they were about retiring from the chapel shaking hands with her and thanking her for her kindness in taking notice of such miserable vagabonds as they told her they were. They were in tears."

Chanting the Psalter.

Mr. Editor:—

In the last number of the Banner of the Cross, in an article over the signature of PRINCIPLE, some objections are made to chanting the Psalter in the celebration of the Church service. These objections are based upon the presumption that this practice is anti-rubrical. Although SACERDOS has fully settled this question, it may afford some satisfaction to PRINCIPLE and to those who agree with him in the sentiments expressed in his article, to know that Bishop White has declared himself in favour of this practice much more decidedly than is intimated in the Thanksgiving Service referred to by SACERDOS. As I am not aware that this particular expression of the Bishop's opinion to which I allude has been before adduced on this subject, I give the following extract from his Memoirs, in which it is contained.

"As connected with the morning and evening prayers, the reading psalms came under notice in this place. * * * * * For the author's part, he disliked the course taken," (the appointment of the selections,) "from the opinion, that it was less likely to be satisfactory than another expedient suggested by him, for the improving of this part of the service, which, in his opinion, called for it more than any other. The expedient was to give to the officiating minister the liberty to select psalms at his discretion. This would be attended—he thought—with the advantage of breaking the practice of reading the psalms, without any regard to their suitability to the general circumstances and state of mind of a mixed congregation, and yet, not hazard such capricious omissions of particular passages as might be construed by some into a disrespectful treatment of holy writ, and thus prevent all improvement in this branch of the service. Another consequence would be, that, the number and length of the psalms depending on the choice of the minister, † there would be great encouragement to the introduction of the practice of singing this part of the service, instead of repeating the verses by the minister and the clerk alternately."

Bishop White then certainly thought singing the psalter more rubrical than our present mode of saying it.

Deacons and Preaching.

ADDRESSES TO CANDIDATES FOR HOLY ORDERS.

R. Rev. A. POTTER, Bishop of Pennsylvania.

"I may be allowed to suggest whether the time may not be approaching when it will be expedient for Deacons who have taken the usual course of study and preparation, to remain for some time, especially if they are still young and inexperienced,

* Memoirs, p. 152, 2d ed.

as Assistants in the parishes of the older Clergy. They will thus receive under the direction of minds matured by study, reflection, and observation, that training in the practical duties of their profession which Theological Seminaries can hardly be expected to afford; but without which education for the sacred profession is essentially imperfect. If excused from preaching, too, during such a novitiate, Deacons would be able to make important additions to their stock of Theological learning, and would be enlarging in every respect, their resources for future usefulness, while they would be rendering valuable services to our people and to over-burdened pastors."

"It is proper to state that in the case of two of these Deacons, Mr. Douglass and Mr. Trapier, the ordinary license to preach has been withheld. This course was adopted in conformity with the wishes of the candidates themselves, and as the result of deep conviction on my part, that the ultimate usefulness of our younger clergy will be materially promoted if they pass a large portion of their Diaconate, in the parishes and under the supervision of the elder clergy."

The Most Rev. JOHN POTTER, Archbishop of Canterbury.

"But then, since this function of preaching was not a constant part of the Presbyterian's office, we may conclude that it was not always committed to Deacons. And since the Deacons are not ordained to be Pastors of the Flock of CHRIST, but only to minister to the Pastors, † preaching in the public congregation, which does inseparably accompany the cure of souls, cannot properly be any part of their office. It may be observed that in St. Paul's Epistles to Timothy and Titus, where it is required that they who are ordained Bishops should be apt to teach, no such qualification is expected in Deacons. And in the above mentioned passage of the Apostolical Constitutions, where Bishops and Presbyters are directed to preach, all which is prescribed to be done by Deacons, is only to read the Gospel. And the author of the Commentary on the Apostles' Epistles, which bears the name of St. Ambrose, expressly affirms, that in his time, which was in the latter part of the 4th century, as appears by his mentioning Damasus as then Bishop of Rome, § Deacons were not allowed to preach."

Yet "it has never been doubted, but that" when circumstances required it, "Deacons may be deputed by the Bishop to preach."

Sentences from Bishop Taylor.

"That death is a blessing which ends an honorable, and prevents an inglorious life."

"No man can be called happy till he be dead, nor then neither, if he lived viciously."

"Leave no arrears for thy posterity to pay; but repent; but repent with an integral, a holy and excellent repentance, that God being reconciled to thee thoroughly, for thy sake also He may bless thy seed after thee."

"Certainly nothing hath made more ample harvests for the devil, than the deferring of repentance upon vain confidences, and lessening it in the extension of parts as well as intention of degrees, while we imagine that a few tears and scatterings of devotion are enough to expiate the baseness of a fifty or a three score years impiety."

"Repentance is a great volume of duty; and a godly sorrow is but the frontispiece, or title page:—it is the harbinger or first introduction to it."

"Faith is a sacrifice of the understanding to God; repentance sacrifices the whole will:—that gives the knowing;—this gives up all the desiring faculties;—that makes us disciples;—this makes us servants of the holy Jesus."

"Repentance is the institution of a philosophical and severe life, an utter extirpation of all unreasonableness and impiety, and an address to, and a final passing through all the parts of holy living."

"A man does not begin to know himself till he be old, and then he is well stricken in death."

"No man is ignorant of the necessary parts of religion without his own fault. Such ignorance is always a direct sin, or the direct punishment of a sin,—a sin is either in its bosom, or in its retinue."

"Every man naturally consists of soul and body; but every Christian man that belongs to Christ hath more: for he hath body, and soul, and spirit. By spirit is not meant only the graces of God, and His gifts enabling us to do holy things. There is more belongs to a good man than so. But as when God made man. He made him after his own image, and breathed into him the spirit of life, and he was made in animam viventem,—into a living soul; then he was made man: so in the new creation, Christ, by whom God made both the worlds, intends to conform us to his image, and He hath given us the spirit of adoption, by which we are made sons of God; and by the spirit of a new life we are made new creatures, capable of a new state, entitled to another manner of duration, enabled to do new and greater actions in order to higher ends:—we have new affections, new understandings, new wills. 'All things are become new.' And this is called 'the seed of God,' when it relates to the principle and cause of this production. But the thing that is produced is a spirit, and that is as much in nature beyond a soul, as a soul is beyond a body. This great mystery I should not utter but upon the greatest authority in the world, and from an infallible doctor. 1 Thess. v. 23. We are not sanctified wholly, nor preserved in safety, unless besides our souls and bodies, our spirit also be kept blameless. This distinction is nice, and infinitely above human reason: but the Word of God hath taught us to distinguish the principle of a new life from the principle of the old,—the celestial from the natural."

Collection for Domestic Missions.

We beg to remind all who receive the Banner in time, that next Sunday, the first in Advent, is the day whereon the Domestic Committee ask a general collection for their suffering Missionaries. Promised salaries unpaid, abandoned stations, Ministers of Christ and their families without necessary food and raiment, must be the result if this appeal is not liberally answered. "While we have time let us do good unto all men; and especially unto them that are of the household of Faith."

ADVENT.—The next Lord's Day begins another Christian year. This is the year of which it may most truly be said to the Gracious Giver of every good and perfect gift—"Thou crownest the year with thy goodness, thy paths drop fatness, they drop upon the dwellings of the wilderness."

The blessings with which an eternal Providence crowns each natural year are manifold. The year which is marked by earthly times and seasons is indeed crowned with goodness. But there is a better year than this for the Christian, marked by heavenly signs, whose seasons are regulated by the Sun of righteousness. And this, is the year which wears the bright crown of eternal goodness. This crown is woven by Infinite mercy, and is composed of those happy festivals and solemn days which remind us of the glorious things wrought for us by the God of our salvation. The wreaths of ever verdant plants, with which we adorn our temples at Christmas time, are the faint emblems of the mercies, ever fresh and green, composing the eternal wreath of joy which crowns the believer's year.

But though God has thus encircled each year with a bright diadem which reflects, in rain-bow hues, His everlasting mercies; man may crown each year, as once he crowned his Saviour, with thorns. This he does when he allows the thorns of the world's cares and pleasures to choke the good seed, so that it can bear no fruit. This he does when he improves not the appointed season of preparation, the spring-time of the soul, so that the harvest may be crowned with plenty. The season upon which the Church is now entering is one of those appointed times of preparation. We are called upon to prepare our hearts to celebrate our Redeemer's earthly Advent, that we may be ready to meet Him in that day when "He shall come again, in His glorious majesty, to judge both the quick and dead." Unless we so improve these seasons, rich with gracious opportunities, the years which God has crowned with goodness shall soon be numbered, and though each had opened upon us with abounding hopes, the end of all shall be thus recorded: "The harvest is past, the summer is ended, and we are not saved."

IMPROVEMENT IN THE CELEBRATION OF DIVINE SERVICE.—We copy the following article from the English Churchman. We commend it to the notice of our readers as suggesting practical considerations worthy of attention. If the worship of God is our most solemn duty, the manner of its performance cannot be regarded with indifference. There is no doubt that we have many deficiencies to correct, especially in the choral part of the service. Great improvement has been manifest in this respect, of late, in many of our Churches.

Although we have no training schools, like those referred to by the English Churchman, we have schools in which this important part of Christian education is duly regarded. We refer to those Church Institutions where the Daily Service of the Church is duly celebrated, and the pupils trained to take their appropriate part in the worship of God. Those who have attended service in the chapels of these schools and noticed the life and spirit which are given to public worship, when all the parts are duly performed, will earnestly desire to secure such instruction for their children. How can Christian parents think that their children are rightly trained when they are only educated to figure gracefully in the parlor and the drawing-room, and play overtures and waltzes on the piano, or sing at the top of their voices some miserable sentimental trash, while they will not or cannot open their lips to "praise God in His Sanctuary;" though His own Word thus claims their homage? "Both young men and maidens; old men and children; let them praise the name of the Lord: for His name alone is excellent: His glory is above the earth and heaven."

There is no doubt that men are more inclined to pray to God for what they need, than to praise Him for the blessings they have received at His gracious hands. Thus there is a natural inclination to undervalue this part of our solemn worship. A practical distinction seems often made between Prayer and Praise. While the former is regarded as an essential of worship, the latter is not, at least practically, so acknowledged. Those who join with true devotion in the prayers, seem often unconcerned, at least apparently, in that part of worship wherein men should practically show that they esteem the high and blessed privilege of being permitted with Angels and Archangels and all the company of Heaven, to laud and magnify that glorious name.

The Word of God gives no countenance to this distinction. This might be shown by many proofs. It says, to mention one or two, "Whoso offereth me PRAISE, he glorifieth Me." "Let the people PRAISE Thee, O God! yea, let all the people praise Thee." And the author of the inspired Book of devotions, the Psalms, in all his Forms of Worship, largely mingles the notes of loftiest praise.

Following this inspired model the Church, in her noble Forms of worship, richly intermingles the notes of praise with the voice of her prayers and supplication, so that every distinct act of worship is connected with pure ascriptions of praise. Those who have never thoughtfully regarded our Service in this respect, will be struck with the profusion of Chants and "Psalms and Hymns, and Spiritual Songs," in which we are urged to "Praise God in His sanctuary."

It is true that the Church gives the permission that many of these may be "said or sung." We might offer many reasons to show that the latter method is, by all means, to be preferred. We need give no other reason than this, that inspired precept and example declare this to be the proper manner of offering Praise to God. The different effect produced upon a congregation by the tame reading of a chant, and the harmonious singing of the same, must be owned by all, except those who have no music in their souls. But then this effect is not to be produced by singing, which comes from choirs alone, who are paid to perform this part of worship. We contend that Christians might as well hire substitutes, to pray in their behalf, as to sing for them the Praises of God. Not merely choirs, but congregations, are to be trained to take their part in worship. The Psalmist does not say, "let the choirs"—but, "let the people Praise Thee, O God! yea, let ALL THE PEOPLE praise Thee." And this needful improvement will never be generally made in our public worship, unless the children of those who think themselves too old to learn, are sent to Schools where, as Churchmen, they should be trained up in the way they should go, and when they are old they will not depart from it.

"Amongst the many solid ameliorations which, in spite of angry disputes, and other adverse circumstances, have been gradually taking place in the condition of the Church, none is more thankfully to be acknowledged than the manifest improvement in our Church Services. Though much that is objectionable still remains, yet there can be no doubt that our congregations appear very generally to know what they are about; they are more in earnest, and more anxious than they were, to offer up a reasonable and holy Service to the Throne of Grace. We do not so often see whole congregations loling and gaping during the prayers, nor respectable people who desire to do what is right, repeating the exhortation and absolution. We do not say that these evils and absurdities have ceased, but that they have abated; nor do we wish to claim all the improvement for those churches in which what we consider right doctrine is preached. The "Evangelical" party has begun to catch the spirit of improvement, and follow the example set them, and one will often see congregations, even of that description, attentive during the prayers as well as the sermon.

The point, however, which we principally desire to notice, is the choral part of the service. There can be no doubt that congregations generally join much more heartily and devoutly than they used to do in this part of public worship, and that more skill and attention are devoted to Church music both in our Cathedrals and parish Churches.

It was not our good fortune to be present at the opening of St. Augustine's, at Canterbury; but we have been told that the effect of the Cathedral Service on that day was most elevating and thrilling. The assembled thousands joined so heartily in the Service, that the voices of the ordinary choir were almost lost in the volume of sound. The ARCHBISHOP, we are told, was manifestly much moved, as well he might be, by this solemn worship. No one can doubt that the union of voices is a grand incentive to devotional feeling and union of spirit, and that the effect produced abides in the mind long after the sound has died away. Religion, thus awakened, grows to be something solid and tangible, and faith approaches to the confines of reality. We do not wonder, therefore, that the Archbishop of Canterbury, whose piety all must acknowledge, should be affected, as he has been described to us, by the solemn scene which he witnessed.

The same spirit of devotional piety is growing up in our parish Churches. The style of singing is much purer and more devotional than heretofore. In a large proportion of village churches the Venite, the Te Deum, the Jubilate, and the corresponding hymns in the Evening Service, are often very creditably chanted by the congregation. This is a great step in advance. The Service is wonderfully enlivened even by this small change. What could be more cold and unreal than when the words were uttered, "O come let us sing unto the Lord," or "We praise Thee, O Lord," or "O be joyful in the Lord, all ye lands; serve the Lord with gladness, and come before His presence with a song," that the Service should proceed in a monotonous duet between two persons, without the slightest variation from the mode in which the rest of the service was read. The chanting these hymns must be felt by all to be a great step in advance; and we cheerfully acknowledge that the "Evangelical" party are gradually adopting, at least, this improvement.

Nor is it only that what was formerly with great propriety read is now very commonly sung, but the mode in which parish choirs perform their part, and in which the congregations second them, is quite a different thing from what it used to be. No doubt the fastidious ear will still sometimes be offended, but we do not envy that excessive refinement which cannot join in congregational psalmody, if a few untutored voices err in an excess of energy.

Now the question is, what have been the means employed to produce this improvement in parochial psalmody; and how may the improvement be continued? There is no doubt that, in many places, the change has been effected by the zeal and taste of the families of the resident gentry and Clergy—particularly the female branches of them—to whom we all owe a large debt of gratitude for their pious exertions. But, if we inquire for the systematized agency by which the improvement has in part been made, and by which it may be spread to all districts of the land, we say, without hesitation, that our chief dependence must be placed on the parochial schoolmasters educated at our Training Schools.

There is no place where the science and practice of Church music is carried to greater perfection than at St. Mark's Training School, at Chelsea. The Daily Service of the Church is there celebrated by the young men who are to go forth into our parishes as teachers of the children of the poor. They go forth not only with a more practical habit of joining in the service, which they have caught from each other, but with a scientific knowledge and power of communicating the knowledge of vocal music to others, and, what is still more important, with a love for devotional exercises, and a cordial attachment to the time-honored Liturgy of the English Church; nor is this valuable skill confined to St. Mark's; the country Training Schools adopt the same system to a great extent, and the young men trained at them very generally proceed to their allotted stations, willing and able to communicate a knowledge of parochial singing to the children placed under their instruction.

This is an immense advantage to the Clergy; for, although it is very desirable that the parochial Clergy should themselves be able to convey a knowledge of vocal music to the young members of their flocks, and though we are aware that there are many, particularly in country parishes, who delight in doing so, yet it is manifest that the Pastors of populous places can ill spare the time for this labor of love, amongst their other more necessary avocations. It is therefore a very great point to secure the services of a schoolmaster who is ready to second them with zeal and ability in this part of the education of young members of the flocks of CHRIST.

It is impossible to over-estimate the value, in this respect, of such institutions as St. Mark's, and the other Training Institutions connected with our Ecclesiastical system; and most sorry should we be if, from any misunderstanding, or misappreciation of their great value, they should fail to receive that countenance and support which has hitherto been given them in the highest quarters. We cannot conceive a greater blow to the advance of vital religion, and devotional piety, than that the education of well-trained teachers of parochial choirs should in any way be hindered.

We would only advert further to two points, which we deem of importance. The first is that, independently of the desirableness that young men in training for the important office of school-master should, like the pupils at our Universities, be accustomed to the Daily Service, it is impossible that they should acquire the requisite skill in Church music, without this constant practice; and the evidence of their progress in other departments, afforded by their public examinations, proves that the attention paid to vocal music has in no way interfered with their other studies. Secondly, we would remark that the promotion of congregational singing is an affair in which all descriptions of the Clergy, as well as Churchmen in general, are equally interested. The improvement of our services is no mere party affair; "Evangelicals" and High Churchmen alike are interested in having their congregations taught to offer a holy worship. Every Clergyman in the land must surely wish to fill his congregation with reverence and devotion in singing the praises of God, and be thankful for the means whereby he may be enabled to accomplish so vitally important an object."

A RULE WORKING BOTH WAYS. It has never been the fashion of our Church to boast of what are called "converts" from the various denominations. And we are still less concerned about those who, to use a mild expression, may be termed "perverts." We hold that the truth of God, immutable as His own nature, depends not upon the fickleness of man. That must be an uncertain Faith indeed which can be affected by the changes of the human mind.

Yet one might almost be led to think that opposing religious systems were to stand or fall in consequence of "the changes and chances" by which a few individuals are affected. It is a rule which works both ways, and, on the whole, proves as little for one side as for the other. Indeed it rather makes against all sides that "profess and call themselves Christian." For we are inclined to think that those who have changed sides, within the limits of so called Christianity, would be far outnumbered by those who have made the extremes still wider and have gone from the service of Christ to the bondage of Satan, or exchanged the Christian faith for infidelity.

We have been led to these remarks by an article in "the Pittsburgh Catholic" upon "Dr. Butler," whose "apostasy" has recently attracted some attention." This gentleman, it seems, committed "apostasy" by going from Romanism into the Church of England. All we know of his case is gathered from the following statement in "the Liverpool Mail."

"In Holy Trinity Church, Birkenhead, on Friday last, during the morning service, the Rev. Dr. Butler, formerly Chamberlain to the Pope, read his recantation, and was admitted into the communion of the "one Catholic and Apostolic Church," happily established in this land. About seven years ago, the Rev. J. Baylee, Incumbent of Trinity Church, engaged in controversy with Dr. Butler on the errors of Romanism; the Doctor has since been to Rome, and latterly to Ireland, on his return from which he called upon Mr. Baylee, and voluntarily expressed his intention of becoming a member of the Church of England. His conversion has made a great sensation, as he was accounted one of the most able disputants in the Romish Church."

"The Pittsburgh Catholic" says of him:

"We wish to do no injustice to Dr. Butler. He was a man of some abilities and for a certain time was exceedingly popular in Liverpool, but we were not the only one that long since looked upon him with distrust. Within the last six years we were prepared at any time to hear of a most serious fall, though we scarcely apprehended apostasy from the faith. He was one of those men who are cursed with talents calculated to make themselves popular without the strength of mind or the virtue necessary to contend with the dangers to which a clergyman in that position is necessarily exposed."

We commenced this article not so much on Dr. Butler's account, as to give the concluding remarks of "the Pittsburgh Catholic." They are very much to the purpose, and seem exactly to suit the few similar cases which have occurred with us:

"Apostacies of clergymen, few thank God as they are, seldom occur without impressing a useful lesson in a most manifest manner. When Adam fell in Paradise, a Judas in the school of the Saviour, we may well conclude that no place or station is security against falling. When we see a proud man elevating himself above the principles that reach and protect ordinary minds, his fall will but remind us of the words of the Saviour, Vidi Luciferum, &c. We should wrap ourselves up in a sense of our nothingness, and clinging more fondly to God's Holy Church and her ordinances—endeavor to acquire her spirit in its perfection. We can then afford to see a Tertullian or an Origen fall or—to pass to little things—to hear of a ——— or a ——— closing their proud disregard for Church authority by violation of their vows, and apostasy from their faith. 'They went out from us because they were not of us.'"

Foreign Intelligence.

The last steamer brings us the sad intelligence of the death of the Bishop of Down, and Connor, and Dromore. Dr. MANT is well known in this country from his writings. He will be a great loss to the Church of Ireland at this time. The English Churchman thus announces the event:

"We regret to announce in our Clerical Obituary, this week, the death of the Lord Bishop of Down, and Connor, and Dromore. Dr. MANT was formerly Rector of Bishopsgate, and has for very many years been distinguished as a sound orthodox Divine. His Bampton Lectures; Notes on the Bible (in conjunction with the late Dr. D'OYLEY,) and on the Prayer Book; and his History of the Irish Church, are well known."

The Coleraine Chronicle relates the following particulars concerning Dr. Mant:

"The Right Rev. Richard Mant, D. D., was born, at Southampton, when his father was rector of All Saints, on the 12th of February, 1776, and he was consequently in his 73d year. He was consecrated Bishop of Killaloe and Killeenora in 1820; and translated to the See of Down and Connor in the spring of 1823, so that he has presided over this Diocese for above twenty-five years and a half. The care of the Diocese of Dromore also devolved upon him in 1842, under the provisions of the Church Temporalities Act, on the death of the last Bishop, Dr. Saurin. The deceased Prelate had lately completed his seventh general Confirmation of his extensive Diocese. He was taken ill on Friday last, and after a short rally on Monday, the disease (typhoid erysipelas) gained ground so rapidly that his lordship's constitution gave way, and he sank most calmly and peacefully, retaining his intellectual faculties till within a few hours of his dissolution."

The Northern Whig says:

"The late Bishop of Down and Connor was the author of a number of publications, among which we may mention Biographical Notices of the Apostles, Discourses at the Bampton Lecture, and a History of the Church of Ireland; and he has also edited an edition of the Bible."

Already several names are mentioned of persons likely to obtain the vacant Bishopric. There is a rumour that it will be offered to the Rev. Dr. Sadler, Provost of Trinity College, who, it has been mentioned, declined the See of Cork, Cloyne, and Ross, conferred a few months since on the Rev. Dr. Wilson, late Precentor of St. Patrick's Cathedral, Dublin.

WEDNESDAY, November 8.

Dr. Tighe, Dean of the Chapel Royal (Castle,) will, it is said, be named to the vacant Bishopric of Down. Should this be so, an excellent appointment will have been made. The Dean is a worthy man, and a tolerant Christian.—Daily News.

Rather faint praise for an expected Bishop, we should think, in America!

THE CHOLERA.—His Grace the Archbishop of Canterbury has issued the following letter to the Clergy of his province:

LAMBETH PALACE, November 2.

"Rev. Sir:—The re-appearance of the cholera in several parts of the kingdom has excited a general apprehension lest this country, which has been mercifully excepted from the political and social evils prevailing elsewhere, should still suffer the Divine judgment in the form of pestilence. I wish, therefore, to direct the use of the prayer appointed for such cases in the Liturgy, especially if the disease should appear in your own neighbourhood. It will also be proper, in the way which may appear most suited to the circumstances of your parish, to exhort your people to repentance and humiliation, duties necessary at all times, and for which there is too much reason, both nationally and individually, and to which we are especially called by visitations, such as famine and pestilence, which baffle human skill and power, and can only be averted by the merciful providence of an Almighty Father.

"I am, Rev. Sir, your faithful friend and brother,

"J. B. CANTUAR.

At the Summer

"P. S.—Since writing the above, I have received a communication from the Board of Health, desiring me to remind the parochial Clergy of the important benefits which they may render to their people by a regular visitation of their respective districts, for the purpose of enforcing cleanliness, ventilation, and strict temperance. Public measures can only be applied externally, and will be of little avail if unwholesome or insufficient diet (which the wealthier classes should be exhorted to provide against,) or if close and over-crowded apartments expose the inhabitants to the first attacks of epidemic disease."

The Guardian furnishes the following items of news:

A Roman Catholic "Priest of the Archdiocese of Tuam," favourable to the principle of a State provision for the clergy, deals somewhat hardly, if not irreverently, with the resolutions relating to the question adopted by the Prelates at their recent meeting in Dublin. The Tuam priest seems to think that the Bishops have commenced at the wrong end; that before they ventured to speak for the clergy, who, he says, are at present suffering severe privations, they ought to have furnished to the world some proof of episcopal disinterestedness, as in his province they each enjoy an annual income from 700*l.* to 1,200*l.*

At the Jubilee meeting of the Church Missionary Society, on Thursday last, held in the Rotunda at Dublin, Archbishop Whately in the chair, some members of the Protestant Operative Association, friends of the Rev. T. D. Gregg, hooted his Grace, and otherwise interrupted the proceedings. A Mr. Thompson got on the platform and attempted to address the meeting, but was knocked off again and given into the hands of the police. He was taken before the magistrates, but they dismissed the offender, as he had not been guilty himself of violence.

An anonymous "friend" has contributed 1,000*l.* towards rebuilding St. Peter's Church, Cheltenham.

His Grace the Archbishop of Canterbury has given 200*l.* towards the funds of the National Society. He has also promised to become an annual subscriber of 10*l.*

The late Prussian Consul General, Chevalier A. C. Giese, who died recently at Antwerp, has bequeathed to the Society of Friends of Foreigners in Distress, a legacy of 300*l.*

The Archbishop of Dublin has received from Jenny Lind, for charitable purposes, the munificent donation of 400*l.*; one half being from herself, and the other from Mr. Lumley.

We think the following an apt illustration of "Much ado about nothing." They must have an eccentric judgment in religious matters, who think a riot in the House of God is preferable to a surplice in the Pulpit!

This strange affair is exciting much attention, and the Bishop of Exeter has held an investigation in the presence of a number of the clergy and others.

DISGRACEFUL DISTURBANCES IN ST. SIDWELL.—The parish of St. Sidwell was the scene, on Sunday evening, of a most disgraceful outrage, having pretty much the same origin and very nearly the same features, as those which gave to the memorable winter of 1844, so unenviable a notoriety. The Clergyman whose turn it was to preach the evening lecture at the parish Church, was the Rev. John Ingle, the Curate of St. Olave. Mr. Ingle had officiated, under the same circumstances, some few Sundays previously, and, upon that occasion, had used a short form of "bidding prayer" instead of the collect before the sermon, and had also preached in his surplice. An uneasy feeling was even then manifested by a large portion of the congregation, and many of them actually left the Church. It was whispered about the parish, towards the close of last week, that, in case Mr. Ingle should attempt to preach in his surplice on Sunday, there would be "a row," and the parties who prognosticated a disturbance, and who, most probably, planned it, kept their word to the letter. The service went on as usual, up to the time of the sermon, the only departure from the form commonly observed in the parish being, that the Clergyman gave out the Psalms himself, instead of the parish clerk. Mr. Ingle proceeded, in the surplice, from the desk to the pulpit, and as soon as he began to announce the text,—which was from Judges, 9th chapter, 8th and several following verses—there was a movement on the part of many persons—from their seats—towards the doors. This created a good deal of noise and confusion, which was afterwards increased by coughing, hissing, and other discordant noises, such as one occasionally hears in the gallery of a theatre, or reads of as taking place in the House of Commons. Finding all his own efforts to restore silence, and to proceed with his sermon, fruitless, Mr. Ingle asked for the Churchwarden, and, finding he was not present, requested that he might be sent for, to preserve order in the Church, so that he might be able to proceed with his duties. Meanwhile, the confusion continued and increased. A message was sent to Mr. Ingle, in the pulpit, entreating him to put off his surplice, and to preach in his gown, or else to give the blessing, and dismiss the congregation. He declined to do either. Mr. William B. Hill, formerly a spirit merchant in Dix's Field, stood up, and addressed Mr. Ingle, and requested him, in the name of the parishioners, and of the congregation, to preach in his gown, in compliance with their wish. Still Mr. Ingle persisted in maintaining his position, in spite of the noise and uproar, and of the suggestion, more than once made audibly, to "turn him out." At length the Churchwarden, Mr. George Hayman, arrived, and standing upon a bench addressed the congregation, requesting those who were not disposed to listen quietly to the sermon to leave the Church, and intimating his determination, if any further disorder should ensue, to proceed against the authors of it, in the Ecclesiastical Court. About the same time the Mayor arrived, and joining his remonstrances to those of Mr. Hayman, their efforts were so far successful, that, the bulk of the congregation having retired, the sermon was permitted to proceed, without interruption to the end. Immense masses of people, however, still hung about the Churchyard, and in the adjacent streets, and, there being great reason to apprehend that Mr. Ingle's appearance among them would lead to a breach of the peace, the Mayor strongly urged him to quit the Church by a smaller door, and to proceed to his home by an indirect way. This the Rev. gentleman was extremely unwilling to do, and it is reported that the discussion was carried on with some warmth; the Mayor, however, in the end, prevailed. Mr. Ingle left the Church by the way indicated, and, after some time, the people gradually dispersed. There was some hissing and hooting in the street, which led to the apprehension of a young man named George Fry, by order of the Mayor; and the city, yesterday, was a good deal excited upon the matter.

The Evening Lectures are managed by a Committee, and are supported by voluntary contributions, and the Incumbents of the parishes in which they are preached are in no way responsible for the form in which the service is conducted. Their only alternative, if they disapprove, is to refuse their sanction, and to shut up the Churches altogether.

We have endeavored to give as impartial a statement as possible of the facts, so far as we have been able to collect them. The rumours, however, which are afloat, are so various, and so contradictory, that it is extremely difficult for any one who was not an eye witness, to elicit the truth. We ought to have stated that the police were in attendance, headed by the Superintendent, and acted under the direction of the Mayor, and of the Churchwarden, in clearing the Churchyard and preserving the peace.—Western Luminary.

From the Gospel Messenger.

The late venerable editor of this paper died at his residence in this city on Wednesday evening, the 15th inst., at half-past eight o'clock, in the 68th year of his age. His last illness though severe was not such as to induce belief that his end was so near at hand. He fell away so quietly that those who stood by his bedside did not know at what moment the vital spark had fled.

The funeral took place on Friday afternoon. The Sentences and Prayers from Bishop Hobart's Manual were said at the house, and the remains of the deceased were then conveyed to Trinity Church where the burial service was said, and a very appropriate and impressive discourse delivered by the Rev. Mr. Leeds, the publication of which was requested. The remains, accompanied by the mourning family and a committee of Grace Church, Utica, including its Rector, were then conveyed to New Jersey.

The Altar, Lecterns, and Pulpit were appropriately hung in black, with crape scarfs on the lamps and branches.

The services being concluded, the Rev. the Clergy adjourned to the rectory of Trinity Church, Utica; when,

On motion,

The Rev. M. A. Perry was called to the chair; and the Rev. Wm. A. Matson appointed secretary.

On motion,

A committee of three was appointed to report resolutions of respect and condolence in memory of the late Rev. JOHN CHURCHILL RUDD, D. D.

The Chair named the Rev. Dr. Proal, the Rev. S. H. Battin and the Rev. W. H. Paddock to constitute the committee.

The committee having taken a brief space for conference reported the following preamble and resolutions which were unanimously adopted; viz:

Whereas, it has pleased Almighty God in his wise Providence to take out of this world the soul of our reverend friend and brother JOHN CHURCHILL RUDD, D. D., in humble submission to the solemn and impressive lessons of this Divine visitation, the clergy of this city and vicinity desire to express our sense of the character—the talents—and the usefulness of the deceased in the various offices he has sustained as a Christian Pastor, an instructor of youth, and the conductor of a religious journal, during a ministry in the Church of upwards of forty years continuance. Therefore,

Resolved, That we shall ever hold in high regard and grateful remembrance the sound principles and policy—the zealous devotion to the interests of the Church of Christ—and the ability—unwearied industry—and distinguished wisdom, tempered with Christian moderation, with which he discharged the duties appertaining to the several relations he sustained at different periods to the Church of his love.

Resolved, That we cherish in kind recollection the enlarged hospitality—the Christian courtesy—and the urbanity which characterized and adorned his life.

Resolved, That the respectful and affectionate condolence of the clergy be tendered to his afflicted relict and family.

Resolved, That the Rev. Mr. Leeds be requested to furnish a copy of the address delivered this evening in Trinity Church, for publication in the Gospel Messenger.

Resolved, That these proceedings, signed by the Rev. Chairman and Secretary, be published in the Gospel Messenger and in the New York Churchman, and that a certified copy be handed by the Secretary to Mrs. Rudd.

Signed, MARCUS A. PERRY, Chairman.

WILLIAM A. MATSON, Secretary.

Obituary.

Died, at York, Pa., on Friday the 17th inst., after an illness of four weeks, HELEN, youngest daughter of A. B. Murray, Esq., formerly of Baltimore.

She lived a faithful christian, and died a conquering saint. Though young in years, she had grown in grace, and adorned the doctrines of her Saviour by the innocence and integrity of her life. He who gave her, has called her to Himself; and though those who knew and loved her best, can estimate their loss, yet they too know, that for her to die, was gain. Death in this instance has been robbed of his sting, and the grave of its victory. Her mortal remains now rest in the quiet churchyard of St. John's, awaiting the resurrection of the just.

"Tis sweet, as year by year we lose
Friends out of sight, in faith to muse
How grows in paradise our store."

Is it Rubrically obligatory to give Weekly Notice of Weekly Communion?

MR. EDITOR:

Forasmuch as the privilege of Weekly Communion is beginning again to be offered in our parishes, it may not be unacceptable to some of your intelligent readers, to examine by the light of rubrical and historical authority, the practical question proposed as the title of this article. Let it be premised, that on this point, as well as on that of Chanting the Psalter, and on all others connected with rubrical interpretation, each priest in his parish, will cheerfully submit his opinion to the learned and godly judgment of his ecclesiastical superior.

As the American clergy advance in the practical use of the various services of the Book of Common Prayer, it will be happy indeed if some questions of rubrical interpretation do not arise, the decision of which, must be chiefly left to their own judgments and liturgical investigations.

In such cases, the defence of one interpretation, and of the practice under it, ought not reasonably to be regarded as a condemnation of those who differ; and it is humbly submitted, especially to our lay-critics, that truth and union will be best promoted, by abstaining from dogmatical decisions of the anti-rubricality of their clergy, until they have demonstrated the extent of their own liturgical acquirements and their exemption from the fallibility of our common humanity. On few subjects is it easier for even good natured persons to mistake prejudice for principle, than in the interpretation of the Rubrics.

Is it rubrically obligatory to give weekly notice of weekly communion?

To this we respectfully answer, that in our opinion, there is no such obligation, but the rubric leaves the FREQUENCY of notice to the discretion of the minister. There are two rubrics supposed to bear on this point; the one which comes first reads as follows: "Then the minister shall declare unto the people what holy days or fasting days are in the week following to be observed; and (IF OCCASION BE) shall notice be given of the Communion, and of the bans of matrimony, and other matters to be published."

The first remark we shall make is, that the universal practice of the Bishops and inferior clergy, as to noticing the Fast days, demonstrates that they understand the first part of this rubric to mean occasional fast days. We never yet heard of any clergyman who Sunday after Sunday, under the supposed stringency of this rubric, gave out a notice of the ordinary weekly fast of Friday.

We pass on to examine the latter part of the rubric, which relates to the notice of the Communion.

"If occasion be"—says the rubric, without defining when there is occasion; thus manifestly leaving the decision of this point to the minister. Now it may be reasonably contended that there is no occasion for any notice, when the Holy Eucharist instead of being a monthly or tri-monthly addition to divine service, is established and universally known in a parish, as the chief act of worship of every Lord's day. All the members of the parish are aware of the fact, and thus the occasion for "publishing the matter" is removed. When however, the venerable sacrament is administered occasionally, and that, too, on an arbitrarily selected day, such as the first, or second, or last Sunday of the month, there is manifest occasion for a notice, it properly belongs to "matters to be published."

For the same reason, then, that no clergyman feels obliged by the first half of this rubric to give weekly notice of the weekly Friday fast, no one need feel obliged by the last half of the rubric to give weekly notice of the weekly communion. There is no occasion.

But the objection is made that there is another rubric bearing on this point, viz: that prefixed to the first exhortation, in the Holy Communion office, which expressly says that the priest shall give notice of every communion on the Sunday or Holy Day immediately preceding.

To this we reply, the rubric referred to, says no such thing. It makes no mention of any notice to be published, but speaks of "a warning," (a widely different matter in name and nature from a notice,) which when it is given, shall be read upon the Sunday or some Holy Day immediately preceding the communion, still leaving it, however, to the discretion of the priest as to the frequency of reading it, only specifying that when he reads it, he shall do so not a long time before, but on the Sunday or Holy Day immediately before the actual celebration. Let us suppose a case to illustrate the practical working of the two rubrics which we have been examining. Suppose a priest who administers the Holy Eucharist but once a month, on the last Sunday of the month, should say to his congregation, "I think there is no occasion for constantly giving you notice that the Holy Eucharist will be administered on the last Sunday in every month; this is a settled arrangement of my parish, and therefore is not a matter needing monthly publication." The first rubric we think fully justifies him in such action. He sees no occasion for a notice, and the rubric only says, "if there be occasion" such notice shall be given.

But suppose again, this same priest should say, "I desire to read to you monthly the warning, (not the first paragraph only, but the entire warning) in order to instruct you in your duty and responsibility and privileges as communicants; and I will read this 'warning' on the first Sunday of every month, although you are not to receive the Holy Eucharist until the last Sunday." The second rubric would, we think, condemn him; because it plainly declares that when such "warning" is given, it shall be upon the Sunday or Holy Day immediately preceding the actual celebration of the blessed sacrament. In other words, the minister may use his discretion as to the several times when he will give the warning, but whenever he decide to read it, he is bound to do it upon the Sunday or holy day immediately preceding the administration of the communion.

In our opinion, the question, "how often," is not touched by these rubrics. Let there be one farther remark made. By implication, we think, the spirit of the rubric would seem to enjoin that when the Holy Communion is monthly or less frequent, the entire warning (not notice merely) should be read on the Sunday before every such occasional administration. And even where the Holy Eucharist is administered every Sunday and Holy Day, we would respectfully suggest, that once a month, and before Christmas, Easter, and Whitsunday, it will be well to read one or other of the warnings for the instruction and edification of the people.

The grounds for this suggestion, and what circumstances there can be which will lead a pastor to hesitate, and use his discretion as to reading the warning weekly, need not be specified: they will perhaps be felt by such pastors as have determined, God helping them, to restore the Sunday and Holy Day communions.

As a fitting conclusion to this article, and confirmatory of the opinion expressed, we shall give the original rubrics of the 1st and 2d prayer books of Edward VI. From which it will be perceived, that from the first compilation of our Prayer Book, the frequency of reading the warning has been left to the discretion of the minister.

First Prayer Book of Edward VI. Rubric prefixed to what answers to our first exhortation.

"And if upon the Sunday or Holy Day the people be negligent to come to the communion, then shall the priest earnestly exhort his parishioners to dispose themselves to the receiving of the Holy Communion more diligently, saying these or like words unto them."

Second Book of Edward VI. Rubric prefixed to what answers to our second exhortation.

"Then shall follow this Exhortation at certain times when the curate shall see the people negligent to come to the holy communion."

Rubric prefixed to what answers to our first exhortation. "And sometimes shall be said this also, AT THE DISCRETION OF THE CURATE."

From the history of the Rubric, then, as well as from its actual language, we conclude, that there is no rubrical obligation compelling a minister to give either a weekly notice or warning of the weekly communion; but that the question of "frequency" is left to his discretion. And that when he does give warning it shall not be a long time beforehand, but on the Sunday or Holy Day immediately preceding the celebration, in order that, in view of the present celebration, the solemn truths and admonitions of the warning may produce the deeper effect.

For the Banner of the Cross.

Thanksgiving day at Burlington College is a reality as every thing else there is. There is no sham work about it. What is done is done in earnest. Thursday last being appointed by the civil authority in our diocese for the annual thanksgiving for the mercies of the past year, the day was observed in an appropriate and becoming manner by the members of Burlington College. The day itself was charming. It was one of those halcyon days we sometimes enjoy about this season of the year, and of course all was brightness and joy. The morning was given to the religious services of the day as appointed by the church. All the members of the household as usual attended the parish church, where they were all highly edified by an eloquent as well as practical sermon from the Rev. Dr. Ogilby, of the diocese of New Jersey. We cannot forbear giving a fuller notice of this admirable discourse. The Dr. chose for his text a passage from that awful denunciation against God's chosen people of old, for their rebellion and ingratitude, found in the prophecy of Isaiah.—"The ox knoweth his owner and the ass his master's crib; but Israel doth not know, my people doth not consider." After declaring in a forcible and striking manner, the enormity and danger of the sin of national ingratitude, the Rev. gentleman spoke most eloquently of the many mercies, which we as a nation, had now to be thankful for. We were reminded of the abundant harvests which have crowned the labors of the husbandman, of the health that has so universally prevailed throughout our borders, the success that has crowned our arms, and more, the blessed peace which has followed "the apparent dangers wherewith we were compassed," and we were entreated to call to mind the almost innumerable mercies which we as individuals have enjoyed, and were bid each one to offer for himself his praises and thanksgiving, since, in the apt and beautiful language of the preacher, "heart-work was never to be done by proxy." In concluding his remarks, the Rev. gentleman called upon all who heard him, as members of the flock to which they belonged, and of the diocese of New Jersey, to pour out their hearts in gratitude to an all merciful God, for having averted from them the blow which so lately threatened them, and for having restored again to health their beloved bishop and father, thus snatching them as it were from the very brink of a calamity, which even now it must make them shudder to look back and think upon. The hearty response which this touching appeal met with in every bosom was evinced by the deep interest with which all listened to it, and by the overflowing of more than one heart in tears which tell the soul. We know no appropriate epithet with which to qualify this sermon. It needs to have been heard to be known and appreciated.

The dinner at the College was such as a thanksgiving dinner ought to be—rich and abundant, doing great credit to the kind matron by whose management it was provided, and evidently enjoyed by all. The number of turkeys, puddings, &c. which were served up gave ample proof that though the soul and the mind are the first objects of care at Burlington College, yet the body is not wholly forgotten.

In the afternoon, the students of the college called en masse at the residence of the Bishop, and made their respects to his kind and well loved lady, the pleasure of their visit being marred by the single thought that their revered and beloved father was still unable, from his indisposition, to greet them as he was always wont, with a warm grasp of the hand, and a heart cheering smile.

In the evening, the whole household was invited to partake of an elegant oyster supper, gotten up by a committee appointed for the occasion, consisting of six of the students of the college, and we must say to the credit of these young gentlemen, that their skill in managing and arranging such affairs is not small, as might be fully testified to by all who had the good fortune to be present on the occasion. The evening was rendered bright and cheerful by the presence of many of the ladies of the neighborhood, and all passed off happily. It was a pleasant thing to see so much happiness among the members of a family like that of Burlington College. Everything was cheerful. The boys all seemed to forget the nightly cares and toils of a college life, and their bright and merry countenances told that they were happy, and that the home feeling which it is the design of this favored institution of the church to inspire, had found a place in all their hearts. Altogether the day was a delightful one. It was just such an one as the church means it should be—a day of joy and gladness—but a joy and gladness sanctified by the hallowing influences which the church herself exerts in her sacred services, and at Burlington College, it was truly, what we were at that time taught to consider it, "not only a holiday, but a holy-day." Convocation of Northern Pennsylvania.

The Convocation of Northern Pennsylvania held its Autumnal Session on the 17th ult., in St. James' Church, Muncy. There were present, Rev. Messrs. Natt, Field, Downing, and Clark, the remaining members of Convocation having been detained by the appointments of the Bishop. Rev. Mr. Clark read Divine Service, and Rev. Mr. Field preached the Convocation Sermon from 1 Peter, v. 5. On the following morning, the administration of the holy communion was postponed until the following day in consequence of the absence of the Bishop and several of the clergy. Rev. Mr. Clark read prayers, Rev. Mr. Field read the lessons, and Rev. Mr. Natt preached.

In the afternoon we proceeded to Derry, about nine miles from Muncy, to attend the consecration of the Church. Here we met with the Bishop, Rev. Messrs. Lightner, Heister, Ruderow, and Morris. The sentence of consecration was read by Rev. Mr. Lightner, prayers by Rev. Mr. Natt, the ante-communion by the Bishop, who preached from the words, "Keep thy foot when thou goest into the house of God, and be made ready, &c." This Church is one of the most beautiful we have ever seen in the country. It is of the early Elizabethan style of architecture, with south porch, projecting chancel, and small bowed windows of stained glass. The building is of frame, washed on the outside with a preparation of dark stone or slate color, and on the inside with a preparation of a light fawn color. The wood work of the interior is of imitation oak. The spirit and zeal of the Rev. Mr. Lightner, and a few families in Derry township, have contributed to erect in the forest this beautiful temple for the worship of our crucified Lord. Long may it stand a monument of pious zeal, and a habitation for the Lord.

At night, Rev. Mr. Heister read prayers, Rev. Mr. Lightner the lessons, and Rev. Mr. Field preached.

On the following morning Rev. Mr. Morris read prayers, Rev. Mr. Field the lessons, and the Bishop preached and administered the holy communion.

In the afternoon, after prayers by Rev. Mr. Downing, addresses were delivered on Missions by the Bishop, Rev. Messrs. Clark, Lightner, and Downing.

At night, prayers were read by Rev. Mr. Clark, the lessons by Rev. Mr. Lightner, sermon by Rev. Mr. Morris. The Bishop closed with an address, prayer, and the benediction.

The private sessions of the Convocation were full of interest, and tended much to give encouragement to the brethren who were present. The next session will be held in Williamsport, in January, a special meeting having been appointed for Derry in December.

New Publications.

We have received the following beautiful books for presents, published and for sale at the Depository of the General Protestant Episcopal Sunday School Union, No. 20 John Street, New York. Philadelphia, Mr. R. S. H. George, No. 16 South Seventh Street.

THE BOY AND THE BIRDS; by Emily Taylor, to which are added some choice selections.

GEORGE AUSTIN, OR PATIENCE AND PERSEVERANCE REWARDED.

BESSIE GREY, OR THE DULL CHILD.

SARAH, THE LITTLE MOUNTAINEER, OR I WISH I COULD READ: 33 pages, with engravings.

THE DOG, AN EXAMPLE OF FIDELITY.

THE WIDOW'S SON.

BEAR AND FORBEAR, OR THE HISTORY OF SARAH ALLEN.

The above little Books, together with similar works to be found at the Depository in New York, and at Mr. George's Bookstore in Philadelphia, offer a choice variety of appropriate presents either for Sunday Schools or the family circle. They are all attractive in external appearance, and their contents are the subject of strict and careful examination before the works are allowed to go on the shelves of the Sunday School Union. "The Boy and Birds" is a very beautiful book and well suited to please and instruct children. The other books though smaller and less ornamented, present corresponding attractions.

MY LITTLE GEOGRAPHY, edited by Mrs. L. C. Tuthill, is a pleasing book of instruction for children. It is published by Lindsay & Blakiston, Philadelphia.

Pennsylvania.—The Rt. Rev. Bishop Potter preached on Sunday evening last at the Church of the Advent, Philadelphia, and administered the rite of confirmation to twenty-one persons.

New Jersey.—CHURCH EXTENSION IN NEWARK.—A meeting of churchmen was held, on the evening of the day of the consecration of the New Grace church, Newark, in the building recently occupied by that congregation, in which service and a confirmation, for Christ Free Mission Church, had just been held, for the purpose of considering and adopting such measures as might be best calculated to extend the influence of the Church, in that large and flourishing city. The Bishop presided; at whose request, the Rev. Mr. Henderson stated briefly the circumstances which led to the call of the meeting. He referred especially to the wants of the German congregation of St. Matthew's, recently organized; and urged the immediate necessity of providing for them a suitable place of worship; as well as of making similar provision for the Free Mission Churches, Christ and St. Paul's, now established, and in successful progress. The Bishop stated very clearly and strongly, the duty and the privilege of Newark Churchmen, in regard to the great work now before them. He spoke particularly of the circumstances of promise, connected with the formation of the German congregation; and pointed out the probable influence it might exert, not only here, among a most important class of our citizens, but also in the Fatherland. He referred also to the other three parishes. (Christ, St. Paul's, and St. Philip's,) and showed how intimately their growth and prosperity were connected with the general interests of the Church. The results already attained,* as shown by the services of the evening, he held to be a token and proof of final and full success; and he closed by commending those infant parishes to the warm and active interest of all who desire to extend the benign influences of the Gospel in the Church.

After some interchange of opinion, as to the best mode of proceeding, it was unanimously agreed to organize a Board for Church Extension in Newark.—Missionary.

Western New York.—ORDINATION.—On Sunday, Nov. 19th, Bishop LeLancey held an ordination in Trinity church, Geneva, and admitted Mr. Edward Meyer to the holy order of Deacons. Morning Prayer was read by the Rev. Dr. Hale, assisted by the Rev. Professor Low, and the sermon was preached by the Rev. Dr. Van Ingen, of Rochester. The candidate was presented by the Rev. Mr. Bissell, the Rector of the Parish, who with the other clergy present, assisted in the distribution of the elements, when the communion was administered by the Bishop.

CONSECRATION.—Our readers will perceive that the appointment for the consecration of Grace church, Rochester, is postponed to Thursday, December 21st.

Virginia.—RECENT SERVICES BY BISHOP MEADE.—On Sunday morning, the 29th of October, the Bishop admitted to Priest's orders, in St. Paul's Church, Norfolk, the Rev. John C. McCabe, of Smithfield, and at night confirmed five persons in Christ's church. On Tuesday, the 31st inst., he was met by several of the clergy around, at Yorktown, where an excellent church, built on the ruins of the old one, was consecrated. The old and mouldering brick walls which enclosed the church and graveyard are also undergoing a thorough repair, and will protect for the future the graves and tombstones of some of the most esteemed and patriotic of the sons of Virginia, amongst whom are General Thomas Nelson, his father and grandfather. It is painful to state that not even a headstone or board marks the spot where the former lies interred. It is hoped and believed that this will not long continue so to be.

The Bishop proceeded from York to Williamsburg and spent two days in successive services with a number of the brethren. On the second day, the annual thanksgiving, appointed by the Church, for the fruits of the earth, was duly observed. Three days were then spent in Gloucester county and two in Matthews. The 9th and 10th of November were spent in Middlesex, at the once deserted and roofless, but now renovated, church, lying near the Rappahannock, and between the old mansions of Brandon and Rosegill. The country between these ancient seats is now filling up, whereas not a house was formerly to be seen between them, though six miles apart; now ten or twelve may be seen in that space belonging to the smaller farms into which these large estates have been divided.

The Bishop passed over from Middlesex to Lancaster and after services on the 11th, at the Court House, reached the neighborhood of old Christ church that evening, in readiness for services on the Sabbath at that interesting place.—Southern Churchman.

CONSECRATION.—Rev. and Dear Sir:—The absence of your correspondent from home, has prevented him from sending you before this, an account of the interesting services, which were held at Yorktown, on the 31st of October last, on the occasion of the consecration of the Church, lately rebuilt there. For two or three years, the Rev. Charles Minnigerode, has been holding regular services in this place of many recollections, where formerly, as in various other now "waste places" of Eastern Virginia, the Church had been established, but from the pressure of the times, and the want of laborers, been obliged to give up her hold. It may be interesting to your readers to learn, that when the Diocese of Virginia first met in Convention, after the Revolution, York county contained two Parishes, which were both represented in the Convention, until the year 1805, or thereabout. York-Hampton Parish, with two churches, one at Yorktown, and the other about five miles from Williamsburg, on the road to York, which is still called by an Indian name, Kiskiack; or, as it is vulgarly pronounced, Cheesecake. The other Parish was Charles Parish, with a Church half-way between York and Hampton, called the Glebe Church, or (from the river) Pocasin Church; of this, nothing but the foundation is remaining, and a few graves to remind the passer-by, what ground he is treading. Kiskiack Church shared the fate of the many Episcopal Churches, which after the Revolution became what are called Free Churches; that is to say, no one took care of it, and it went to decay; but it has been repaired lately, and is occupied, if we are rightly informed, by Baptists. The church at Yorktown was burned about the time that we lose all traces of it in the Journals of the Diocesan Conventions of Virginia; and Yorktown itself has ever since then, been deprived of regular services, until the time alluded to, when the Rev. Mr. M. gave his labors to our town. The inconvenience of holding services in the Court House, the interest manifested and the blessings attendant on the newly established services, induced the friends of the cause to make a strong effort for the rebuilding of the old church. God who put it into the heart of his people to form the plan, accompanied their efforts with his favor; the interest and liberality of others were excited, and the desire of our hearts was crowned with success; during the last summer a convenient, neat and handsome church, was built upon the old foundation, and ready for consecration at the time of the Bishop's autumnal visit to Eastern Virginia.

Bishop Meade who arrived the day before, proceeded to consecrate the church at 11 o'clock, on Friday morning, the 31st of October, accompanied by the Rev. Messrs. Good, of Hampton, Mann, of Gloucester, Carraway, of Matthews, Wm. J. Jackson, of Norfolk, Denison, of Williamsburg, and Minnigerode, the Rector of the Parish.—Ibid.

Indiana.—LAYING OF THE CORNER STONE OF CHRIST CHURCH, MADISON, INDIANA.—The corner-stone of the new edifice for the congregation of Christ church, Madison, was laid on the 31st October, by the Rt. Rev. Bishop Kemper; the Rev. R. B. Claxton, Rector of the Parish, and the Rev. J. L. Harrison, late Missionary at Madison, taking part in the services. The Bishop and the Rector addressed the numerous assembly that met to witness the ceremonies. The weather was delightful, and expressions of gratitude and rejoicing abounded on the part of the members of this, until lately, feeble and depressed Parish.

The building, which is to be of the early Gothic order, is to be erected under the superintendence of a most accomplished architect, W. Russell West, Esq., now of Cincinnati, but formerly of Philadelphia. If executed according to its design, it will be a gem among buildings of its class; tasteful and elegant in its structure, and at the same time commodious, and economical. It is intended to seat 450 persons, and will have nearly 90 pews or slips on the ground floor. May the comfortable Gospel of Christ be there ever truly preached and received, and truly followed, to the breaking down the kingdom of sin, Satan, and death.

The friends of the Church will be glad to learn that a very large proportion of the funds needed for the building have been subscribed in Madison; members of other churches freely assisting the members of the little flock of Episcopalians there. It is hoped that brethren in the East will not forget the claims of an enterprise to build a church in the largest city of Indiana. Churchman.

CLERICAL CHANGES.—The Rev. W. P. Johnson, late Rector of St. Andrew's church, St. Mary's county, Maryland, has resigned his charge, and has accepted a unanimous call to the Rectorship of St. Andrew's Church, St. Andrew's Parish, Jackson, Mississippi.

The Rev. Wm. J. Timmer, having accepted a call to Trinity church, Appalachicola, requests all letters to be sent there.

MISS H. M. PHELPS, PRINCIPAL.

The duties of this Institution will be resumed Sept. 1st. The location of the school being intermediate between the northern and southern sections of the country, together with the superior literary advantages it enjoys, recommends it favorably to the notice of southern parents who wish their daughters to avail themselves of the system of education pursued in northern schools. Philadelphia affords facilities for acquiring the ornamental branches of learning which few other cities possess, being the centre of refinement, literature, and art, in our country, and hence, masters of eminence may be obtained for the departments of Music, Drawing, and Foreign Languages, with more certainty than in most other places. A lady from Paris is a resident Teacher, and the French will be the current language of those who study it. The whole course will be systematic, thorough and extensive. The arrangements for boarding pupils are those of a well regulated Christian household and home. The conventional forms of polite and refined society are taught as a part, not unimportant of the education of the young, while their moral and religious culture will be most carefully attended to.

THE RETREAT,

A Boarding and Day School for Young Ladies. Under the supervision of the Bishop of Pennsylvania.

On School-house Lane, five miles from Philadelphia.

Miss M. A. SPAFARD, Principal, Mrs. E. SPAFARD, Vice-Principal, M. FELIX DROUIN, late Professor University of France, Teacher of French and Latin, Mr. JOHN CLIFFE ROGERS, Professor of Music. With a number of Assistants.

Extract from the address of the Bishop of Pennsylvania to the Convention of 1848.

"The female school, known as the Retreat, in School-house Lane, near Germantown, has been signally favored not only by the smiles of Divine Providence, but also with the influence of the Divine Spirit. Considerably more than a third of all the resident or boarding pupils have within the last two months been confirmed, and have also become communicants, under circumstances which have inspired me with the most lively hopes in respect to their future character and influence as Christian women. The order and spirit prevailing throughout the school have been excellent: the discipline is quiet, effective, and eminently domestic; the position of the buildings and grounds is alike beautiful and healthy; and the patronage bestowed upon it most encouraging."

The Women of the Bible,

By Eminent Clergymen.

GEORGE S. APPLETON, 164 Chestnut street, corner of Seventh in Swain's Buildings, has now READY, in one imperial 8vo. volume, a new Sacred Gift, which, for the elegance of its typography, for the high artistic character of the engravings, for the gorgeousness of its binding, and last, but most important, for the valuable literary sketches, may safely be expected to be the favorite Gift Book for the coming Festival Season. It is entitled

THE WOMEN OF THE BIBLE.

Delimited in a series of sketches of prominent females mentioned in the Holy Scriptures. By Clergymen of the United States. Edited by Jonathan M. Wainwright, D. D., of Trinity Church, New York. Embellished with 18 superb engravings, executed in the line manner in the highest style of the art. Magnificently bound in alto-relievo, an entirely new style in this country, by Mr. J. T. Altamus. Price $7, or with the plates colored in very elegant style, $12.

For a Christian Gift to a lady, no volume can be more appropriate, containing truly excellent articles from the pens of such clergymen as the Rev. Drs. Sprague, Muhlenberg, Cheever, De Witt, Wainwright, Higbee, Vermilye, Vinton, Potts, Coit, Atkinson, Kip, Cooke, and the Rt. Rev. Drs. Burgess, Doane, and McIlvaine, on such subjects as Hagar, Rebekah, Rachel, Potiphar's wife, Pharaoh's Daughter, Deborah, Jephthah's Daughter, Delilah, Ruth, Hannah, Abigail, Queen of Sheba, Jezebel, Athaliah, Esther, Sara, wife of Tobias, Judith, and the Mother in Maccabees.

EDWARD C. JONES.

FROM REV. H. E. MONTGOMERY,

Rector of All Saints' Church.

I perceive by your advertisement that you have opened a Female Seminary at Mantua. From a knowledge of you personally for several years, I cheerfully subscribe my testimony to your ability and excellence as an instructor of the young. Since we were at the University together, where you took a distinguished stand, I have received many evidences that you were peculiarly fitted for the career on which you entered so early, and to which I am glad, all things considered, that you have returned, and believe that you will fully justify the confidence that parents may repose in you by entrusting to you the education of their children.

FROM REV. DR. CLAY,

Rector of Gloria Dei Church.

I cordially concur in the sentiments expressed above in relation to the school you have opened in the village of Mantua. I believe you to be peculiarly fitted for the education of youth, and feel assured that parents who entrust their daughters to your care, will have them well and efficiently instructed.

"Be Pitiful."

BY THE REV. EDWARD C. JONES.

Servant of Christ—alas! how oft,
With languid faith and senses dull,
Hast thou the import large forgot,
Of those sweet words—"Be Pitiful,"

And yet how binding is the Law,
Which love of self can ne'er annul,
The Law, which, taxing every heart,
Would bid each pulse—"Be pitiful."

"Be pitiful"—for, longing eyes,
Moist with such tears as Pilgrims shed,
Through blinding drops look up to Thee,
When Hope is wrecked, and sunlight fled.

And he, who, in temptation's hour,
Poor child of frailty, strayed and fell,
Shall in thine ear with quivering tone,
His tale of sad defection tell.

Say not—'tis hard to stoop to woe,
Nor yield but stunted sympathy;
Go, condescend to lowliest deed,
When sin abused a God for thee,

Not stoop to woe? Yon sunbeam bright,
Can nestle in a flower's breast,
The Star can give itself to Earth;
When mirrored 'neath the billow's crest,

Those Rainbow tints which paint the cloud,
Can linger on the dancing spray,
The Bird which carols far aloft,
Can chirp in quiet glens its lay.

So, child of Jesus, speed to bless,
The humblest soul that craves thy care,
Mindful, that for each gentle act,
Thou shalt a Saviour's favour share.

Then, chronicled beyond the stars,
"Thy righteous dealing" all shall be,
And Mercy, in the day of ire,
Shall spring a healing stream, for thee.

Selections.

From The Bishop of Oxford's Charge.

THE BISHOP AND HIS CLERGY.

The actings of this office are, as I have said, circumscribed and narrowed amongst ourselves until there scarcely is left to it any authority, save that which man gave not, and which man cannot take away—its spiritual authority, amongst those who believe it to be God's appointment, and who honour it for His sake. As far as regards the withdrawal of many of those external aids which heretofore increased its sway, it may be, that the wisdom of God has permitted their gradual removal, in order thus to free it from the secularism which, so soon as the powers of the world are on her side, is always ready to creep over the offices of Christ's Church. It may be, that He is intending thus to call forth within the Church of this nation a more lively sense of that dispensation of His Spirit which He has verily bestowed upon her; and to teach her to trust in things divine more simply to that promised Presence of Himself with her, in which alone, and not in any arm of flesh, can be her strength. Certain it is, that wherever this apostolic office has been administered in faith and prayer, with singleness of aim and humility of soul, and where have gathered around it a faithful Laity and Clergy, seeing in it God's appointment, that there it has been ever found to be at once the living spring and tempering rule of united, and therefore effectual action for our Lord and Master.

It is as holding, however unworthily, such an office, that I come to-day amongst you; desiring greatly to be amongst you, through the aid of God, as a partner of your labours, a sharer of your griefs, a lightener of your anxieties, a helper of your joy; earnestly entreating your prayers that I may have grace so to fulfil the duties of my office, that, at the great day, I may give up my account with joy; and bespeaking, my reverend brethren, your forbearance towards the infirmities and errors which may attend my administration, your candid interpretation of much which, as years pass on, suspicion might distrust, or maliciousness pervert; your confidence in the singleness and simplicity of my desire to discharge its duties, as in God's sight, and your full and cheerful co-operation with me in the due fulfilment of our great common trust.

It is as having this trust in common that we meet here to take counsel together as to our common interests. That we should so consult together, I deem most important; for without such united counsels, that union which is essential to our strength must be impossible. And, on this account, I greatly lament the change which has gradually passed over these our Diocesan gatherings.

Excellent as in many respects is the working of that law of necessary publicity to which almost all action is now subjected, it is, undoubtedly, a great hindrance to taking counsel when it must be taken in public: and a Bishop's visitation would be another, and for his Diocese, I believe, a far more effectual instrument of good, if he then spoke only to those immediately concerned with the matters as to which he speaks, and consulted with those only with whom he has to work.

Such an institution, however, a visitation cannot now be; and the impossibility of its being so makes me the more desire to supply this lack of free intercourse by other provisions. It is with this view that I have proposed to the Rural Deans and other officers of the Diocese, what their kindness has enabled me hitherto to carry out, that we should spend annually some days together at Cuddesdon, for common prayer and common counsel.

Greatly should I rejoice to carry out this practice further amongst the body of the Clergy, should it be desired by any number of them. The spirit of earnest piety has, I believe, been kept alive in other branches of Christ's Church, favoured far less than we are in purity of faith and doctrine, by nothing so much as by such habitual meetings of the Bishop with his Clergy, for some days of separation from all worldly business, for mutual counsel and prayer, and reading God's word, and meditation, and partaking together of the holy Eucharist.

It is, moreover, to give practical reality to this close connexion between myself and those who labour in the several parochial charges of the Diocese, that I have required,—as I have already stated to you, through the Archdeacons,—that I should be consulted before any unlicensed Clergyman officiates more than three times within the Diocese: and, for the same purpose, I now express my desire that in this Diocese, as in many others, no formal nomination should be given to a Curate until the Incumbent has consulted me upon his fitness for the proposed cure.

To secure further this inter-communion, and, as far as possible, to make the Episcopal office felt in your several parishes to be a living reality, and not a mere abstraction, it is moreover my desire, my reverend brethren, to join as often as possible in your parochial services. I wish that I could hope to be occasionally with all; but this the extent of an English Diocese makes well-nigh impossible. But it will be my endeavour to be from time to time with as many as opportunity allows in their ordinary Sunday services. These and our other meetings will, I trust, give us many opportunities for that free intercourse and closer converse which I am most anxious to maintain with you, and which many circumstances render little possible at this our mere official meeting. Whilst, however, it no longer affords scope for this, we may, through God's aid, render it not a little useful. We may profitably take together a more general view of our position,—of its strength, and of its weakness, of its duties and its blessings.

INFLUENCE OF THE CLERGY.

The Confirmation progress which carried me to so many places in the Diocese, showed me our parochial system in actual exercise. I saw in the work which God is enabling us to do, much for which heartily to thank Him; I saw, as was natural to a fresh eye, charged with such an oversight, many of the weaknesses which mar our full success.

And of these, my reverend brethren, there is one upon which for many reasons, I desire to speak to you with all plainness—I mean our frequent want of union amongst ourselves; a want which too often grows into absolute disunion.

There is much in his very position which tends unless he is watchful against the danger, to separate the English parochial Clergyman from his brethren. He has his own charge, his own circle of duties and difficulties, his own way of meeting and performing them; his brethren have theirs. He has no concern in their parishes; they have none in his: thus his sympathies become narrowed: he is a little sovereign in his own realm; he views with some dislike customs which vary from, and perhaps condemn, his own; he does not feel that he is administering one part of a common system; he has the independence, and with it, rely upon it, he has the weakness of individual action. The chief external guards against this danger seem to be, (1) in the living action of the common Episcopate, by which each separate ministry may feel itself drawn up into a common head: and, (2) in a greater amount of intercourse, upon directly religious and parochial subjects, between the Clergy themselves. To promote this, the Rural Deans have kindly acted upon my request, in inviting their brethren to the rural chapters, at which they may partake together of the highest act of Christian worship and communion, and discuss with friendly openness all the various questions which arise in the course of every ministry.

Here then is a special work for us, to be at once the advocates and correctors of the poor; to watch for them and their right: to witness for them and their claims, to those who have, as stewards, what is too soon likely to seem to them their own; and yet, at the same time, instead of flattering the poor by the false pretence that all is right in them, and all wrong in those above them, to seek to train them, in their special duties of patient contentment and obedience; to stimulate and to guide the consciences of all, by plain, homely, earnest, real preaching from God's Word, which shall reach both rich and poor, by bringing home to each, in their actual present temptations, their sin and their Saviour, their separation and their brotherhood. A true Christian sympathy is the golden key which will open hearts to us: we must use it in the Church, in the school, in the cottage,—in the last as much as in the first. If England is to be preserved in the peace and happiness which more than any other land she has so long enjoyed, it must be by God's blessing on our labours, and on the instruments which we have to use. Much as legislation may do in many ways, it cannot do all, or nearly all, which must be done. Laws will not reach men's hearts; and nothing short of reaching their hearts will meet our needs. We must aim at reaching these; and it is mainly through the ties and affections of family life that we can hope to reach them; and through these we must bring to bear upon them the higher influences of the spiritual life. Thus must we win from them a hearing for the Word of God, thus bring them to holy Sacraments, and so leading them on from things earthly to things heavenly, bring them indeed under the healing hands of Christ our Lord. For in all our efforts at social improvement, we must bear in mind this our highest object.

Now, in looking practically into the degree in which, as a body, we are enabled to succeed in this our work, I am led to think that what, above all other things, we need, is the power of kindling amongst our flocks a warmer spirit of devotion. Here, I am convinced, is our great deficiency. We have many who respect us, and listen to us; who are decent, orderly, well-behaved; but we want more decided converts from the love of this world; more who are really won to the love of God in Christ; and, as the result of this, more and heartier worshippers, instead of merely decent listeners, within our Churches. This gift, of course, like every other, must come of God: but it is our duty to see whether any lack in us prevents our receiving it, or whether we can do any thing more earnestly to seek it.

HOLY COMMUNION—BAPTISM.

Believing as we do, that this great ordinance is not merely a well-contrived invention for exciting our religious sympathy or sensibility, but that it is also a special means of grace, in which the souls of the faithful are strengthened and refreshed by the body and blood of Christ, as our bodies are by the bread and wine, I see not how we can expect our people to flourish in things spiritual, with the scanty opportunities of such refreshment allowed them in too many parishes. This state of things is in fact, the painful consequence of a time of coldness and unfaithfulness, from which we have I trust, through God's great mercy, passed; and I would earnestly beseech you, my reverend brethren, by gradual alterations, so to restore the older and better custom as to let the monthly Eucharist be, in every parish, the least frequent celebration of this holy feast; and where the number of communicants required by the Rubric is oftener to be found, to multiply still further, as you see expedient, these opportunities of communion. I cannot doubt but that a new era of spiritual life would be attained in many a parish, if such an increase in the number of celebrations were introduced with plain, earnest, and affectionate addresses and explanations to your people, as to the great privilege thus secured to them, and the love of Christ in its provision.

In close connexion with this subject, let me strongly urge upon you a strict observance of the rule laid down for us by the Church, that we administer holy Baptism on Sundays and holy-days in the face of the congregation. In parishes where this rule has become obsolete, it will of course require judgment, gentleness, patience, and kindness to restore the true use without giving injurious offence to those for whose sake it is observed. But this offence may, I am convinced, be prevented, by full explanations, both public and private, of the obligation and benefit of the rule, and by gentleness in its enforcement; by commencing, for instance, at least, with holding, on one Sunday in the month, a public baptism in the course of the service, and on other Sundays winning all who can be won, to remain and take their part, immediately after the public service, in the prayers with which these little ones are brought to Christ.

THE SWEETEST MUSIC.—Music is sweetest when heard over rivers, where the echo thereof is best rebounded by the waters. Praise for pensiveness, thanks for tears, and blessing God over the floods of affliction, make the most melodious music in the ear of heaven.—Fuller.

For the following interesting and instructive article, we are indebted to "the Irish Ecclesiastical Journal."

We take this occasion to thank the kind friend so far away who sends us this valuable Journal.

Order of Divine Service in the Primitive Church.

SUN.—The order of celebrating public worship in the ancient Christian Church of the first three centuries can hardly fail to be of interest to all your readers. As the books in which the accounts of it are to be found are rarely to be met with, it may be acceptable to many, both of the laity and clergy, to have before them the following paper, setting forth the exact rules, or, as we now commonly call them, rubrics; extracted from the first volume of the Collection of Ecclesiastical Councils, by Labbe and Cossart.

Yours truly, ARTHUR PERCIVAL,
Queen's Chaplain.

Little Bookham, Sept. 7, 1848.

All being properly seated, and there being silence, let the reader in the midst, from a raised place, read the Books of Moses, Joshua, Judges, Kings, Chronicles, Ezra on the return of the people, Job and Solomon, and the sixteen prophets. After every two lessons let another sing the Psalms of David; the people joining at the beginning of the verses. Then let the Acts of the Apostles be read and the Epistles of Paul; and then let a presbyter or deacon read the Gospels. And when the Gospel is read, let all, clergy and people, stand in solemn silence.—(Apost. Const. ii. 57.)

After the reading of the Law and the Prophets, and Epistles, and Acts and Gospels, let the Bishop salute the Church, saying:

The Grace of our Lord Jesus Christ, and the love of God the Father, and the fellowship of the Holy Ghost, be with you all!

People.—And with thy spirit.

After this salutation let the presbyters separately, and last of all the bishop, address to the people words of exhortation. And when the bishop has finished his teaching, let all stand up, and let the deacon ascend the platform and proclaim:

Let none of the hearers, let none of the unbelievers remain!

And, silence being made, let him say:

Catechumens, pray!

And let all the faithful pray earnestly for them, saying:

Lord have mercy!

Let him minister for them, saying:

Let us all pray God for the catechumens. [Here follows what is called a bidding prayer, in which the deacon specified the different blessings for the catechumens, for which he bade the prayers of the Church, ending with these words to the catechumens.] Bow down and receive the blessing!

At every one of the things which the deacon proclaims as above, let all the people, but especially the children, say:

Lord have mercy!

And when they have all bent their heads, let the bishop bless them after this fashion:

[Here follows a prayer by the bishop in answer to the bidding of the deacon.]

After this, let the deacon say:

Catechumens, depart in peace!

When they are gone out let him say:

Pray, ye that are vexed with unclean spirits!

Let us all earnestly pray for them. [Here follows another bidding prayer for these persons, ending as before.] Bow down and receive the blessing!

And let the bishop bless them, saying:

[Here follows a prayer for the vexed by the bishop, corresponding to the bidding of the deacon.]

Deacon. Ye that are vexed, depart!

After these, let him proclaim:

Pray, ye that are instructed for Baptism.

[By these are meant persons whose catechising was completed, and who were waiting for the season of Baptism, in those times ordinarily administered at Easter or Whitsuntide.]

Let all the faithful pray earnestly for them. [Here follows another bidding prayer for these persons.]

When they have signed themselves unto the Lord through His Christ, let them bow down and receive blessing from the bishop after this fashion:

[Here follows a prayer by the bishop for these persons.]

Deacon.—Ye that are instructed for Baptism, depart!

After this let him proclaim:

Pray earnestly, ye that are in repentance, [i. e. under ecclesiastical censure.]

Let us all make supplication for the brethren in repentance. [Here follows another bidding prayer for the penitents, ending.] Bow down and receive the blessing.

Then let the bishop pray for them thus, with imposition of hands.

[Here follows a prayer for the penitents by the bishop.]

Deacon.—Ye that are in repentance, depart!

Deacon.—Let none of them who ought not, depart! Let all the faithful bow the knee, and let us all pray God. [Here follows a bidding prayer for the faithful, all estates of men in the Church, and all enemies and persecutors.]

Chief Priest.—[Here follows a prayer beginning, "Almighty and Most High Lord."]

Deacon.—Let us attend!

Bishop.—The peace of God be with you all!

People.—And with thy spirit!

Deacon.

Salute ye one another with an holy kiss!

Then let the clergy salute the bishop; the men the men, and the women the women. Let the children stand on the rise, and let another deacon be over them, that they make no disorder. Let other deacons walk about and observe the men and the women, that there be no noise, nor nodding, nor whispering, nor sleeping. Let some deacons stand at the doors by which the men come into church, and sub-deacons at the women's entrance, and take care that no one go out, and that the door be not opened during the time of the Offertory, not even for one of the faithful. Let one of the sub-deacons minister water to the priests to wash their hands, in token of the purity of their hearts, which are dedicated to God.

Then immediately let the deacon say:

Let none of the catechumens be present! nor any of the hearers! nor of the unbelievers! nor of the heretics! Let those who are permitted to hear the first prayer depart! Let the mothers attend to their children! Let no one harbour evil against another! Let none be present in hypocrisy! Let us stand upright to make offering before the Lord with fear and trembling!

When these things are done, let the deacons present the gifts to the Bishop at the altar; and let the presbyters stand on his right hand and on his left, as disciples in attendance on their master. Let two deacons stand one on each side of the altar, having fans of thin skin, or peacocks' feathers, or fine linen, to drive away the small insects, lest they fall into the cup.

Then let the chief priest, when he has prayed privately with the priests, clothed in bright garments, stand at the altar, and when he has made the sign of the cross on his forehead in the presence of all the people, let him say:

The grace of the Almighty God, and the love of our Lord Jesus Christ, and the communion of the Holy Ghost, be with you all!

Let all with one voice say:

And with thy spirit!

Chief Priest.—Lift up your hearts.

People.—We have lift them up unto the Lord.

Chief Priest.—Let us give thanks unto the Lord.

People.—It is meet and right so to do.

Chief Priest.

It is very meet and right above all things to praise thee. [Here follows a long enumeration of causes of thanksgiving, concluding thus.] The cherubim and six winged seraphim, with two wings covering their feet, with two their faces, and using two for flight, say, with thousand times thousand archangels, and ten thousand times ten thousand angels, crying without cessation or interruption:

Let all the people say together:

Holy, Holy, Holy Lord of Sabaoth, heaven and earth are full of thy glory. Blessed be Thou for ever. Amen.

Chief Priest.

For Thou art truly holy and most holy, the highest and most exalted for ever, thine holy and only begotten son, our Lord and God Jesus Christ. [Here follows an enumeration of the mercies of Jesus Christ to men under the earlier dispensations and under the new, until His Ascension.] We, therefore, being mindful of the things which He underwent for our sakes, give thanks unto Thee, Almighty God, not as we ought, but as we can: and fulfil his appointment: "For in the night in which he was betrayed," [here follow the words of institution, ending] "till I come." We, therefore, being mindful of His sufferings and death, and resurrection from the dead, and His return into heaven, and of his future second coming, in which He cometh with glory and power to judge the living and the dead, and to reward every man according to his works, offer, according to His appointment, this bread and this cup to Thee, the King and God, giving thanks to Thee through Him, in that Thou hast made us meet to stand before Thee, to minister unto Thee. And we beseech Thee, O Thou God, who standest in need of nothing, favourably to look upon these gifts placed before Thee; and be Thou pleased with them in honour of Thy Christ, and send Thy Holy Spirit, the witness of the sufferings of the Lord Jesus, upon this sacrifice, that He may make this bread the body of Thy Christ, and this cup the blood of Thy Christ, that they who partake of it may be established in godliness; may obtain remission of sins; be delivered from the devil and his errors; may be filled with the Holy Spirit; may become worthy of Thy Christ, and obtain eternal life, Thou, Almighty Lord, being reconciled to them.

Yet again we pray Thee, O Lord, for thy Holy Church, from one end of the earth to the other. [Here follows a collection of prayers in which all the objects are sought which have been enumerated by the deacon in his bidding prayer.]

People.—Amen.

Bishop.—The peace of God be with you all!

People.—And with thy spirit.

Deacon.

Again and again let us pray God through His Christ, over the gift offered to the Lord God. [Here follows a short bidding prayer.]

Bishop.

O God, great, and of great name. [Here follows a supplication for the mercies specified in the deacon's bidding prayer.]

People.—Amen.

Deacon.—Let us attend!

Bishop.—Holy things for holy persons!

Let the people attend.

Bishop.—One holy, one Lord, one Christ, to the glory of God the Father blessed for ever more. Amen.

Glory to God in the highest, and on earth peace, good will towards men! Hosanna to the Son of David! Blessed is He that cometh in the name of the Lord, God and Lord who hath appeared unto us! Hosanna in the Highest!

Then let the Bishop receive, then the presbyters, deacons, sub-deacons, readers, singers, ascetics; and of the women, the deaconesses, virgins, and widows; lastly the children; and then all the people in order, with modesty and reverence, without noise.

When the bishop giveth the oblation, let him say:

The body of Christ!

And let him that receiveth say: Amen.

Let the deacon hold the cup, and when he giveth it, let him say:

The blood of Christ! The cup of Life!

And let him that receiveth say: Amen.

While the people communicate, let the thirty-third Psalm [English version, 34th] be recited. When all, both men and women, have communicated, let the deacons take what remains into the sacristy. [Eng. Vestry.]

The Psalm being ended, let the deacon say:

Let us who have been partakers of the precious body and the precious blood of Christ give thanks. [Here follows a short bidding prayer.]

Let the Bishop give thanks.

O Almighty God, the Father of the Christ the blessed Son. [A thanksgiving corresponding with the deacon's bidding.]

People.—Amen.

Deacon.—Bow down to God in his Christ, and receive the blessing. Bishop.—O Almighty God, true and incomparable. [Here follows a prayer for blessing.]

People.—Amen.

Deacon.—Depart in peace!

NOTE.—The reader will here observe the scrupulous care taken by the framers of this primitive service that none but communicants should be admitted to the privilege of the Offertory. The ancient ecclesiastical records abound with rules to the same effect. It was accounted pollution and profanation that the sacred services, or buildings, or widows and orphans of the Church, should be sustained by the alms of any not such. They were not received, neither into the sacristy, nor into the more common treasury; in all cases where it was possible they were returned; and where that could not be, applied for the lowest office of procuring fuel. For which reference was made to Levit. vii. 17-19, and xix. 6, 7. Those who would see more upon this subject, not without interest at the present moment, (which allusion will be understood by those whom it concerns,) will find a valuable collection of ecclesiastical authorities upon it in a note to the twenty-eighth Canon of the Council of Eliberis (A. D. 305), in Labbe and Cossart's Magna Concilia, vol. i. pp. 1195-1199.

A Funeral Discourse,

On the Rev. JOHN C. RUDD, D.D. By the Rev. WILLIAM BERRIAN, D.D., Rector of Trinity Church, New York. Preached at St. John's Church, Elizabethtown, New Jersey, Nov. 19, 1848.

The venerable servant of the Lord who so long ministered among you, my brethren, and who has since, in another sphere, been such an honored instrument in promoting the glory of God and doing good unto men, has at length finished his course, and now rests from his labors. Though for a great many years he had been broken down in body, he was nevertheless unconquered in spirit; continuing his services to the Church till almost literally the last breath of his life, and dying in the midst of his usefulness. He had reached that term when we naturally long for quiet and repose in the active exercise of his intellectual powers, and impressed his own thoughts on thousands, at a time when most men are lost sight of, if not absolutely forgotten.

It will be a melancholy pleasure to give a true and faithful portraiture of the man, who was the friend of my youth and my companion in riper years, and with whom, under all the changes of time and place, I was accustomed to take sweet counsel, till the very stroke which has separated us from each other.

John Churchill Rudd was born at Norwich, Connecticut, in 1780. The precise condition of his parents, and the circumstances of his education, are matters of which, notwithstanding the length of my intimacy with him, I am in a great measure ignorant. I have always supposed, however, that he was one of those active and enterprising men with which the State in which he was born so greatly abounds; who, conscious of their strength, firm in purpose, and persevering in their aim, are bent on making their way in the world not only with the lack of patronage and support, but in spite of all the obstacles which may oppose them. The outset of his life was a constant struggle with difficulties. For it appears that he was for several years engaged in the humble but honorable occupation of a teacher, with a view at once to provide for his immediate wants, and to prepare himself for the higher vocation, to which, in the grace and providence of God, he was afterwards called. With what diligence and success he overcame the disadvantages of his situation, may be fairly inferred from the estimation in which he was held by one of the most acute and sagacious men who ever lived,* and from his speedy settlement in a parish at all times remarkable for its intelligence, refinement, and taste.

My acquaintance with him commenced a short time previous to this event, but did not ripen into intimacy till several years after. By a train of circumstances which it is here unnecessary to explain, I was then brought into such close relations and such frequent intercourse with him, as to enable me to form a just estimate of his mind and character, and of his standing and influence among the people committed to his charge.

Sobriety in his views, soundness of judgment, and a desire to turn all his labors to a practical account, marked even the earliest efforts of his ministry, as they have, in a more eminent degree, distinguished him in his subsequent course. From the very beginning, he seems to have formed his opinions with the utmost care, and then to have held on to them with an unflinching tenacity. Whether for right, or for wrong, it is an element of greatness, without which, as a general rule, no man can attain a lasting ascendancy over the minds of others. What he was at five and twenty when I first knew him, he continued to be at three score and ten—steadfast, immovable, and in every essential point entirely unchanged.

* Dr. Hobart.

He was a Churchman, after the pattern of him whom he regarded as the embodiment of sound Church principles, and whom personally he loved and venerated above all men living. "Evangelical truth and apostolical order"—the motto of the leader whom it was his glory to follow, he regarded as inseparable in the appointment of God, and while he therefore preached the one with fidelity, he set forth the other with fearlessness, and yet, at the same time, with charity and prudence.

But though soberness, soundness, and practical good sense, were the distinguishing features of his mind, yet he was by no means deficient in fertility of invention, and sprightliness of thought. Indeed these qualities were so striking in all his earlier compositions, as to make their union with those higher gifts somewhat remarkable. He particularly excelled in his delineation of scriptural characters, where his active imagination, aided by his nice and accurate observation of human life and the human heart, enabled him to fill up the brief sketches of the sacred volume with so much skill, and to adorn them with such touches of feeling, as to give them an unusual degree of interest and truth. From his persuasion that these were among the happiest of his productions, which was strengthened no doubt by the opinions of his friends, he had entered into some communications with myself and others with a view to their publication, but a very short time before his death.

It is proper, however, to remark, in connection with the character of his discourses, that much of their just and natural effect was lost in their delivery from the pulpit by certain physical disadvantages under which he labored, even before his health was impaired, and by the want of that ease and freedom which the most thorough education can alone impart. But still, as there was gravity, sincerity, conscientiousness, together with an earnest desire that they might be profitable unto those to whom they were addressed, and as the matter of them was always fitted to make them so; they were listened to by his flock with respectful attention, and followed, by God's blessing, with the fruits of good-living.

But the power and influence of this excellent man over the minds of his people were owing more to his social character and the kindness of his disposition, than to his intellectual gifts. To those who have only known him in the feebleness and infirmity of age, when from almost incessant pain he rarely had that placid air which naturally belonged to him, and when his tongue with difficulty gave utterance to the thoughts which were still prompted by the warmth of his feelings, no adequate conception can be formed of him, as he appeared to his parishioners and friends in early life. Then the openness and benignity of his countenance, were in perfect harmony with the frankness of his manners and the benevolence of his heart. His kind and gentle words fell pleasantly upon the ear, and his cordial sympathies with every human being, with whom he stood in any endearing relation, touched tenderly upon the heart. There was nothing that in any way affected them, whether for weal or for woe, in which he was not concerned; and though in "the changes and chances of this mortal life" he had much to endure, and therefore much to blunt his sensibility in regard to others, yet to the very last he retained the same kindness of feeling, and in this respect, at least, left most men his debtors.

He was called to this parish* in 1805, and left it in 1820, from considerations which seemed to justify the measure, though nevertheless with lingering regret and inexpressible pain. And here, after a circle of twenty years more, his thoughts fondly returned to the scene of his early labors, and it was his especial request several months before his death, that his remains should be brought hither, in order no doubt that he might receive the tribute of grief and affection from the friends who should survive him, and that his ashes might be mingled with those of his people.† The tenderness of the thought, cannot fail to awaken a corresponding emotion in the hearts of those who hear me. For how intimate were the ties which, though temporarily loosened, still bound you to each other! With the exception of a very few, who are far advanced in life, and of the strangers who since his removal have come in among you, there is perhaps scarcely any one present who does not stand towards him, in some of the most sacred and endearing relations which can subsist between men. The greater part of you were through his ministry engrafted by baptism "into the body of Christ's Church, and regenerated with his Holy Spirit." You were afterwards taught, in his simple and happy way, the value of the privileges which were thus secured for you, and affectionately urged to hold fast of them to the end, by leading "a godly and a Christian life." In sickness and sorrow he was your guide and your comforter; and in health and gladness the helper of your joy. When life was all hope, and the future was bliss, he joined you in those holy bands which death alone could sever; and when hope was blighted, he buried your dead and soothed your pangs. All this, and more than I can tell, will rise up before you in sweet and sad remembrance, as his mortal remains lie before you. May none of his wholesome instructions, his godly counsels, his affectionate admonitions, his acts of kindness and love, ever escape from your minds, or fail of their effect upon your hearts and lives! May you still keep up in death, as in life, your communion with him; but in a higher and holier degree, than can ever be realized while our friends are in the flesh!

On his removal from Elizabethtown he went to Auburn, in the Western part of the State of New York, where, being appointed the Rector of Trinity Church, he continued to officiate for several years. But the malady with which he had long suffered, particularly affecting the organs of speech, he felt an increasing inability to exercise with any degree of comfort and ease the public duties of his office, and he was, therefore, anxious to turn the powers with which God had endowed him, to some other account, which might, nevertheless, in a measure, be conducive to His glory. For several years before he relinquished the charge of his former parish, he had added to the multitude of his duties the editorship of a periodical work, entitled the Churchman's Magazine. This work was conducted with such ability, judgment, and prudence, as to indicate a more than ordinary fitness for this species of literary labor, and to draw attention to him, in case of any other project being started, of a similar kind.

About this period, a lady of moderate wealth and of great piety and beneficence, who entertained for Bishop Hobart the utmost reverence and affection, made him the residuary legatee of a considerable portion of her fortune. The Bishop, who was for ever on the alert for the good of the Church over which God had made him an overseer, thought that the establishment of a religious paper, with a view to this end, would be an object, to which a portion of this trust might be suitably applied and in entire conformity with the designs of the donor. He accordingly suggested the plan to Dr. Rudd, who cordially approved of it; and, after making a sufficient provision to establish the press and to furnish an annual income in order to aid it in its continued support, he requested the Doctor to carry it out.

For more than twenty years at Auburn and Utica he labored in this work with indefatigable zeal. It is almost impossible for any human being to form an adequate conjecture of its actual results. It was simple and unpretending in its character, neither aiming at learned criticisms nor elaborate discussions, but the general good of the great mass of those for whom it was more especially designed. But time and experience, the sure test of utility in all undertakings have fully established the value of this, and clearly shown that though withdrawn in a measure from the immediate duties of his ministry, he nevertheless has not labored in vain. In seasons of tranquillity and repose, and in times of excitement and trouble, he has, for the most part, pursued, in the conduct of it, "the even tenor of his way," neither ruffled unduly by the violence, the scorn, and reproaches of others, nor provoked to the bitter recrimination by which these attacks are so generally followed. Partly in consequence of this tone of moderation, and of the judgment, shrewdness, and discretion with which it has been uniformly edited, and partly in consequence of its simplicity and fitness for the class of readers for whom it was more peculiarly designed; it has gone into hands which works of higher pretension and greater ability would have never reached, and therefore, in its very humility has been exalted.

From the strong good sense, the sober discretion, and accurate knowledge of men and things which were shown by him in the management of this paper, as well as by the soundness of his views in all the questions which have arisen both in the Diocesan and General councils of the Church, in which from an early period of his ministry he took a decided and active part, he had acquired a degree of respect and consideration which, but few men, in the rank of Presbyters, ever attain. But even a circumstance so gratifying to a person of the humblest mind, like most of the blessings of life, was not without its disadvantages.

He was one of the most hospitable men I have ever known. Where there were congenial feelings, and kindred views, every one who entered under his roof was welcome to his fireside and his board. It was so, as I personally know from the long continued exercise of it toward myself in the outset of his life, and it was so to multitudes throughout its course, with no small inconvenience and discomfort no doubt from the narrowness of his means, both to himself and others. For even his "failings leaned to virtue's side." His social feelings, his generous impulses, his affectionate sympathies, were always withdrawing him from the consideration of himself, to the comfort and happiness of those around him. Of the various ways in which this was manifested, I am forbidden to speak, both from delicacy to the living and respect to the dead. But I may safely say, after an intercourse of forty-three years with our departed friend, I have observed no fault in him, excepting the infirmities which are common unto man, but that which arose out of the undue exercise of the most amiable and virtuous feelings of our nature, and which, under other circumstances where it might have been lawful to indulge them, would have redounded to his honor and praise.

From the shortness of the time since I was requested to perform this sad though delightful duty, and from the absence of every one who could furnish me with minute details, I have been compelled to rely almost entirely upon my own recollections.

It so happened, however, that during the very time of the sickness and death of my dear old friend, I have been engaged in arranging the letters and papers of my whole life, and that in our unbroken correspondence these recollections have been most tenderly revived. If in the foresight of this event I could have had an opportunity of applying the points of interest in it, with greater fulness to the present occasion, I should have probably made it more acceptable to you and satisfactory to myself. But in this, as in other things, God's will must be done.

But after all, in the delineation of a character deserving of admiration, if the general truth of it from personal observation and well known facts be sufficiently established, these minor circumstances are of little importance. For the same reasons I have not thought it worth while to touch upon the points which, though the most essential to the Christian character, are taken for granted in the case of a minister of God. If he has lived without the imputation of hypocrisy, we may believe that he was sincere; and if he has passed through the rigid ordeal of public opinion till three-score and ten, we may also believe that he has died without reproach.

But, with you and with me who knew him so well, the evangelical piety, the fervent devotion, the purity of heart, and holiness of life, for which he was distinguished, together with all those social virtues with which in a remarkable degree he was so eminently adorned; will be enough to make us regard him as a godly example, and to cherish him in our hearts as an object of dear and abiding affection.—New York Churchman.

The Streets of Canton.

(From the Dublin University Magazine.)

As there is no part of the world so densely populated as China, so there is no part of the empire so densely populated as Canton. The streets are exceedingly narrow, and in many places hardly sufficient to allow the crowded population to pass. There are no wheel-carriages to use. The passenger walking through the town is constantly jostled by the chair-bearers of the mandarins, or wealthy merchants. Recovered from such a shock, a coolie or porter, bearing a burden, knocks him against the wall with a sort of grunt, while he is shuffled in an opposite direction by a second. Peculiarly curious to English eyes are the number and variety of live stock which are exposed for sale in those narrow streets—puppy dogs yelping in bamboo cages, kittens mewling, rats squeaking, fowls clucking, ducks quacking, geese cackling, and pigs grunting. Fish swimming, and earth worms, slugs, &c., variously disposed, are exhibited in tubs and earthen pans. A barber close by twangs his iron tweezers to call his customers near him; another operates upon a patient customer, seated on a tripod-stand—plaiting his tail, cleaning his ears, shaving his head and face, extracting all long and superfluous hair from his eye-lashes, eye-brows and nose, and finishing off by a good thumping of his back, and cracking his joints. Hard by is an itinerant vender of cooked food, with an enormous reed umbrella, dispensing rice, fat pork, and stews swimming in oil and soy, which he serves out in small bowls and basins to his hungry customers, who devour the mess with an epicure's gout. Beside this merchant is seated a brother itinerant, the vender of sweet-meats. A little farther on stands a bookseller, exposing his library, the contents of two boxes which he hawks about. In this vicinity is a fortune-teller, in the act of unfolding the future to an anxious dupe, and a doctor decorated with a string of human teeth around his neck, extending below his waist, while his box of drugs hangs before him. Then an aged woman may be seen, with feet three inches long, seated under an umbrella, mending old clothes, while a passer-by wanting a button sewed on, repairs to her, and remunerates her with "cash."

Not far distant, a leprous beggar exhibits his disgusting sores, and rattles two pieces of bamboo to attract attention. Suppose the air filled with the noises, cries, and vociferations of these various vendors, and of the constantly changing throng of human beings, and some slight conception may be formed of Canton on approaching the Hog Lane. Going through this thoroughfare, which is occupied by spirit shops and stores of all kinds, announcements such as the following arrest the eye:—"Ingli is ere spok;" "Jack all ting ere find will;" with other of a similar orthography. This street is frequented by sailors, and being the resort of the very lowest and most depraved, Jack often gets robbed, and becoming crusty, uses his fists, when a general scrimmage takes place.

Counsels to Teachers.

xi.—Few things are so important in life, as a just estimate of the value of time. Every thing in a course of education should promote its attainment. It will be learned or unlearned, practically, every day. If a teacher is in his place, at the minute; if he has every scholar in his place; if he has all instruments and apparatus ready, down to the chalk, the pointer, and the black-board-wiper; if he begins at once; if he goes steadily on, without interval or hesitation; if he excludes all other topics but the one before him; if he uses his time up, to the last drop: such an one is teaching the true value of time, as no sermon can teach it.

xii.—Gossip is the besetting sin of some good teachers. The thread of their association is slack-twisted. It is apropos to every thing. Gossiping should be banished from every recitation room.

xiii.—Nothing can be more radically wrong in education, than the attempt at false appearances. It rots the hearts of children, and makes them chronic hypocrites. And it fails of its immediate end. The children know, and tell it. The teacher, who has crammed his scholars for an examination—assigning this proposition to one, and that passage in an author to another—is like the silly bird, that hides its head, and thinks that it is not seen.

xiv.—In all good teaching, "multum, non multa," is the rule: not many things, but much.

xv.—Teachers, must not lose courage, at slow progress. The best things come, little by little. "Gutta, non vi, sed sæpe cadendo."

xvi.—Teachers that are teachers, cannot be paid. Alexander's conquests would have been no compensation for Aristotle's instruction. Their name is written in heaven.—The Missionary.

LIBERALITY IN THE WEST.—The St. Louis Herald, in speaking of the liberality of Christians in the West, states the following facts:—"We know of one gentleman in the West, who gave $20,000 to endow a professorship. We know of another who erected a church, costing some $15,000, wholly at his own expense. We know of another who erected a church costing $30,000. We know of another instance where a city church, in an important locality, could not be completed for want of funds; an aged man, with a large family and a moderate fortune, embarked in business, finished out and out the edifice, and now waits the convenience and prosperity of the Church to be repaid." May we not indulge the hope that, as the wealth of the West increases, such instances will become as common as they now are in the East.

ASSUMPTION OF ROBES BY A WESLEYAN MINISTER.—A "sensation" was caused among the Dissenters in this town, on Tuesday, by a statement that Mr. Tucker, the minister of the Wesleyan chapel in Green-street, had on the previous day performed the burial service at the cemetery in a white surplice! On inquiry, we find the assertion to be correct. The gentleman met the corpse at the gate of the cemetery, and preceded it to the grave in the costume above-mentioned.—Cum, Chron.

* St. John's, Elizabethtown.

† "It is our desire," he wrote in a letter to a friend, "to be buried in the cemetery of old St. John's, Elizabethtown, in any one of the vaults that can be allowed us for our resting place, till the day when the earth and the sea shall give up their dead."

MEANS OF SUCCESS IN THE MINISTRY. Such is the title of "a sermon preached before the Synod of Pennsylvania, at its meeting in York, Pa., October 17th, 1848." We find it published in "the Christian Observer." The text is from Zechariah iv. 6. Although this discourse contains, in our esteem, some sins both of omission and commission, yet on the whole, its tone and spirit are good, and there are many wise practical suggestions forcibly and eloquently expressed.

The sermon fails to develop its important text—"Not by might, nor by power, but by my Spirit, saith the Lord of Hosts"—by omitting to show the particular "means" which the Ministry must employ to secure "success." This blessed result they can only effect when, casting aside all other "might" and "power," they obtain the intervention of the "Spirit" of the Lord of Hosts. This they can only do by using faithfully the means of grace, as "Stewards of the Mysteries of God," not only "setting forth His true and lively Word," but "rightly and duly administering His holy sacraments." The preacher speaks of "the presence of the Holy Spirit in Ministers" as "essential to the success of the Gospel" as if they were themselves the only means of grace appointed by Christ! Consequently "the means of success in the ministry" resolve themselves chiefly into "the influence of character" in ministers of the gospel, and the "element of power in preaching." We need not now pause to show how poor a chance the gospel has of large success if such be the true state of the case. We did not advert to this sermon to enter into a particular criticism, but rather to give one or two extracts from it by which our readers may be edified. There is sound practical good sense in them. We rejoice to hear such truths from the quarter whence they come.

[The Preaching of the Present Day.]

"1st. Does not the doctrine just advocated, lead naturally to inquire whether much of the preaching of the present day is not naturally defective?"

"Are not the sermons on which the highest eulogies are pronounced, characterized more by the intellect they exhibit, and the literary taste and accomplishments of their authors, than any thing else? Do we not hear that upon certain great occasions, certain great divines are expected to 'lay themselves out?' Do we not hear of grand efforts, where men equal themselves, or more than equal themselves? Take many of our printed discourses, and we ask, not whether the truth is taught, but what is the legitimate impression felt upon the mind of the reader; or, rather, how they affect the heart? Is Christ exhibited? Is the truth made glorious? Do we rise from their perusal, spiritually edified, QUICKENED? or is it not too often the case, that the author has won our admiration, but has not led us to Christ or duty?"

"The classic lore, the grand poetic diction, the chiselled, well-turned period, the fresh and startling proposition, all remind us of the scholar, but not of the gospel. The gospel was there, to be sure, but in the back ground! It had the desired effect, it gave prominence, it gave the proper RELIEF to him who proclaimed it. The cross was there, but the ambassador had stepped before it, lest the dignity of his person should be obscured!"

"Ah, brethren! 'Barbarism is (not) the first danger of the age!' It's intellectualism—it's transcendentalism, in opposition to a direct, masculine, strong common-sense, symmetrical exhibition of practical Bible truth; and the consequence is, that ministers, exalting human reason and philosophy (vainly so-called,) wander from the simplicity of the faith once delivered to the saints; and the people, getting itching ears, demand a gospel, rationalistic and theoretical, or, an imaginative gospel, and cease to inquire for the 'old paths,' 'the good way.'

"Let us here appeal to facts. Are sermons of the style referred to—and it is the popular style—promotive of the great end of preaching, the glory of God in the salvation of souls? Is it invidious to say of some of our most distinguished intellectual preachers, 'these are clouds without rain,' men who are doing almost nothing in the way of converting sinners?"

"If it is insisted, that such a course of preaching establishes the credit of the gospel! and gives ministers a name, and thus increases their influence for good, and enables them to secure the attention of 'ears refined,' and, if these be proper motives, then let it all be understood, and let the course be pursued—but first 'go and shew John again those things which ye do hear and see,' 'THE POOR have the gospel preached to them.'

[Worldly Policy in the Church.]

"3d. Again: If the doctrine advanced by true, does it not rebuke the worldly policy and fastidiousness of very many churches at the present day?"

"By fastidiousness, we mean the kind of ministers and the kind of preaching so universally demanded. It is not enough when a pulpit is vacant, to refer to a preacher and say he is 'a good man and full of the Holy Ghost,' (Acts xi. 24,) and preaches in demonstration of the Spirit and with power; but is he elegant in manner and polite? Will he 'draw a select audience?' will he gather the intellectual, the fashionable, the wealthy? And last, though by no means the least, is he financier enough to extinguish a troublesome debt? We admit that what we have placed here as direct questions, are often insinuated and put by circumlocution, but here is the edge of the satire—here is the mortification—the questions are asked!"

"And is it so, that he who should be a Divine legate, a minister plenipotentiary from the highest court in the universe, 'an ambassador to negotiate between God and man;' nay, who comes to command men to be reconciled with their offended sovereign—that such should stoop to the character of a mountebank, an actor on the stage, a thing of finance! Expected to gain customers, to win the admiration of those who come to be amused, or subserve the interests of those who own pews, or are implicated in the liabilities of church corporations?"

In connection with, and somewhat in opposition to, the florid exhibition of the Presbyterian Divine, we present to our readers, as showing a subordinate "means of success in the ministry" suited to "the poor," the following plain and simple statement of a clergyman of the Church, whose "titles," "credentials," "surplice and lawn," and "hierarchical aspirations" are very cautiously designated in the above named discourse. We find the extract in "the English Churchman," it is from a Pamphlet on "National Education," by the vicar of Harwell. It may afford some practical hints to those similarly placed in a rural district; at all events it will show that the clergy of the Church of England do something more than talk about "the poor."

"In this place it may not be amiss for me to mention, an experiment made by myself some years ago, to try if it were not possible to remedy this great and grievous evil by carrying on after leaving school, something like a course of instruction, in most cases, as it were, only begun at school and ended just when the real development of the nature and character of the individual may be said to begin.

On coming into possession of a small piece of preferment some years ago, at S—, in the county of Bucks, I found the poor in a most debased and disorganized state. Indeed, I believe in the year previous, some scores of them had been sent to prison or expatriated, for open riot; burning farming implements, machines, stacks, &c., and other acts of insubordination, being the order of the day amongst them. In my parish there were several conventicles, such as they were; and my congregation was consequently very thin and meagre, few attending except the farmers; and their attendances were, 'like angels' visits, few and far between.' I had not been at my new residence very long, before I observed, that at a certain hour in the evening, the shrill notes of a fife, accompanied with the beat of a drum, might be heard, as coming from a neighboring barn. Actuated by a very natural curiosity to know what was going on there, I visited this rude hall of festive mirth; and there beheld, to my surprise and deep regret, some fifty or sixty young people of both sexes dancing, shouting, and rioting by the light of a lantern suspended from the roof of the barn, to the rude music before mentioned. I said nothing, but returned to my quiet home in great pain and incertitude of mind as to what was best to be done with people in such a state of semi-barbarism. At length I determined what to do, in order that I might, if possible, put a stop to these nocturnal revelries by diverting their thoughts into another and a better channel. I bethought me of the miseries of their homes, and of the little share of comfort that there awaited them. I pictured to myself (for at that time there was much abject poverty in the land) the condition of their humble homes. I there beheld, and alas! it was no uncommon or unreal picture, the dogged, morose, half-starved father sitting by his miserable hearth; his children shivering and crying with cold, all crowding around its few and half expiring embers; and in many cases, I fear, calling upon that wretched parent in vain for bread. I heard the mother scolding one, and slapping another; and ever and anon abusing the miserable partner of her life for his apathy, and sullen unconcern. With fearful oaths and violent gesticulations I saw that parent rise from his seat, snatch up his hat and rush out of the house in quest of his only place of solace—the beer shop—for alas! we had several in the village, and those not of the best stamp. Now, such was the home of many of these young creatures. Was it, then, much to be wondered at, that finding no comfort there, they should seek it elsewhere? Education had done nothing for them (although they had most of them been at the National School of the parish) except to prepare them, as brands for the burning. I therefore bethought myself of a plan, not only to contribute to their comfort, and put an end to their licentious pursuits—for I had but too many proofs that they were so, to a fearful extent—but also to effect a reformation of their morals, by still carrying on the work of instruction. To convert, you must first civilize; to look for the crop, you must first till the soil, and then take care, that the seed you sow is of a suitable kind and quality.

Now, at that time, my old vicarage house was still standing; in which there was one really good, and spacious lower room; large enough, I should say, to afford sitting room for some fifty or even sixty people. This room I fitted up with stools and benches, and after airing it for a few days with a good fire, I made known (through my clerk) to every family in my parish, that on the following Monday evening I should be very glad to meet my young parishioners; where, round a good fire, I could talk with them and read good and amusing books to them; and if there were any who really wished to be otherwise taught, I would do the best I could in the way of their instruction; not requiring, as they termed it, book-knowledge or reading, from them, but promising them something in the way of reading and agreeable instruction from myself.

Feeling thoroughly convinced, that all my efforts to do them good, and stay the prevalence and progress of crime amongst them, would be of no avail—in simply contenting myself, with reading and explaining the Scriptures to them, and calling them to the sweet work of prayer and praise—(anything but sweet to them in the heathenish state they were in) sensible as I was that in so doing I should but subject myself to their scoffs and sneers; and call down upon my head the anathemas of certain preachers or teachers amongst them, as seeking only to proselytize and mislead the people; I caused it to be understood, that my endeavors to benefit them, would simply be confined to reading good and amusing books to them—giving them good and friendly advice—answering their questions as I read, whenever the meaning of any word was not clearly understood by them—and if desirous of reading at home, either by themselves or to their families, lending them suitable, easy and entertaining books, &c., for that purpose. I need not say the intelligence spread through my parish like wildfire; all marvelled, many sneered; some shook their heads, and others, I verily believe, thought me a little touched, that is to say, cracked, as they termed it. At length the night of trial arrived (the hour of meeting was six, and our visit was to close at eight or half-past); I was at my post, the stools and benches all duly arranged—my little desk, chair, and books, all snugly placed in a corner, and my first essay as a public teacher, in that way, was about to begin. The hour came, and the gathering hum of voices without told me that my proclamation had been heard and attended to. The doors were opened, and at the expiration of a quarter of an hour (the time allowed for assembling, some having to come nearly two miles) they were again closed, and to my great delight mustered twenty-five auditors.

I commenced my task by asking them a few questions, in as easy and kind a way as I could, as to their names, ages, occupations, families, &c., and then proceeded to read a paper to them from Sturm's Reflections, on the benefits and blessings of knowledge, simplifying and explaining the language as I went on. I then descended with them into a salt mine—skimmed over the deserts of Arabia, in search of coffee—made a descent upon China, and gave them an account of the tea plant—read a brief biographical sketch of a distinguished individual, who had risen from obscurity by the exercise of his talents, industry and good conduct—and ended by recommending them to follow his great and good example; and if they were satisfied with their visit, to prove it by coming again, bringing their companions with them; and going that night at least to their homes in peace and comfort, as I should do—for that we had all, through the blessing of God, endeavoured, as every human being ought, to do our duty.

After appointing the following Wednesday and Friday evenings for our next meetings, we then separated; all going home direct, in peace and good order, for never was the parish more quiet and peaceable than on that eventful evening. According to appointment we met again on the Wednesday evening, when our muster was thirty-seven; a similar course to the first was pursued, and the like happy results followed. On the Friday evening our number was forty-eight; on the succeeding Monday fifty-four, and the next time seventy-two; indeed, my room was so crowded, that I could scarcely breathe; and I was compelled to request the females to discontinue their attendance; the nights being very dark, and the season of winter near at hand—promising to lend them books to read at home; and, if possible, in the spring, to make arrangements for their occasional attendance at my readings. I also drafted off all children under ten years of age, lending them tracts, &c., to read at home; and even the old men (for certain of my auditors were beyond seventy years of age) received sundry hints that I feared, coming out in the evening air, and lastly leaving my warm room, would be prejudicial to their health. After this, all went on very smoothly; my audience averaging about sixty. The barn-floor orgies ended the first week—the beer-shop keepers railed bitterly against me the next, for their craft was in danger; indeed, I may say nearly destroyed, many parents staying at home to be amused with the parson's "werry nice books." Nay, even the very farmers said "it was a right good plan," for the parish was in peace. But, best result of all; in the course of one quarter of a year, my congregation—I may truly say—was nearly trebled; some coming to Church who were in the habit of boasting that they had never set their foot in one; and many others, who had not been there for many years past. Thus encouraged, I went on perseveringly with my plan; and with increasing success, until late in the following spring, when the services of most of my hearers were required in the fields abroad, and their gardens at home; and before the close of the year a small but very needful addition to my income, in the shape of preferment, took me away from a people I at first regarded with pain, and now left with sorrow and regret.

My readings were chiefly confined to the pages of Sturm's Reflections, Dodd's Beauties of History, Blair's Class Book, travels, biographies of eminent persons who had meritoriously risen from obscurity, natural history, &c., the Saturday and Penny Magazines, and Penny Traveller. I ought also to mention, that one very taking mode of conveying information, was through the medium of a very excellent Phantasmagoric lantern, (the gift of a friend,) with many slides; containing representations of wonderful places at home and abroad—singular birds and beasts, &c.—and last of all, the kings and queens of England, assisting me much in my little historical and other lectures, or rather explanations; and delighting them so much that a sight of its wonders was very frequently requested. Besides which, I had a good supply of small interesting books and weekly publications for their perusal at home, and I was glad to find they were in constant request.

So much for my evening readings at S—; would that every brother Clergyman could and would do the same for the benefit of his people, where needed; but "who is sufficient for these things?" for now, alas, when the pressing cares of life are around me, and the infirmities of age are fast approaching, I feel that I am not; still I may say with the Apostle, "Having obtained help of God, I continue to this day," and "am thankful that I am what I am."

THE CHURCH AT KEY WEST.—In the usual place of such records will be found the notice of the death of a young man, in the Hospital at Key West. A private letter from the zealous Missionary gives a brief account in relation to this notice. Sad thoughts must be stirred within every feeling heart by such a record. The reason given by the Missionary for sending this notice to the Banner is this. "The inmates of this Hospital who die there, have their names reported in no public Journal, and their friends never know what becomes of them." It seems a dreary lot indeed to die far from home and kindred, to spend our last weary hours of life among strangers, and then to be laid, without a tear, in an unknown grave.

How greatly is the sadness of such a lot relieved, when a faithful minister of the Church is at hand to cheer the loneliness of the dying with the comforts of our most holy Faith. It is blessed to think that there is a sympathy more extensive and wider in its reach, than natural affection. That the charity which the Gospel pours into the cold heart of man will warm into life those feelings which turn strangers into brothers. Wherever a faithful minister of Christ is at hand we need not fear that sickness or misfortune shall fall upon us without the help of brotherly offices, or that we shall die in a strange land uncheered by human sympathy.

On these grounds we think that not only Christian duty and charity urge us to provide Churches and Ministers for seamen, but natural affection calls upon all those who have friends or kindred in this perilous calling, to do their part in a work of mercy whose benefit may be first enjoyed by a brother or a son.

We think in this respect the Church at Key West, a place visited by so many vessels, and where so many wrecks constantly occur, has peculiar claims upon our sympathy. The Missionary was in this city some time ago, and received help from churchmen here. It will gratify these to learn the progress which has been made in this work, and it may perhaps encourage some to do more. We have seen a letter from the Missionary to a gentleman in this city, in which he thus speaks. "We have gone forward and so far completed our edifice that it is occupied for service. Thus far not a dollar is due, we have five dollars in the treasury. Meanwhile we need very much that work should be done about the chancel to the amount of one hundred dollars. I have on my own responsibility contracted for a part of it, say fifty-five dollars, and it must come out of my Missionary stipend, if those who ought, do not pay it. I say those who ought. This parish has a claim, setting aside the highest one of the Gospel, upon the Church of Philadelphia. The mail which takes this letter takes another to the Editor of the Banner announcing the death of a son of one of the members of a Pennsylvania Church. Every year more or less members of the congregations in Philadelphia come here to sicken and die in our hospital." Again he says, "As sailors come here from all points of our Union, so are all points interested in keeping up the services of religion in this Island."

In relation to the young man whose case is referred to, the Missionary says, "His father, (who is a paper-hanger,) was a member of St. Paul's church, in some town near, or suburb of Philadelphia. Through your paper information of his death will probably reach them. I saw him several times in sickness, and buried him as a child of the Church."

CORRECTION.—We regret that for the second time, the notice of a meeting of a CONVOCAION has been turned by our Printer, into that of a "Congregation." As the proof of the last page seldom comes to the Editor, we would advise those who desire to have their notices correctly printed to send them legibly written. We sometimes are compelled to express mentally the thought uttered in the pulpit by Rowland Hill, upon the receipt of some illegible notice. "The writer of this may be a Pharisee, but he is certainly no Scribe."

We feel it to be a duty to caution the public against a young man, calling himself George Bartlett, who on the plea of taking a blind mother, Eliza Bartlett, to her friends, has been for years drawing on the sympathies of the benevolent. She has at several times, for three years past, obtained aid from us, and we have reason to believe, has been recently aided by the Rev. Dr. Pyne, of Washington, the Rev. Mr. Newton, of Philadelphia, the Rev. Mr. Starr, of Trenton, and the Rev. Dr. Higbee, of New York, and probably by many other clergymen, if not by other persons. On investigating the case, with the aid of his honor the Recorder, we find it to be one of ingenious and gross imposture. The woman, if she be the mother of George, is not blind, and the stories of both are inconsistent and contradictory. They have admitted the imposture, and promised to return to their friends, and to a better course of life.

New Publications.

KEBLE'S CHRISTIAN YEAR.—The Messrs. Appleton, (Phila., 164 Chesnut street; New York, 200 Broadway;) have published a beautiful edition, with appropriate illustrations, of this favorite book. We need not do more than announce the fact. This work of the Christian Poet is so well known and so highly appreciated, that it would seem like presumption to attempt to commend it.

From the same publishers we have received a work in two volumes, entitled "ESSAYS AND REVIEWS, BY EDWIN P. WHIPPLE." We can only acknowledge the reception of this Book at present. We shall speak of it more particularly, after we have had time to examine its contents. The "Essays and Reviews" are upon a great variety of interesting subjects.

The same publishers have sent us two neat and interesting little works for children. One is called "THE BOOK OF ANIMALS, for the amusement and instruction of young persons. By T. Bilby, illustrated with twelve elegant designs. This book is made interesting to children, not only by the faithful pictures of the animals, but by the anecdotes with which the history of each animal is illustrated.

The other work is called "THE HAPPY CHILDREN: a Tale of Home for Young People." We have submitted this work to our young critics, and they pronounce a most favorable judgment upon it.

THE GOSPEL PROMOTIVE OF TRUE HAPPINESS. By the Rev. Hugh White, A. M. From the fifth London edition. Philadelphia, Herman Hooker, 206 Chesnut Street. 1848.

This seems to be an excellent practical work, developing very fully its important subject.

We merely announce its publication at present, intending to give it a larger notice before long.

A CHRISTMAS CAROL, for 1847; Daniel Dana, Jr. New York. This is an attractive little Book, intended as a cheap present for the approaching Holidays.

Dual Unity.

MR. EDITOR:—

Probably the foregoing superscription is too postulatory; but I cannot think of any that is completely adapted to my subject, viz., the two-ness and the oneness of persons like the Siamese Twins. That monstrosity has occurred more than once; whether frequently, I know not. One other case, at least, is on record; as will be found in Littell's LIVING AGE, No. 236, p. 346. The article is a reprint, from the Dublin University Magazine, of a review of a remarkable work of Dr. Madden, a respectable Irish clergyman, (1730) ending with a notice of two other publications of his; in one of which, speaking of the wranglings of the Protestant and Romish parties in Ireland, and their duty to become united and one, he remarks: "It often puts me in mind of the poor Italian in London, who had a little twin-brother that grew out of his breast, whom he carefully nourished and cherished, being sensible that when his brother died, he could not long survive him." With the politics or polemics illustrated by the fact related by Dr. Madden, (who is highly commended by Lempriere and Dr. Johnson,) I have nothing to do, but only with the fact itself—that there was, a century before the Siamese brothers came into note, a pair of united twins who lived to manhood—these resembling those, perhaps entirely, except that one of them much outgrew the other. Possibly there have been more such abnormalities; but that point my reading (or memory) does not enable me to determine. Falling casually, however, on this latter example, has awakened me from the mere wonderment with which I have hitherto regarded the Siamese phenomenon, the Dual Unity, now living in North Carolina.

Yet with intelligent wonder the cases are replete. In both sets of twins, we find two living human animals in one; for they are, respectively, two animals in most of their functions; while they are one animal in some functions, as nervous and instinctive reciprocation, and especially in the grand particular, that they must live and die together. There are two bodies, yet so united as to be in many regards one body. There are two lives, yet so interwoven and mutually dependent, as to make, practically, one life. Two minds there are, yet so fused together by sympathies and blended instincts, as often to be one mind, as veritably as are the peculiar thoughts and promptings of an individual. And there are two souls, yet occasionally with so intimate a mutual responsibility that none but the Omniscient can ascertain, in all particulars, for what elements and developments of character each of them is distinctively and separately to be judged. There are, in short, two natures, in the inclusive meaning of the term, two complex human constitutions, yet the two so largely involved as, in a notable degree, to be one nature.

A comparison to parasitical plants will hardly be offered: the unity in each animate duality is far too great for such an analogy. Or, if it should be insinuated, only the phase, not the amount, of the wonder will be changed. A vast marvel would it be if mind and soul were even quasi-parasitical. And the mistletoe, I believe, can be torn from the oak without harm to the latter.

Speaking then in a pretty broad, though not in the sacred and unrestricted or large, sense, each pair of these twins offers to our notice—two substances (bodies) in one substance; two persons in one bodily substance; two substances, or rather four, the two bodies and the two souls, in either two persons or one person; aye, two persons in one person. Verily we seem on the verge of awful ground; observation explores where reason cannot follow. And it is a created not the Eternal reality, it is outward, open, visible, perceptible creation, that conducts us thither.

We reach not the lofty enclosure of the great hallowed Mysteries. Yet we are carried towards it; and we silence, before entering that astounding revelation, the objections of the infidel and the heretic. And there is a defence exterior to this. When these "gainsayers" upbraid the doctrines, that there are two substances or natures, Godhead and manhood, in the one person of Christ, and that there are three Persons in the one nature or substance of Jehovah, we first meet them at the outermost barrier,—the fact, that in every man there are two substances, material and spiritual, two unlikes, body and soul, in one person: which inexplicable verity ought to annihilate the plea, of difficulty or incomprehensibility, they make, concerning the Incarnate and the Trinity. And then we interpose the "strange things" offered in this paper, of peculiar native intricacies in regard to substance and person, entirely beyond the solution of mortal wisdom or ingenuity. All this, before reaching the citadel of the argument, that God's nature is not to be measured or defined by the nature of the creatures He has formed; that His individuality, self, very-ness, cannot be circumscribed by the limits and capacities of ours: so determines natural religion itself; and that binds confessedly every man except the atheist. Ample, therefore, is the protection of these transcendent articles of belief.

As a protection of the cardinal doctrines, the cases of Dual Unity may justly be propounded. To the infidel and the heretic, we offer these unaccountable yet undeniable phenomena, these "fixed facts," that they may unravel the earthly mystery, ere they intrude upon the heavenly mysteries, of the Three in One, of God manifest in the flesh. Let them pronounce, not with hypothesis and assumption, but philosophically, clearly, incontrovertibly, (and if inductively it will be all the better,) concerning these strange realities in the creatures. Around these subjects of thought there is no awe of divinity, and their minds may handle them as they will, or—as they can. Are there two bodies, or only one, a double organization? for each is more essential to the other than an arm or a leg is to an ordinary man, each as vital to the other as the head, the stomach, the lungs, the heart, to the regular human fabric; and we do not know that animal buds may not become one by mutual engrafting, (inoculation, anastomosis,) like "wild olive branches grafted" upon the "olive" of culture. Further: Are there, in these wonderful cases, two souls, completely individual, as are the souls of completely individual men? or rather, can science prove it? Yet again: Do two souls animate, inform, conjointly two conjoint bodies? and is this complex mutuality of four substances, two bodies and two souls, perfect or imperfect? Here are questions enough to occupy an adversary of the lofty disclosures of the Bible till he shall finish his "walk by sight," and depart to that world where those who have "faith" will see it kindled into knowledge. Here are difficulties concerning substance, whether body or soul, concerning their union, and of course concerning personality, that may tame the presumption of overweening scepticism and overeager philosophy.

More especially, and in view of the difficulty of defining what "person" is, it cannot be denied that, in some sense, and that not an unfair one, each pair of these twins is both one person and two persons. Not that we doubt the individuality of the four men in the sight of God; that point is irresistibly claimed by reason and by faith. But, to human consideration, and judged by human faculties, their individual personality is obscured by a cloud as real, though not so finally impenetrable, as the threefold personality of the Lord of Hosts, and as the one personality of Him who was both perfect God and perfect man. The word "person" seems best explained as—that, in an intelligent being, to which intelligent actions are ascribed; or, with regard to the intellectual creatures—that, in an accountable being, to which actions to be accounted for are imputed. And in the Siamese Dual Unity there are, as obviously as man can perceive, as clearly as man can determine, both a separate and a mingled responsibility, two persons and one person.

Most incontrovertibly, nature (as we phrase it) is a teacher of mysteries. That truth has often been remarked and abundantly proved by examples. And here is a further example, not unworthy, I respectfully submit, of a place among her memorable instructions.

O.

Philadelphia, Nov. 29, 1848.

P. S. In the Banner of the Cross for January 14, 1843, (p. 15.) is a paper concerning the Nestorian Bishop. In this paper when touching on the disputed orthodoxy of that church, at issue in the expression "two persons and one barsupa"—the meaning of which word is not clearly known, it being sometimes rendered "aspect," yet also translatable "person"—it is remarked, "I see no objection to the repetition of that word, thus making the Nestorian tenet to be, that Christ is two persons and one person, i. e. two persons in one sense, and one person in another sense. And this proposition comes too near the sound expression of the doctrine (two natures and one person) to be deemed heresy." The remark "two persons and one person" was at the time considered by able friends as feebleness than gratuitous. But may there not now be referred to, as drawn from fact, an adumbration of the meaning there generously vouchsafed to the Nestorian creed?

American Tract Society.

This institution is called a Tract Society, and as such societies are apt to do, has been tempted in its strength to depart from its design and become a large book-publishing concern, one of the largest in our country. It professes to furnish religious books at cost, and perhaps when the expenses of its 400 colporteurs and the large salaries of its many agents and clerks are reckoned into the account, this may be found true. Its publications are certainly sold so near their cost that all private enterprise and capital must fail in any attempt to publish at similar rates. Here then is a society with its many hundreds of agents and servants, with mouth so large that nothing can fill it, and with tongues so various and many-toned, that you can hear nothing else, crying to be supported on the charity of Christian people, and yet doing nothing to support itself. Its hired emissaries, its devouring presses, are fed at the hand of charity—a weak, ill-judging, yet generous charity. Well, what is the result? It has paralysed the enterprise of individuals lawfully engaged in publishing religious and useful books. It has, to an extent many times exceeding the means and influence of the society, driven the capital of publishers into new channels, and caused directly and indirectly the circulation in cheap forms of more useless and injurious books than the society with her thousand hands and tongues and charity boxes can ever counteract. This is no idle and unmeaning view of the case. Every bookseller knows the danger and impolicy of publishing or keeping on his shelves, religious books. The entire book business has undergone a change. Wholesale dealers who supplied country booksellers, seldom got an order, five years ago, which did not include many religious books. Now it is a rare thing that a single book of a religious kind is called for by houses that formerly sold thousands. They say they cannot sell them, that the demand has ceased. This is known to be true through the whole country as a change in the times. They can now only sell school books, novels, picture books, and standard books, and none others pay for publishing. This is the general statement of men engaged in the trade. It is caused by the action of religious societies, and most of all by this book making tract society. Wherever they can sell a book they send a man with it, and when he takes pay for it, he asks for a donation, if there is any appearance of ability to give it. Thus he p ts in and takes out, always taking more than he gives if he can. Well, this method supplies every family that can be reached with a few religious books, and fleeces it of what charity it can, and, as religious books are not necessities of life, what is gotten in this way supplies and satisfies, so that there is seldom a call on booksellers, and if they should happen to be called on, unless the desired book is at the society's low rate, it is declined, or bought with a conviction that an exorbitant price has been charged.

This then is a brief sketch of this society's influence. But they say you show that we make books cheap and are very diligent in circulating them. Is not that a good? What care we for the booksellers? Well, booksellers don't want your care, but they would like you to have sense as well as religion. That is all. But what sense is there in your doing by charity what individual enterprise would gladly do, and make books cheaper to the people than you do, if you add to your prices the charities they give you. There is no cheapness in your system but what lies in appearance: it is an expensive system to the public. It taxes the poor as well as the rich. You would take money from the poorest if you could get it, and you often can, for poverty is generally charitable. You can gather apples of thorns. But I would have you know it is a waste of Christian charity that is spent on you. If you used the economy that good men should, if you did not try to do more than a prudent business sagacity dictates, if you charged the prices for books by which industry can thrive and be rewarded, now that you are made so great, every stream of charity might turn from you to other and more legitimate ends, and you be left with means enough to do a great and successful business. And if, to what you might do in that case, you add what others would do in the same cause, and in a fair field of competition, more religious books would be read and published than now is, and an amount of capital, a thousand fold greater than yours, would be turned from catering to the corrupt appetite of the people, to spreading useful and religious knowledge.

I think your vocation, as you have turned it into bookmaking, is a bald superfluity; and if I could convince the religious public of it, I should think I had done a great good. There are objects enough, every one knows; of more needful charity than you are. You may call your vocation preaching, but I do not.

God has instituted a Church and ministry to convert the world and keep up a knowledge of himself, and if the charity that is given you were expended in educating ministers to proclaim the word; in building churches and attracting people into them; in supporting missionaries and pastors, many of whom are laboring with constitutions broken and minds enfeebled by the cares and griefs of an inadequate support, I think that the skies over us would brighten in approbation of the change. How many poor shepherds of Christ's flock are there, who hunger for bread, who cannot buy a book to replenish their exhausted minds, whose ministry is made feeble and unproductive by causes like these; who might speak living tracts, if fed each with a moiety of the charity you claim?

What business have Christians to give their charity to do that which business enterprise and capital would do, if let alone, quite as well and cheaply? None at all, till it can be shown that there are no neglected and more useful channels for their charity to run in. It is bad economy to do any thing with the funds of charity which ready and unemployed hands would do with their own means. But does any one suppose that a demand for religious books would be unsupplied? No. The coffers of infidelity itself would be readily opened to supply the want. Should we not employ the unsanctified talent and wealth of men for such an object? Of course we should when we can. It is a weak, a stupid, though it may be a well meaning, charity which would do any work of this kind.

This society furnishes the Church no books which she does not pay more for than the same would cost if she left book publishing to take its own course. Men are not justly called upon to aid this society. It should stand in its own strength and live by its own business or not at all. It does nothing, when it goes out of its sphere, as it has, which the church needs, and it is an abuse to ask the religious public to sustain it. It is an abuse, because such misdirected charity drives a great amount of funds out of the service of religion and turns it against the well-being of society. Yet the agents of this begging institution will tell the people you must give us money to publish good books to counteract the influence of bad ones now so numerous, when it is the policy and agency of the society which has so multiplied bad books of late years. It is a common sentiment of booksellers that this is the fact; and I trust I have made it sufficiently apparent by exhibiting the false and injurious principles on which the business of this institution is conducted.

Apply the same principles to any other branch of business, and it would and must ruin it. Suppose you get up a great charity-box and call it a work-shop, and have apartments for various arts, and say we will supply the poor and rich at cost, I reckon we could get agents enough to work in it by paying them well, who would be very zealous in calling it a benevolent and useful institution; and if the public chose to supply its demands in this way, it would soon be the ruin of all engaged in the same business. Is there any more legitimate branch of business than that of publishing and selling useful books, and is there so little that we can do with our charity, or have we so much of it, that we must drive every man with his means from this field? When will good people see the folly of establishing any such publishing concern without requiring it after a fair start to support itself by the sale, at proper business prices, of what it produces, giving away only of its acquired ability? This is the only live and let live principle that can apply to the subject, and I will add, the only just and sensible principle that can apply to it.

I might extend the application of these principles and show their injurious action, show that they all land us in evil and folly by means of our own charity. Our charity is a talent which is to be improved wisely or not at all. Any thing that touches the motives of human industry to weaken them, any thing that charity does that would be done if she let it alone, is a positive evil, and the law which makes it so is written by the finger of God, and we are bound to see its characters in his word, yea, sinking into the very flesh of our nature. A Prayer of Mary, Queen of Scots.

"The respite of the night she passed in prayer."—W. PETER.

The royal daughter of the royal race of STUART, so unfortunate in her life and in her death, is said to have composed, not long before her execution, the following brief and expressive prayer:

O DOMINE DEUS, speravi in Te!
O care mi JESU, nunc libera me!
In dura catena,
In misera poena,
Desidero Te!
Languendo, gemendo, et genuflectendo,
Adoro, imploro, ut liberes me!

Of which the following is an almost literal version, by Mr. Peter, given in his notes to his translation of Schiller's celebrated Tragedy of Mary Stuart:

O gracious Lord God, I have trusted in Thee!
O dearest Lord JESUS, now liberate me!
In captivity's chain,
In want, exile, and pain,
I desiderate Thee!
Groaning, languishing, weeping, and bending the knee,
I adore Thee, implore Thee, to liberate me!

Sentences from Bishop Taylor.

"No great sin is a sin of excusable or unavoidable infirmity. Because whosoever hath received the Spirit of God, hath sufficient knowledge of his duty, and sufficient strengths of grace, and sufficient advertency of mind, to avoid such things as do great and apparent violence to piety and religion. No man can justly say, that it is a sin of infirmity that he was drunk."

"Sins of infirmity, as they are small in their instance, so they put on their degree of excusableness only according to the weakness or infirmity of a man's understanding. So far as men, without their own fault, understand not their duty, or are possessed with weakness of principles, or are destitute and void of discourse, or discerning powers and acts—so far if a sin creeps upon them, it is as natural, and as free from a law, as is the action of a child, but if any thing else be mingled with it, if it proceed from any other principle, it is criminal, and not excused by our infirmity, because it is chosen; and man's will hath no infirmity, but when it wants the grace of God, or is mastered with passions and sinful appetites: and that infirmity is the state of unregeneration."

"The violence or strength of a temptation is not sufficient to excuse an action, or to make it accountable upon the stock of a pitiable and innocent infirmity, if it leaves the understanding still able to judge; because a temptation cannot have any proper strengths but from ourselves; and because we have in us a principle of baseness which this temptation meets, and only persuades me to act, because I love it."

"No habitual sin, that is, no sin that returns constantly or frequently; that is repented of, and then again committed,—no such sin is excusable with a pretence of infirmity; because that sin is certainly noted, and certainly condemned, and therefore returns, not because of the weakness of nature, but the weakness of grace. The principle of this is an evil spirit, an habitual aversion from God,—a dominion and empire of sin. And as no man for his inclinations and aptness to the sins of the flesh is to be called carnal, if he corrects his inclinations, and turns them into virtues; so no man can be called spiritual for his good wishes, and apt inclinations to goodness, if these inclinations pass not into acts, and these acts into habits, and holy customs and walkings and conversation with God."

"If we did not wink hard, we must needs see that obedience to supreme powers, denying ourselves, humility, peacefulness, and charity, are written in such capital text letters, that it is impossible to be ignorant of them."

Sentences from Archbishop Leighton.

"There is not a treasure of the merits of saints in the Church, as some dream, but there is a treasure of the precious experiences of the saints, which every believer hath right to make use of; and these we should be versed in, that we may have them in readiness at hand, in time of need, and know how to use them, both to draw comfort from them to ourselves, and arguments to use with God."

"Were the matter left to our modelling, we would assign the Church constant peace and prosperity for her portion, and not consent that the least air of trouble should come near her. We would have no enemies to molest her, nor stir against her; or if they did stir, we would have them to be presently repressed, and these, in our judgment, would be the fairest and most glorious tokens of His love and power, whose spouse she is. But this carnal wisdom is enmity against God, and to the glory of God, which rises so often out of the wrath of His enemies."

"Big threatenings are unhappy presages of very ill success."

"The most compendious way to be safe from the violence of men, is to be in terms of friendship with God."

"The fear of God begets the best courage: the breast that is most filled with it, abounds most in true magnanimity."

"The hammer of the law may break a stony heart in pieces, but it is only the blood of Jesus can soften it. And wherever it is effectually poured, either upon a wounded soul, it heals it, or upon an hard heart, it mollifies it."

"A man may have much common knowledge of Christ, and may understand well, yea,—may preach well, concerning His worth and graces, and yet not love Him. But there is a particular knowledge of Him by the infusion of the Spirit; and where the smallest measure of this is, it presently wins the affection."

"Grace destroys not the natural passions of the soul, but corrects them only, by destroying their corruption, and so they become not only not contrary to grace, but are made the subject and seat of grace."

"There is a certain company of small stars in the firmament, which, though they cannot be each one severally seen, yet being many, their united light makes a conspicuous brightness in the heaven, which we call the milky way: so, though the shining of every private Christian is not so much severally remarkable, yet the concourse and meeting of their light together, will make a bright path of holiness shine in the Church."

"Many that have some truth of grace are, through weakness, filled with disquieting fears; so, possibly, though they perceive it not, it may be in some point of wilfulness, a little latent, undiscerned affection of scrupling and doubting, placing much of religion in it. True, where the soul is really solicitous about its interest in God, that argues some grace; but being vexingly anxious about it, it argues that grace is low and weak: a sparkle there is even discovered by that smoke; but the great smoke still continuing, and nothing seen but it, argues there is little fire,—little faith,—little love."

"What if one should be always questioning his friend, whether he loved him or no, and upon every little occasion were ready to think he doth not, how would this disrelish their society together, though truly loving each other! The far more excellent way, and more pleasing both to ourselves and to God, were to resolve on humble trust, reverence and confidence, most afraid to offend, delighting to walk in his ways, loving Him and his will in all, and then resting persuaded of his love, though He chastise us."

"The heart of a man is not sufficient for self-support; therefore naturally seeks out some other thing to lean and rest itself on. The unhappiness is, for the most part, that it seeks to things below itself."

"God is unchangeable; and, therefore, faith is invincible, that sets the heart on Him,—fastens it there on the rock of eternity:—then let winds blow, and storms arise, it cares not."

"I know some men are, by a stronger understanding and moral principle, somewhat raised above the vulgar, and speak big of a constancy of mind; but these are mere flourishes—an acted bravery, somewhat there may be that will hold out in some trials, but far short of this fixedness of faith."

"The life of man is a warfare: and it is much better, in the midst of enemies and dangers, to be acquainted with one fortress than with many inns. He who knows how to pray may be pressed, but not overwhelmed."

MR. EDITOR:—

Your correspondent "Sacerdos" seems to speak very positively as to the rubrical meaning of the term read as used in our Prayer Book. He says: "The rubrical term 'say' is the antithesis to 'sing,' whilst the term 'read' comprehends either saying or singing." He then remarks in conclusion, that it is as rubrical to sing the Psalter as to read it. Now I would only observe, if it be as rubrical to sing the Psalter, as to read it, then it is equally rubrical to sing the Holy Scriptures, as to read them; as the rubric in both cases directs them to be read.—The Preface in the order of Confirmation, the Exhortation in the Ante-Communion Service, the Epistle and Gospel, and other parts of our service are directed to be read. It would sound strange enough to hear any of these portions of our service sung.

Although the word 'read' is used as synonymous with 'say' in our rubrics; as in the Baptismal Service, in the reading of the Sentences during the offertory, in the Exhortations, &c., &c.; yet, I have never found the word read used as synonymous with sing. Can "Sacerdos" show me a single example taken from our Prayer Book.

You remark, Mr. Editor, that you would like the rubric to be pointed out which makes our present method of reading the Psalter responsively, by minister and people, rubrical. But I would ask, if it be not as proper, as to sing it antiphonally by Priest and choir, as it is frequently done in England, and where the rubric directs it to be said or sung. By the way do you not think, that our present method, originated in the antiphonal chanting of the Psalter? Which do you think is the most preferable and instructive, the responses by the people, or by a choir?

Z.

We leave "Sacerdos" to answer for himself, as "he is of age." We asked for a Rubric, not for what is "as proper." We certainly do not "think that our present method originated in the antiphonal chanting of the Psalter," ergo, there is as much authority for the latter as for antiphonal reading. The last question we answer in the words of the Psalm:

[ED. BAN.]

With ONE CONSENT let ALL THE EARTH
To God their cheerful voices raise:
Glad homage pay with awful mirth,
And sing before Him songs of Praise."

The facts stated in the following figures are of deep concern to this country. We take them from "the Colonial Church Chronicle."

EMIGRATION.—It is impossible to print the following official Table without a few reflections. Nothing can more strongly show the vast influence which the British Isles are exercising over the world than this array of figures. Including the probable emigration of this year and the next, we may put the number of persons who have left the country within a quarter of a century, at two millions, of which one-half have gone to the United States, and the other to British Colonies.

The present character and the future condition of whole provinces must needs be much affected by the emigrants from Great Britain. We owe it therefore to our own mother country, and to the countries peopled from it—but, above all, we owe it to God, by whose blessing we have multiplied thus exceedingly—to see that the new Colonies everywhere rising up be wisely and religiously planted; and we may well be stimulated to fresh exertions at home, by reflecting how much the better education, the improved moral habits, and every step made in our own social and religious progress, will become a blessing more and more widely diffused by the streams of emigration now flowing so rapidly to the Colonies of the West and the South.

Diocesan Intelligence.

Pennsylvania.—On Sunday, Dec. 3, 1848, Bishop Potter admitted five persons to the holy rite of confirmation in St. Matthew's Church, Francisville.

Maryland.—CONFIRMATIONS.—On Sunday, the twenty-first after Trinity, November the 12th, in Christ church, Cambridge, eight persons.

On Monday evening, November 13th, in Christ church, Easton, one person.

On Sunday, the twenty-third after Trinity, in Trinity church, Elkton, six persons.—Church Times.

Virginia.—ORDINATION.—On Wednesday, November the 29th. Mr. Rodney S. Nash, Instructor in the Episcopal High School of Virginia, was admitted to Deacon's orders, by the Bishop of this Diocese, in Christ church, Alexandria. The candidate was presented by the Rev. E. A. Dalrymple, and the sermon preached by the Rev. Dr. Sparrow.

CONTINUED SERVICES BY BISHOP MEADE IN THE NORTHERN NECK OF VIRGINIA.—After service in the White Chapel, in Lancaster County, on Monday, the 13th of November, where one person was confirmed, and the Lord's Supper administered, the Bishop proceeded to old Farnham church, in Richmond county, where one was confirmed; thence on the following day, to the church at Richmond Court House, where one was also confirmed; thence to Yeocomico church in Westmoreland co. This is a very plain but strong brick church, built in the year 1706, and which has probably, since its erection, never until now, needed repairs to the amount of one hundred dollars. The roof, windows, pews, chancel, and pulpit, are the same which were there at its erection, 143 years ago. They however, now so greatly need repair, in order to their preservation and the comfort of the congregation, that it is designed soon to shingle the house anew, and to lower and repaint the pews with slight alterations in the interior.

On the two following days the Bishop and other ministers were engaged in Divine Service, at a new and neat brick church, at Nomini Ferry, built on the sight of the old Nomini church, which has long since disappeared. Old Nomini Hall, the seat of Counsellor Carter, generally called Nomini Carter, is a few miles off, and likely to remain for a long while a monument of the faithful workmanship of former days. The region of country around is unsurpassed in beauty and agricultural advantages by any in the Northern Neck, and is well filled with a most respectable population, which crowded into the new church on the day of its consecration. A good hope is cherished of the permanent prosperity of the congregation at this place.

On the following Sabbath, and the day after, services were held and well attended at Westmoreland Court House, where two persons were confirmed. There is no church at this place, the Court House having thus far supplied the place of one. We are happy to be able to say that this will no longer be necessary when a few months shall have passed away. The Episcopalians and Methodists have both determined to build houses of worship with all possible speed. The Rev. William McGuire is now officiating alternately at Westmoreland Court House and Oak Grove about sixteen miles off, and also in Westmoreland county. At Oak Grove a new and excellent brick church is in the course of erection and will soon be ready for use. At this place services were held on the 22nd and 23rd, when two persons were confirmed and Rev. Wm. McGuire admitted to priest's orders.—Southern Churchman.

Rhode Island.—EPISCOPAL ACTS.—On the 7th of September, one person was confirmed in Ascension church, Wakefield. The preface was read by the Rev. J. H. Carpenter, rector.

On the 27th of the same month, a sick person was confirmed belonging to Grace church, Providence.

Nov. 9th, three persons were confirmed in St. Philip's church, Crompton Mills. Evening prayer was conducted by Rev. Messrs. Randolph and Carpenter, the preface was read by Rev. Charles E. Bennett. The Bishop delivered a sermon and an address.

On the 22nd Sunday after Trinity, six persons were confirmed in Christ church Lonsdale. The service was said by Rev. Elisha F. Watson, minister of the parish; a sermon and an address were delivered by the Bishop.—Witness.

CLERICAL CHANGES.—The Rev. Joseph S. Large has resigned the Rectorship of Trinity parish, Mercer, Michigan, and accepted an invitation to the Rectorship of Trinity church, Fort Wayne, Indiana, and desires all letters and papers for him directed accordingly.

The Rev. Henry S. Kepler, having accepted the charge of St. John's church, Richmond, and removed to the latter city from Baltimore, desires that his letters and papers may be addressed accordingly.

The Rev. James W. Hoskins has been transferred, by letters dimissory to the Rt. Rev. the Bishop, to the Diocese of Delaware.

The Rev. Dwight E. Lyman has been transferred by letters dimissory to the Rt. Rev. the Bishop, to the Diocese of Pennsylvania.

The Rev. William P. C. Johnson has been transferred to the Diocese of Mississippi, by letters dimissory to the Standing Committee, acting as Ecclesiastical Authority of the diocese.

The Rev. S. T. Carpenter having removed to Churchtown, Pa., requests letters and papers for him to be directed to that place.

The Rev. Wm. J. Timmer, having accepted a call to Trinity church, Appalachicola, requests all letters to be sent there.

The Rev. Joseph I. Elsegood has been called to, and accepted the rectorship of Christ church, Danville, Columbia co., Pa. All letters and papers intended for him will hereafter be addressed to him at Danville.

The Rev. Alexander D. Jones, late assistant minister in St. Mary Anne's Parish, Cecil co., Md., has resigned that station, and become connected with St. Timothy's Hall.—P. O. Cantonville, Balt. Co.

The Rev. Alfred B. Beach, having resigned Christ church, Cooperstown, and accepted an unanimous call to St. John's church, Canandaigua, has removed accordingly.

The Rev. S. H. Battin, having resigned St. Stephen's church, New Hartford, and accepted a call to Christ church, Cooperstown, Otsego county, has removed accordingly.

The Rev. Charles H. Gardiner, having received an unanimous call to St. Stephen's Church, New Hartford, has removed accordingly.

Miscellaneous.

Effects of Imagination.

The following anecdote was related by the celebrated father Taylor, in the course of recent lecture:—

"It happened years ago, in the days of old-fashioned meeting-houses, with their pews like pens, and their pulpits perched up at an elevation which placed them without the pale of human sympathy, and when a fire for the purpose of warming a church was a thing unheard of, that some enterprising young men who had worshipped in such a church, determined to have the house warmed by stoves. But the project encountered the most violent opposition from all the old people. They declared that it should not be; that stoves were not a Gospel ordinance; that the congregation must suffocate. The young men, however, prevailed; and one sabbath the congregation beheld in the church two formidable black stoves, with the pipes traversing the entire length of the house. The old men and women looked on with horror, and held their breath for the result. The exercises of the Church proceeded. Soon a lady fainted away, and in a few moments another gasped for breath, and was carried out of the church, and then another. At last a stout burly man swooned and fell. The frightened minister at once dismissed the Church, and there was a general rush of the indignant people toward the stoves. The windows were thrown open, and they were about to precipitate the offenders from the house, when, lo! and behold! the stoves were cold! and not a particle of fire had been kindled in either of them. The masons had not quite time to finish putting them up, and no fire had been made. The triumph of the young advocates of stoves was complete."—Albion Monthly Advertiser.

GROANING AND CRYING.—A French surgeon lately published a long dissertation on the beneficial influence of groaning and crying on the nervous system! He contends that groaning and crying are the two grand operations by which nature allays anguish, and that he has uniformly observed that those patients who give way to their natural feelings, more speedily recover from accidents and operations than those who suppose it is unworthy a man to betray such symptoms of cowardice as either to groan or to cry. He is always pleased by the crying and violent roaring of a patient during the time he is undergoing a severe surgical operation, because he is satisfied that he will thereby so soothe his nervous system as to prevent fever, and ensure a favorable termination. He relates a case of a man who by crying and bawling reduced his pulse from one hundred and twenty to sixty in the course of two hours. That some patients often have great satisfaction in groaning, and that hysterical patients often experience great relief from crying, are facts which no person will deny. As to restless hypochondriacal subjects, or those who are never happy but when they are under some course of medical or dietetic treatment, the French surgeon assures them that they cannot do better than groan all night and cry all day.

I have been reading over the text, "Then the same day at evening, being the first day of the week, when the disciples were assembled for fear of the Jews, came Jesus and stood in the midst, and saith unto them, Peace be unto you," John xx. 19. I have been reflecting on the circumstance of "the doors being shut," and some pleasant though somewhat fanciful thoughts have come across my mind.

Do you wish that Jesus would come into your heart saying, "Peace be unto you?" Look well to it, that the "doors" and windows are "shut;" for if your ears are open to take in all the vain babbling that prevail in Vanity fair, and your eyes are open to stare at all the fine things there are set forth, your heart will soon be as full as the inn at Bethlehem, and there will be no room for Jesus. Either keep the doors and windows shut or watch them carefully. It is cold work watching, especially when darkness is round you. Many a weary hour will you have while other folks are merry-making; but when he comes you shall see that the morning Sun of Righteousness is better than the midnight lamp of revelry.—Old Humphrey.

THE RESURRECTION.—I have stood in a smith's forge, and seen him put a rusty, cold, dull, piece of iron into the fire, and after a while hath taken the same piece, the very same numerical, individual piece of iron out of the fire, but bright and sparkling; and thus it is with our bodies, they are laid down in the grave, dead, heavy, earthly; but at the resurrection this mortal shall put on immortality; at that general conflagration, this dead, heavy, earthly body shall rise, living, lightsome, glorious; which made Job so confident. "I know that my Redeemer liveth."—Fuller.

Plants of the Church.

THE IVY.

I. IT CLINGS.

See, on yon walls, that once towered in their pride,
Now fallen in ruins, and low,
The ivy clings, like an old friend, and tried,
As it clung there, ages ago:
Teaching the Christian, whatever betide,
To make heavy his spirit, and sad,
Still to cling with faith to the Church's side,
As he clung, when his heart was glad.

II. IT FADES NOT.

See, in Summer and Winter, the ivy, the same,
How it heeds not the chilling blast;
But, as long as a single stone shall remain,
It will cling, and not fade, to the last:
Teaching the Christian, to heed not the roar
Of the storms, that the world would fear;
But to trust in the Cross; and to hope, even more,
Than he hoped, when the skies were clear.

III. IT GROWS UPWARD.

See, the ivy grows upward; towards heaven, it rears
Its leaves, that are ever green;
And, each day, and each hour, the sky it nears,
Though its growth is by us unseen:
Teaching the Christian, though, now, on the earth,
And by earthly passions swayed,
Still to strive for the place of his heavenly birth,
Where nothing shall fail or fade.

Wall Flowers.

"they smell sweetest by night-time, thae flowers; and they're maist seen about ruined buildings."—EDIE OCHILTREE, in the Antiquary.

Sweetest by night: like gracious words,
That scent the sacred page;
But freeliest pour their perfumed store,
In sickness, grief, and age.

Seen most by ruins: like the love,
That gave itself for all;
Yet closest clings to guiltiest things,
As Magdalene, or Saul.

Selections.

The following description of the Isle of Wight we take from "The Christian Witness." These letters of this correspondent we have read with much interest.—[ED. OF BANNER.]

Foreign Correspondence.

Niton, Isle of Wight, Oct. 23, 1848.

SECOND LETTER FROM THE ISLE OF WIGHT.

REV. AND DEAR SIR:—Fresh from a tour over a part of the Isle of Wight, I find myself compelled to take back even the comparatively qualified praise which was accorded, four days ago, to Rhode Island, in my first letter about Arreton, and the Dairyman's Daughter. I had then but begun to contemplate the treasures of beauty and grandeur which it contains upon its shores and in its bosom. That you may be well aware of the force of what I am about to utter, let me say, that the love-ness of Naples, and her bay and islands, the charms of the east-tour of Sicily from Palermo to Messina, the most beautiful spots in Italy, and the landscapes of Greece and Asia Minor, are fresh in my memory; but I have not the least hesitation in saying emphatically, and with such a sense of its truth that words convey but a faint idea of my meaning, that the Isle of Wight surpasses them all, and almost every thing else except Lagaria, that I ever saw. Words can do no justice to the wonderful assemblage of beautiful and sublime objects which are heaped together on the south-eastern coast of this island, and that too, strange to tell, within the short space of six or eight miles. Talk of the sublimity and grandeur of American scenery! Come and see the Isle of Wight! There are scenes on it which cannot be found in the world beside, and therefore new names have been invented to describe them. Such as the terms common here, of Chine and Undercliff, to say nothing of Landslips, of which there have been three, within only a few miles, and within the last half century. Accompany me, then, in my pedestrian tour; for he must be a dolt indeed, who glips through such scenes, in which the slowest foot-pace is too fast; and I have found it difficult to accomplish even eight miles in two days. I have now left a thousand beauties unseen, and only feel the stronger desire to go over the ground immediately again. We will begin with the view from the interior, which I partly described in my last letter. Carisbrook Castle stands in sombre and massive, though ruined grandeur, in the midst of a smiling valley. It is surrounded with hills, which pour their rills into the little river that winds its way first through this sheltered vale, and then through Newport to the Solent Sea; this is that part of the channel between the island and the opposite coast of Hampshire, to which county the island belongs. The Castle itself is an immense ruin, a mile in circumference, if you go round by the terrace, which was built upon the hill, and next this is a ditch, and then a wall, then another trench, and another wall. Next comes the old and lofty British mound, thrown up perhaps before the Roman conquest, and on the top of this the Saxons, Normans, and English have, in successive generations, built and fortified, and now neglected a mighty Castle. Under these walls, you may well imagine the winding of the bugle, as the herald approaches for a parley, or the stranger for an audience, or the Pilgrim crusader from the Holy Land claiming hospitality, or angry barons contending for fancied rights, or doing battle for faith and honour. There is nothing in feudal history with which this ancient and magnificent ruin, whose towers yet rise in twin-grandeur, may not have been associated. Helmeted knight and 'gentle ladie,' holy fathers and inspired minstrels, haughty barons and trembling vassals, chivalrous crusaders and martyr-kings, have all been here; for in this island, if not in this Castle, King John secluded himself among fishermen, awaiting the Pope's permission to break his oath, after the barons at Runnymede had forced him to sign Magna Charta; and from this same Carisbrook, that unappy and high-spirited king, Charles I., attempted to escape for his life. What associations are called up by the lofty Keep, with its well over 300 feet deep, mostly chiselled out of the solid rock, before gunpowder was invented. What thoughts arose, as I stood by the very same iron gates, out of which King Charles had almost succeeded in making his escape. A vassal was ready, a horse near, an escort prepared, and the signal given; but the king could only thrust his head through the bars, and could find no egress for his shoulders. Here he remained, groaning piteously, and his friends could hear but not relieve him; and at last, ex-tricating himself, with great difficulty, from this painful position, he resigned himself to his fate, and placed a light in the window to show his friends that the plan had failed.

There was, within a few years, service in the chapel, in the spacious area of the Castle, which embraces several acres; but the little church is now ruined, and the roof is fallen in, though there seem to be no sheep or cattle to enter the open doors and desecrate the holy place.

Leaving the Castle, and following the winding way, through green lanes and hedge-rows, we pass the pretty village of Spide, and are soon in another region, on the furze-covered barren of St. George's Down. At the end of this opens a wild scene, and the little village of Arreton is discovered at the foot of the Down of another name, and the very ancient and remarkable church, in whose ground the Dairyman's Daughter lies buried, stands in the midst of hay-stacks, and barns, and huts. But of this I shall write you again. Passing the Dairyman's cottage, through green lanes, and among ivy-mantled thatched cottages and trees, whose trunks are enveloped by parasitical plants of the deepest green, you find yourself in an extensive farm-yard, and a moment after in a secluded forest, apparently as wild as our own, until suddenly a sweet little cottage, covered with roses and other flowers, peeps out upon your path. This, and much more than I can speak of, with a view or two of a ruined castle, and of Lord Yarborough's seat and park at Appulder-combe, or as the people call it, 'Appleycoomb,' occurs within a short walk. Suddenly on the ascent of a hill, the sea, which had been lost for a short time before, bursts gloriously and unexpectedly upon you. You are soon in the pretty little village of Shanklin, and descending towards the shore, all at once you come to the brow of a precipice, and what a view bursts upon you. A hundred feet below you, appear the roofs of a dozen beautiful cottages; and while you fear for your own safety, though quite secure, you wonder that the inhabitants have no fear that the immense perpendicular wall will not fall and crush them. At the base of the precipice, the wide British Channel, like the boundless sea, lies spread out before you, now placid as a lake, and now lashed into fury against the projecting promontory on your right, called Shanklin Head, which towers into the air, a sheer precipice; and the waves rolling at its very base, remind you of the scene in the Antiquary, for, at high tide, you cannot go round Shanklin ('Halkett's') head.
There is safety, however, on the beach, between this and Dan-nose point. Far away to the left, rise the chalky, almost snow-white precipices of Culver Cliffs, and from this prominent headland, upon which a monument is rising to the Earl of Yarborough, comes gracefully sweeping round Sandown Bay.
You proceed towards the shore. A few steps brings you to an arch overhead, formed by a tree, whose lowest roots are in the crags above you; and on the right is the fisherman's cottage, who has built up a wall to save the tree. You are now within Shanklin Chine. But let me tell you what a chine is.

As you might imagine, it is a cleft in the back of a hill, and is formed in this way: A rivulet, sometimes swollen with rains, fell, probably since the creation or the deluge, down from the top of this precipice upon the sea shore. By degrees, it wore away its channel, and the walls of sandy loam on each side fell in, till they are now separated, about midway a stone's throw apart; and the walls, which were once united, now rise on either hand, extending up to the cascade about one quarter of a mile. On the opposite side, looking out upon the sea, and into this romantic dell, and up its sides, is Leigh Richmond's favorite seat. No wonder that he could describe the beauties of nature, and compare them with the wonders of grace. Such scenes as these might inspire even a dullard, far more the poet; they might make an infidel devout, far more such a saint. Below, at the foot of the chine, lives now the daughter-in-law (Mrs.
Sampson.) of the 'Fisherman of Shanklin Head,' and on these sands walked the poor African. Far up in the air, on the brow of the head of the romantic glen, is perched, in a seemingly dangerous spot, on the very brow of the precipice, and looking down more than one hundred feet into the deep ravine, a beautiful cottage. From the shore, through a gateway in the path, you now wind along, through every variety of the most picturesque beauty, to the little water-fall, which is at its work, deepening and lengthening the dell; for it has moved back ten yards in as many years. When you emerge from the 'chine' through a wicket-gate, you may turn to your left hand and follow the footpath across a stile, leaving the village behind you; and after a succession of views, you descend into another dell.
'Luccombe Chine,' which is much smaller, and as perfect a gem of a lovely dell, as the other was of the grand, romantic, and picturesque. This dear little glen seemed a 'chine' for the children; and accordingly, I found some dear little ones, the prattlers of Mr. Cooper, who has a charming cottage, at the head of the dell. They were dressed like children, as children always are in England, and not in our grown-up 'great man and woman' style. They had with them the most perfectly beautiful small greyhound I ever saw; and as I sat in the middle of the dell, half way up the hill, the dog returned from two of the children, and stopped a moment by me, as if to ascertain that I would be a safe companion, and then made his way to the shore. I now discovered, by the soft song that floated up the glen from the shore, that one of the little girls had been left behind, and the dog was soon at her side, while she played with the ripples on the shore; for all was calm and sunshine to-day. A grot opposite, a babbling brook, leaping from stone to stone, the architect of the beautiful dell, a tower above, a flag-staff, and the green shrubs and flowers on every side, would hardly suffer me to tear myself away from the spot and the children. How many sweet children with the blue eyes, flaxen hair, and rose and lily faces, I have met upon this Island! I always steal a chat or a kiss from the dear little cherubs: they are as bright as the larks which rise from these sunny meadows, and as sweet-voiced as the nightingales and blackbirds that warble in these shady dells.

I cannot pass this charming cottage, the home of those children, without calling your attention to the snow-white ducks trooping over the deep green, close-shaven lawn, and above all, mark that farmer's cottage, all covered over with ivy, except where the roses are absolutely in full bloom by scores on the very roof itself. There's nothing like that in New England.
The very barn is covered with vines, and all is in keeping with the quiet loveliness of this chosen spot.

The House of Prayer.

(From the Churchman's Monthly Penny Magazine.)

"Also for the sons of the stranger, that join themselves to the Lord,

To serve him, and to love the name of the Lord,

To be His servants,

Every one that keepeth the sabbath from polluting it,

And taketh hold of my covenant:

Even them will I bring to my holy mountain,

And make them joyful in my house of prayer;

Their burnt-offerings and their sacrifices shall be accepted upon mine altar;

For mine house shall be called a house of prayer for all people."

(Isaiah lvi. 6, 7.)

God's temples, erected for His worship and praise on earth, are properly called "Houses of Prayer."—Prayer includes all the acts of divine worship; its parts being, petition, or asking for gifts and graces from God; confession, or acknowledgement of sins and offences; intercession, in behalf of others; thanksgiving, for past and present benefits; and praise, ascribing honour and glory to the Author of every good and perfect gift.

The first temple for the worship of God was in Paradise; and as all creation then was holy and happy, and every surrounding object contributed to peace and comfort, no building was needed to invite the worshippers to prayer; the shady and fragrant bowers of Eden were sufficient for the devout assembly of the human pair, in the worship of their Almighty and All-gracious God.

The next temple was without the gates of Paradise, from which our fallen and unhappy parents had been driven; where the flaming cherubim were placed in token of the divine presence, though surrounded with awe, and near which, probably, altars were erected for the sacrifices of victims before the mercy-seat, accompanied with the devotions of the worshippers. And so we find in succeeding times, that altars of raised earth constituted the place of assembly for divine worship; till it pleased God to direct, first, the tabernacle, and then the glorious temple of Jerusalem to be erected as His house of prayer. After which, as devout servants of God multiplied, so places of worship—sometimes called Synagogues, sometimes Temples, and afterwards Churches—were multiplied also; till, as we are rejoiced and cannot be too thankful to be able to say, they are planted throughout the length and breadth of our native land—would that it were so throughout the whole world—at the present day.

Oh that we could also, with devout and holy gratitude say, that these churches of our beloved country, which are the bulwarks of all our glorious institutions, were rightly prized and duly valued, by all those for whose spiritual and eternal benefit they have been erected!

Are they not "Houses of prayer for all people?" and why do not all come to the House of God, for this blessed privilege of uniting "with one accord to make their common supplications unto Him," within those hallowed precincts? Without attaching any superstitious awe to the expression, are we not correct in calling them hallowed precincts—set apart from all profane and secular usage, and consecrated by a special act of homage—set apart for special, united, public prayer and praise, and other spiritual purposes, all designed to draw sinning and suffering man nearer to God, and away from the haunts of sin and sorrow; to make him a devout and holy worshipper of God, and servant and follower of Christ his Saviour; to sanctify his heart with holy feelings towards his Maker; and unite him, at the same time, in the bonds of holy love with his fellow-creature, fellow-sinner and fellow-Christian?

Oh that any should refuse and neglect "the assembling of themselves together" in God's house for these hallowed and heavenly purposes! Oh that any should think that they can serve God equally well at home in private, when public prayer and hearing God's word present so many more spiritual advantages, so many higher advantages, so many higher privileges, both for our own good and as a testimony and example to others. Oh that any should make light of the church as the house of prayer, and think only of the preaching! This, we fear, is but too commonly the case among a certain class, where the spirit of prayer and devotion is either dormant or wanting; and consequently the house of God is not frequented for divine worship, but for hearing,—which, though inexpressibly important, is not, after all, the only concern of the man of true religion.

The preaching of the word is, undoubtedly, God's own ordinance—the "power of God," by which it pleases him to "save them that believe," (1 Cor. i. 18–25,)—very necessary to rouse the slumbering sinner from the error of his ways, and to "build up believers in their most holy faith." But are not the prayers equally necessary, when we reflect that they are offered as sweet incense to the honour of God, and likewise to draw down the spirit of grace, and those "preparations of the heart from the Lord," without which the word, either read or preached, will not profit?

Let us, then, endeavour to entertain more becoming views of the value and privilege of all acts of divine worship and devout adoration and Christian communion, as well as of hearing God's word, which are presented by these temples of the living and true God. Let us not neglect so rich a means of grace, so inestimable a religious benefit, so bounden a Christian duty.

Let us ever associate in our minds the observance of God's sabbaths with attendance at his sanctuary; as it was ordained of old, "Ye shall keep my Sabbaths, and reverence my Sanctuary: I am the Lord." (Leviticus xix. 30.)

And who can tell the blessings rich and manifold, that flow into the soul of the serious worshipper, the spiritual and intelligent attendant upon the religious services of the sanctuary, as arranged and conducted in our Apostolic Church? The prayers—are they not full of the Gospel of Christ? are they not rich in the union of the Spirit? are they not important in their appeals for mercy, grace, pardon, and peace to the majesty of the Father of heaven, through the unceasing intercession of his dear Son, who sitteth at his right hand? Can you under any other form of worship serve God with more devotion in the true character of worshippers, and in the union of heart and soul with all your fellow-Christians who attend with you God's house of prayer, supplicating, with one voice, the same mercies and blessings, and joining in the same praises and thanksgiving?

Take the advice of a friend. "Watch and pray." Enter not the house of the wicked, nor do thy pleasure on God's holy days. "Call the sabbath a delight, holy of the Lord and honourable." And devoutly feel with David (Psalm lxxiv. 1, 2)—"How amiable are thy tabernacles, O Lord of Hosts! My soul longeth, yea, even fainteth for the courts of the Lord; my heart and my flesh crieth out for the living God."

CEPHAS.

Church of England.

It is truly gratifying to observe the multiplied indications of increasing zeal and returning prosperity, which have, of late, appeared in the English Church. Every such indication of the revival of a true religious interest, in that truly noble branch of the Holy Catholic Church, should call forth hearty thanksgiving, from every true churchman. The world does not know, and the world never will know, how much the present generation are indebted to the Church of England, for the enjoyment of those innumerable and inestimable blessings, that follow as natural consequence, in the train of the Gospel of Jesus Christ, wherever the Gospel is maintained in its full integrity, and preached without compromise; where its faith is held just as it was delivered to the saints, and its ordinances are administered just as they were ordained. The Church of England at this moment, is probably, doing more for evangelizing this wicked world, than all the denominations of Protestant Christendom put together. And yet, she might with the blessing of Heaven do much more than this. She ought to do more than this. God hath wonderfully blessed her, with the means of incalculable good. He has given her wealth, and learning, and influence, and everything that can make a nation good and great: and terrible indeed, will be her account, if she do not improve these distinguished favors, so that her far reaching influence may be felt, throughout the earth, carrying the light and life of the Gospel into the hearts of nations, sitting in the region and shadow of death.

A former governor of this State, who was, if we mistake not, a Congregational Deacon, once gave as a toast:—England the bulwark of our religion. And although such a sentiment, from such a source, at such a time, when prejudices against Episcopacy generally and against the Church of England in particular, were much greater than they are now, caused much fluttering in the ranks of those who did not understand as well as he did, the true character of that Church; and, notwithstanding the reception which such a sentiment met with then, and would meet with now, coming from the same source, yet we may well ask, did this governor, or any other governor, ever utter a juster sentiment?—Every year's observation more and more justifies the truth that the Church of England under God, is the bulwark of true religion in the world: the power which can stay the insolent advance of Romanism on the one side,—and roll back the terrific tide of infidelity on the other. In our English papers received by the last steamer, we rejoice to see that the Bishop of Oxford is taking decisive measures to promote a more general and spiritual interest throughout his diocese. He is exercising his Episcopal authority in requiring his clergy to become more active and diligent in the performance of their duties, and he urges compliance by one of the strongest and most effective arguments, which is by setting the example himself. He has determined to follow more closely the pattern of primitive Bishops in abundant labor, among the people of his Episcopal charge.

The following is the paragraph to which we have alluded; 'The Bishop of Oxford, in his recent charge to his clergy, promises to adopt a system which will make him personally acquainted with every part of his diocese. His lordship intends to take active part in the parochial services, and to make his high office something more than it has usually been to the clergy of the remoter districts. While thus alive himself to the duties of his office, he intends to exact similar activity and zeal from the clergy. He requires, at the very least, two full services, including two sermons, or one sermon and a public catechising. He will be rejoiced to hear of week day services; but two services on Sundays he esteems the minimum of duty in every parish where there is a sufficient endowment for the maintenance of the clergyman. To that, however, as a general rule, there must be exceptions in particular cases: those cases must be reported to the bishop, who will carefully consider them. No existing services in any parish must be dropped without his consent. He presses this course upon his clergy, not merely as an indication to their people that they are moved to their ministry by the energy of love, but from a conviction of its necessity to the spiritual instruction of their people. However small a parish may be, the bishop observes that not more than one-half of the adult population can be present at the same service. The catechising and the sermons are all that reach the great bulk of the population through the week and their only means of instruction; and, if the clergy do not give them fresh opportunities of acquiring knowledge, they shut out one-half of their parishioners from the means of Christian learning.'—Christian Witness.

A Visit to the Poet Wordsworth.

A Correspondent (Sigma) of the Courier and Enquirer, in a travelling letter, gives the following feeling memorial of the poet Wordsworth at his home of Rydal Mount. It is the old age "frothy but kindly," of a man who early lent out his heart to nature and humanity, and who now receives his return with usury. How fine an illustration is this touching narrative, of his writings!—Literary World.

"I had proceeded but a few steps towards the house, when I perceived in the little yard before it a hale, stoutly-built old gentleman in cloth cap, plain black suit, and thick shoes, drawing an aged lady in a large hand-wagon; and the sounds I heard were her child-like exclamations of delight. It was Wordsworth and his invalid sister. I involuntarily removed my hat and apologized for my intrusion. But not a word of that sort would either of them listen to. The old lady seized my hand, and broke out into a rhapsody about that 'dear good man, Mr. Coleridge.' Upon my dropping a word of sympathy for her helpless state, she began to repeat, in the most feeling voice, a hymn of several stanzas, expressive of her resignation to her Heavenly Father's will, and of her joy in view of the glories of a brighter world. The poet, evidently touched, stood silent, and as for myself, it required a stouter heart than mine to be unmoved by the scene. At length, the old lady let go my hand, and the poet intrusting her to the care of her nurse, led the way into the house. We were soon seated in a comfortable little room, which appeared to be half parlor and half library, before a blazing coal fire.

"I inquired respecting the health of the sister we had just left: 'Poor thing!' says he, 'she was most dangerously ill twelve years ago and has never recovered from the effects of it. She requires the most constant care; but she is a great blessing to us all. We all take the greatest interest in her, and feel that she is the means to us of invaluable moral and spiritual good. If it were not for the sick and the old and little children, who are constantly appealing to the better feelings of our nature, men would soon become monsters.' I inquired respecting his own health.—'It is as good,' he replied, 'for aught I know, as it ever was. It would be folly to account old age youth, and there may be some malady secretly at work in my system that I know nothing of. But I believe I have seen many young men not twenty-five, who were actually older than I am now.'

"The conversation soon turned upon more general topics. He spoke of Coleridge,—of Southey,—of Schlegel, whom he knew intimately in France,—of the distinctive characteristics of English, Swiss, and Italian scenery, expressing by the way his conviction that the English lake district presented more attractions for a residence than any other part of the world,—of the grandeur and beauty of some of the old cathedrals of England,—of the tendency of railroads to produce a general neglect of the natural beauties of the country,—of the levity and fickleness of Frenchmen, and their incapability, to govern themselves of the probability, nay the certainty, as he would have it, that the English would soon supersede the French as the common language of Europe—and, in short, talked most freely and delightfully on every subject that presented itself. To be alone for one good hour as I was, I felt richly repaid me, if nothing else could, for venturing over the trackless deep. Before taking my leave, Mrs. Wordsworth, a matronly benevolent-looking old lady, and the poet's daughter, took seats with us; and was soon made to feel that I was indeed in one of the happiest homes of England.

"Wordsworth's personal appearance is very similar to the likenesses you see of him prefixed to his works. There is a blending of thoughtfulness and benignity in his countenance that excites love and admiration at the very first glance. The upper part of his head is entirely bald, but long silvery locks fall upon his neck behind. His features are strongly marked yet are contemplative rather than energetic in their expression. His brow is of extraordinary amplitude, and, though of sculpture-like smoothness, it has much of that worn severe cast so common to men habituated to deep reflection; his large grey eyes, kindly and yet pensive, have a calm, earnest in-seen look, such a look as belongs to eyes that 'can find in flower thoughts too deep for tears;' and about his mouth there is a bland and almost playful expression that denotes a spirit glowing with all the sweetest affections and gentlest charities of life. His voice is most melodious, and his language of the most charming simplicity. He is now in his 79th year, yet his countenance is unwrinkled, and his frame scarcely bent. He takes much exercise, and great care to preserve his health, and daily may be seen walking along the roads or over the hills with all the vigor of a man yet in his prime."

Old Times in Maine.

We cut the following sketch from the "Waldo Signal." Who does not like these notices of "old times,"—who is not two-thirds an antiquary? "If any, speak, for him!"—we don't make this extract.

We take the following proceedings from the town records which goes to illustrate the "good old times."

Belfast was incorporated in 1773. Thomas Goldthwait, Esq. was chosen Moderator, John Mitchell, Town Clerk; John Brown, Benjamin Nesmith, and James Patterson, Selectmen.

In 1775, a meeting was called, "to meet on the Common on the south end of No. 26, on Thursday the twenty-eighth day," &c. We give extracts just as they were written and punctuated. The meeting was called "in His Majesty's name. Its object was "to chuse a man to carry a petition and present it to the General Court," then assembled at Boston. John Tuft was chosen to carry said petition, and the following vote was passed:—Resolved, That a man to carry said Petition to the General Court is three shillings per Day, he finding Vittles and Drink for himself.

The "Drink" in those days was of some importance, for was before the temperance reform had made much progress; however, it would not be amiss in our days of "enlightened wisdom and reform," provided we were obliged to find our public servants with "Drink."

Next comes the separation of the Goats and the Sheep.

BELFAST, June 10th, 1775.

This is to Certify that we the Subscribers have warned Joseph Dow to withdraw from this town forthwith for we would not accept him as a Town Inhabitant.

This was signed by the selectmen and Town Clerk.

Then comes the good way of publishing when neighbors and near were invited to the wedding; when music and dancing enlivened the scene; when the festive board groaned under its heavy load of baked beans, brown bread, and pumpkin pie, and every thing passed off

"As merry as a marriage bell."

Belfast, Sept. 28, 1774.

This Certifies that the intention of marriage Between Mr. John Barnett and Mrs. Isabel Durham was lawfully published By me John Mitchell town Clerk.

Mr. John Barnett and Mrs. Issabell Durham Both of Belfast were joined in marriage Sept. 27, 1774, by me Dan'l Little.

Next comes a touch of the "Blue Laws."

The following vote was passed in 1776:

Resolved that if any person makes unmissaserry vizets on the Sabath they shall be Lookt on with Contempt until they make acknowledgment to the Public.

SINGULAR CONCEIT.—Insects, generally, must lead a truly joyful life. Think what it must be to lodge in a lily. Imagine a palace of ivory or pearl, with pillars of silver and capitals of gold, all exhaling such a perfume as never rose from human censers. Fancy, again, the pleasure of tucking yourself, for the night, in the folds of the rose, rocked to sleep by the gentle sighs of the zephyr, and nothing to do when you wake but wash yourself in the dew-drop, and fall to eating your bed clothes.

The Church and Voluntary Societies.

MR. EDITOR:—

Many of your readers no doubt remember the spirited and able debate which took place in the Pennsylvania Convention of 1838, on the report of a committee appointed by the preceding Convention, to consider "the expediency of adopting some plan by which the Sunday School, Tract, Missionary, and other benevolent operations of the Diocese, should be placed under the control of the Convention; and made to sustain a relation thereto similar to that which the Board of Missions sustains to the General Convention." The majority of the committee, four out of five, viz., the Rev. Dr. (now Bishop) De Lancey, and Messrs. James S. Smith, Geo. M. Wharton, and Thos. Robinson, while concurring in the principle that all such enterprises of Christian benevolence should be controlled by the authority of the Church, reported, that they deemed it inexpedient to adopt any such plan, until further experience should attest the wisdom and efficiency of that which was then under experiment by the General Convention, and a few of the Dioceses. The Rev. G. W. RIDGELY, the original mover of the resolution under which the Committee was appointed, presented a minority report, earnestly advocating the doctrine "that the Church herself is the best, because the only divinely founded, society for all purposes of religious benevolence;" and that it "is greatly to be preferred before any of those self-created and irresponsible associations, which (with the best intentions) often attempt to discharge its duties, and by which, in some departments of religious effort, it has been almost entirely superseded." The whole report will be found in the journal of Convention, 1838, and is well worth reading.

In the "Episcopal Recorder" of June 30, 1838, there is an interesting sketch of the debate that ensued on the occasion alluded to; which was principally participated in by the Rev. Dr. De Lancey; Rev. Mr. Ridgely, Hon. Horace Binney, and George M. Wharton, Esq. The republication of the following extracts from Mr. Ridgely's speech will do good, I think, at the present time.

ECCLESIA.

"Mr. Ridgely rose in reply. He always listened to the gentleman who had just spoken [Mr. Binney] with pleasure. He was interested, even when not convinced. He had reason to acknowledge the acuteness of that gentleman, for he was kept out of Convention a whole year by him. He did not sympathize with him in his antipathy to a discussion of abstract principles. It was necessary that they should be first settled. He believed that the same relation which the wheels of the watch which he held in his hand sustained to the hands, do principles to practice. The former must be adjusted, or the latter cannot go right. As to the objection, that this plan is a novelty, it is true it was never adopted in practice by our denomination until the last General Convention; but the principle was established 1800 years ago. It appeared strange that the advocates of irresponsible societies, as opposed to the Church, should speak so strongly of modern inventions.

"As to the argument, that the individual members of these societies are under the control of the Church, he would illustrate his idea. The stockholders of the Bank of the United States are individually amenable to the laws of the United States; but this fact did not make it a government bank, neither does it profess to be. Neither does the sustaining of the same relation to the Church by the members of these irresponsible associations make them Church societies; since they consider themselves such, they ought to sustain some stronger relation to the authorities of the Church.

"The gentleman asked, how this principle would work in party times? Would not a society under the direction of the Church be exposed to party influences? He answered, not as much so, certainly, as irresponsible societies. Take one fact as an illustration. At this moment, twenty of the clerical voters of this Convention are actually in the pay of an irresponsible society, [the "Advancement Society."] He meant no reflection upon those brethren; he entertained for them the highest respect; he knew they were good men; yet it was not in the nature of man to vote against his living.

"But is not this an influence which would be dangerous in party times? Sir, either this Convention must govern these Societies, or these societies will govern it. The bare fact that a Bishop is at the head of these societies, does not constitute them Church societies. We have heard, it is true, much about the ecclesiastical proverb, if it may be so called, 'Ecclesia in Episcopo.'

"This is differently understood by different individuals. Some are disposed to take it literally, and actually to think that the Church is in the Bishop, bell, steeple, and all; others are more moderate, and think that that church is most perfect where the Bishop is found in the true and legitimate exercise of his lawful authority.

"There are certain powers peculiar to the Episcopate; but he was not disposed to discuss the question of Episcopal power; nor, in answer to the gentleman, the powers of the General Convention; for he perceived that his own views differed materially from his.

"He believed that government was a science, and he could wish that the brethren would study it; for every legislator ought to understand its theory, as well as the practice. He himself had taken some lessons at the law school in Litchfield, and they had been of essential service to him. He was a republican in both church and state, and firmly believed that there is a striking analogy between the government of the Episcopal Church and the civil government of our country."

For the Banner of the Cross.

Inconsideration and Inconsistency.

When I read the Morning and Evening Prayer, I am forcibly struck with the Missionary spirit which breathes in so many expressions contained in them: and feel astonished, when I reflect how many use them without any practical effect. I think, are they antinomians? Are they formalists? Are they hypocrites? The spirit of charity will not allow me to apply any of these disparaging epithets to any of my fellow-sinners. When I observe things which my judgment must condemn, and my mantle of charity is too narrow to conceal, or my stock of charity too small to make due allowance for human frailty, I endeavour to restrain my indignation, and to preserve the spirit of peace and good-will by the recollection of three excellent discourses I heard upon the text "my people do not consider," in which the preacher expatiated upon the innumerable sins of omission and commission which proceed from inconsideration. Perhaps by directing the attention of Episcopalians to some of the most striking passages in our service, they may be led to profitable reflections, and impelled to perform those duties which are incumbent upon all those who profess and call themselves Christians.

Can any thing be more sublime and impressive than the opening verse of the service, "The Lord is in his holy temple, let all the earth keep silence before him!" Do we not feel as if we were in the immediate presence of the Great, I am, the High and mighty Ruler of the Universe, and should we not feel gratitude for our superior privileges of worshipping our Maker in spirit and in truth, while so many of our benighted fellow creatures are bowing down to stocks and stones and beasts, and performing diabolical and obscene rites in honor of them in their polluted temples. And when we hear the second verse read which proclaims the establishment of the Messiah's kingdom in every part of the world, do not our hearts leap with joy at the bright anticipation? But can we expect this glorious consummation will be effected by miracle, without our co-operation in the use of means? Dare we discourage any who are engaged in this glorious enterprise by withholding our assistance, and not providing them the requisite pecuniary means to carry on their operations? Can we, with sincerity and consistency, repeat the petition in the Lord's Prayer to our Father in heaven, praying that his name may be hallowed, that his kingdom may come, that his will may be done on earth as it is in heaven, and make no corresponding exertions to effect this glorious object, by those means, and the exercise of those talents with which God has intrusted us for this especial purpose? How can we sing glory be to God on high, on earth peace, good-will, towards men, how can we pray to the Lamb of God that taketh away the sins of the world to have mercy upon us, and receive our prayer, if we do nothing to lead those who are sitting in darkness and the shadow of death to the Sun of righteousness, to the light of life?

How can we repeat the Te Deum laudamus, and not wish the whole earth to unite with us in that sublime and exulting strain in worshipping the Father everlasting, &c. Does it not appear a mockery of human misery to sing in the Jubilate Deo, O be joyful in the Lord all ye lands, while we allow millions of benighted heathens to remain in ignorance of the true God and to worship devils? How can we praise God for having "raised up a mighty salvation for us," and make no exertions to extend the knowledge of that salvation to others? How can we utter the great practical truth in the creed and not teach the ignorant what they ought to believe and do for their soul's health? If we repeat, with a monopolizing spirit, "O Lord grant us thy salvation," can we expect that the Universal Father will grant our limited petition? How can we expect to be heard when we pray. Take not thy holy Spirit from us, if we disregard his admonitions, and do not inform others, "if there be any Holy Ghost?" Is it not an insulting mockery of the Divine Majesty to beseech him for all sorts and conditions of men that he would make his ways known to them, his saving health among all nations, and not use those gifts and faculties in his service that He has bestowed upon us for this express purpose? What kind of thanksgiving is it when we praise God for his inestimable love in the redemption of the world by our Lord and Saviour Jesus Christ, for the means of grace and the hope of glory, if we present no thank offering to enable his commissioned ministers to go forth and teach all nations, to sound the gospel trumpet to awaken those who are dead in trespasses and sins, to furnish them with the means of grace, to support them in their sufferings and trials, and to animate them in the performance of their duties by the hopes of glory? When we pray that we may shew forth his praise not only with our lips but in our lives, do we think this merely comprehends our relative, social, domestic, and political duties, and our duty to our own particular Church? Many consider that they perform all that is required of them when they grudgingly pay their pew rent, thinking they do not receive an equivalent for their money; and if they do not profit more by what they hear, their money has certainly been wasted, in regard to themselves. How can we pray, the grace of our Lord Jesus Christ, and the love of God, and the fellowship of the Holy Ghost, be with us all, evermore, and virtually exclude others from a participation in these blessings? This exclusive spirit reminds me of the prayer of the selfish person who said, "God bless us four and no more." If each clergyman would furnish every member of his congregation with one of these practical keys to the Prayer Book, and advise them to burnish them when they become rusty. I think they would enable the possessors to unlock many of their strong boxes, which have hitherto resisted all the false keys which have been applied to them, and impel them to deposit a due proportion into the Church treasury. Coffers which have been frequently opened to promote the glory of God, and the temporal and spiritual welfare of our fellow creatures, are the only fire-proof chests which will avail their possessors in the general conflagration at the last day. No blessing can attend that wealth which is hoarded up for children who generally waste it in riotous living. God frequently takes the children of such parents from the evil to come, and the childless miser leaves his riches to those who rejoice at his decease. None can be accused of selfishness or a disregard to the best interests of his family, by laying up treasures in heaven, and thus securing the Divine blessing upon his estate. They have the highest sanction for this regard to their mutual interests in the command of their future Judge, who will reward every one according to their works, on that day when those who have sown plenteously shall reap plenteously.

Now, Mr. Editor, if you think these few desultory remarks will be useful in arousing the inconsiderate, the self-deceiver, the supine and lethargic to a sense of their responsibilities and the necessity of maintaining a consistent course in word and deed, that their verbal devotions may not excite the risibility of the thoughtless, the ridicule of the profane, and the just animadversion of persons of common sense, I will send you a few similar reflections upon the Evening Prayer.

Church of The Redemption—Fairmount.

MR. EDITOR:

As many persons are under the impression that we have all the funds necessary for the completion of our Mission Church, permit me through the columns of your paper to correct that error.

The Church when completed will cost nearly $6000. Of this sum only $4,500 have been collected: consequently, $1,400 are yet needed ere the church can be completed and consecrated. Will not fourteen individuals or societies give $100 each, and thus make up the requisite amount? unless $1200 of this sum is contributed by the first of January next, we fear the worst consequences.

The church contains accommodations for about 500 worshippers, and 400 Sunday School Children. The services are generally well attended. And the following statement of services performed, will we think, show the importance of this mission:—In three and a-half years, there have been Baptised, 199; Confirmed, 51; Communicants added, 58; Burials, 102; Marriages, 31.

Shall this evidently useful mission be continued or not? Or shall it be so crippled for want of means, that it must drag along a miserable existence, and be only half so useful as it otherwise might be? The Christian community, the friends of Domestic Missions must answer these questions? Reader, upon your answer, depends the eternal welfare of many souls. What will you do for us, for God, for salvation?

Any communications left at the office of this paper, to aid us in this our season of extreme need, will be thankfully received and acknowledged by,

American Tract Society.

The following propositions may be considered as fairly drawn from what I have written on this subject.

1st. That it is a perversion of Christian Charity to publish books which private enterprise and capital would furnish quite as cheaply.

2d. That the publications of this society, when all expenses which are paid by charitable contributions are reckoned into the account, cost the religious public more than the same would in any other way of producing them, besides the incidental evil of driving or tempting a large amount of capital into injurious channels.

3d. That the action of the society is therefore inexpedient.

4th. That charity given for such an object is not only wasted, but works a positive evil to the community by violating every sound principle of political economy.

5th. That every institution of the kind should be conducted on self-supporting principles, and thereby leave a fair field for competition to individual enterprise.

6th. That the Church has no charity which she can rightfully employ in disregard of these principles.

7th. That charity must be just and sensible or it degenerates into a mischief-working weakness, not to be reasoned with.

8th. That when this institution or any one acting in the name of charity and for the public good, violates the plain principles of morality, as has been often done, by publishing the same books as other publishers, and thereby depreciating, and in some cases destroying the value of the property in their hands, it does in the name of the church and with a religious sanction what offends the moral sense of an irreligious world.

Now what is the estimation in which the claims of a society should be held that publicly disregards all these considerations, and publishes books professedly at cost, and calls on the religious public to pay all its colporteurs and agents, and to foot all its bills?

Men will give only a certain amount of their income in charity, and can it be believed that an institution conducted as this is, can justly claim the large share it receives? I cannot think so, or see how any thoughtful mind can. I have written, as I think, without religious or sectarian prejudice to the society, and with a purpose to express fearlessly honest convictions. I have sought to exhibit the principles which are involved in the case. I think I see enough in them to call for public consideration. Let it be shown that this is a legitimate charity as now managed, or let it be abandoned, and let other more needful objects receive the charity of a considerate public.

MURDER OF MISSIONARIES.—A London paper states that Dr. Bettleheim and his family, missionaries of the Church of England, have been murdered at the capital of Loo Choo, where they were residing. Dr. Bettleheim, a native of Hungary, and originally of the Jewish persuasion, was educated for the surgical profession, but afterwards joined the Church of England. He was a young man of talent, and of great promise. His wife was a native of London, and it is said that they had two children.

The next Volume of the Banner.

The Banner hopes to present a more respectable appearance when it comes forth to wish its kind friends a happy New Year. Its enterprising publishers, Messrs. King & Baird, have made arrangements to print the next volume on very superior paper, and in beautiful new type. No expense will be spared to make the form and appearance of the paper attractive.

Of course such a change involves no trifling outlay of money. Is it too much then, to ask those, for whose benefit the expense is incurred, to be prompt in paying subscriptions now due, and to be active in adding to the list of our present subscribers?

In copying the following announcement, the Editor feels bound to say a word concerning the proprietor. He retires from the post which he has so long and usefully occupied, because the demands of his business pursuits give him no time to watch over the interests of the Banner. To his fostering care this Journal owes much, and the Editor deeply regrets the severance of a connection rendered most agreeable by mutual confidence and friendship. We are sure the friends of the Banner will cordially unite in the feeling here expressed.

The Editor takes this opportunity of assuring the friends of the Banner that his best efforts will be given to make the matter of the paper more worthy of the improved manner in which it is to be published.

From sources, entitled to the highest confidence, he is assured that his editorial course has on the whole secured the desired approbation. The past must be regarded as, in a great measure, the indication of the future character of the paper. Still, experience is a wise teacher, and the lessons thus derived will, it is hoped, be shown in the steady and progressive improvement of the Banner.

A little exertion, on the part of those who have expressed an interest in this Journal, might greatly extend its circulation and repay the publishers for the additional expense they are about to incur. The editor would also say to his kind friends that, by the new arrangement, he has a direct personal interest in the financial success of the paper. The publishers have been influenced, in part, by the Editor's arguments to incur the risk of purchasing and improving the Banner.

The response which shall be made to the above appeal must determine whether this counsel is wise or injudicious. It was given in dependence upon the prompt and willing assistance of those who are friendly to the Banner of the Cross and to its Editor.

FREDERICK OGILBY.

Philadelphia, Dec. 11th, 1848.

To the Patrons of "The Banner of the Cross"

The undersigned having purchased the "Banner of the Cross," with the outstanding debts, &c., from the former proprietor, James S. Newbold, Esq., and being determined to make such improvement in the appearance of the paper, at the commencement of the new volume, that it may be as neat and attractive in external form as any weekly sheet published in the Union, respectfully request the present subscribers, and all interested in the success of the paper, to aid them in their undertaking.

They have procured entire new founts of type, of the most approved style; and a supply of paper equal to the best used by any newspaper in the country, and will spare no expense in rendering the Banner in every way acceptable to its readers.

In making these improvements, the publishers not only necessarily incur heavy expenses in the beginning of their enterprise, but a continued outlay; and they therefore very respectfully urge upon the subscribers the necessity of early remittances, and an increase of the subscription list.

There is a large sum of money now due the paper, in sums ranging from $2.50 to $10, which, though trifling in themselves, and easily paid by those indebted, constitute, in the aggregate, a large amount, for the want of which the publishers suffer great inconvenience.

The terms will be the same as heretofore, $2.50 per annum in advance, or $3.00 if not paid before the end of the year.

Ten Dollars, in advance, will pay for five copies, giving those interested an opportunity of securing their own paper free of charge, by procuring four subscribers, and remitting their subscription.

The Rev. Frederick Ogilby is to continue, as heretofore, the Editor. This fact the publishers consider a sufficient guarantee that the Banner will faithfully maintain sound Church principles, in the good temper and conciliatory spirit which have won for it the measure of favor it now enjoys.

KING & BAIRD, Publishers.

The following Prayer, to be used in the congregations of this Diocese while the disease called Asiatic Cholera is impending, is put forth in conformity with Canon XLVII, of 1832, of the General Convention of the P. E. Church in the United States.

A. POTTER,

Bishop of the Diocese of Pennsylvania.

Philadelphia, Dec. 12, 1848.

PRAYER.

O God, with whom are the issues of life and death, to whom it justly belongeth to punish sinners, and to be merciful to them that truly repent; save us, we humbly beseech thee, from the ravages of that pestilence with which we are threatened. We have provoked thy righteous judgments by our manifold transgressions and hardness of heart, and though we should utterly perish, our punishment would be less than our sins deserve. But, O God, who desirest not the death of a sinner, but rather that he should turn from his wickedness and live, have pity upon us, thy unworthy creatures, and grant that we, repenting of our iniquities and forsaking our sins, may experience thy forgiving and protecting grace. As thou didst deliver thy people of old when they turned to thee from their rebellion, and didst cause thy destroying angel to cease from punishing, so turn thine anger from us, who meekly acknowledge our vileness, and truly repent us of our sins. Spare those who are now suffering from this grievous sickness, restore the voice of joy and health to their dwellings; and grant that all who shall taste thy forbearing mercy may devote their souls and bodies a living sacrifice to thee, through Jesus Christ our Lord. Amen.

BISHOP DOANE.—As there are some rumors prevailing in this city, and perhaps elsewhere, in relation to the Bishop's health, we feel happy to assure those interested that the disease, from which the Bishop suffered, was of a rheumatic nature.

The report to which we refer supposes the Bishop to have suffered from a paralytic affection. It is entirely without foundation. We have just had the pleasure of spending part of three days in constant intercourse with the Bishop and he never was brighter in mind or, saving a little debility and lameness from his rheumatism, better in bodily health. We subjoin, from the Missionary, the Bishop's own touching notice of his illness.

"THE MISSIONARY, in the month now past, was carried far along the road which none can travel over twice. By God's great blessing on the rarest skill, and unequalled love, his feet were stayed, and re-established, with reviving health and strength. He asks the prayers of all good people, that these mercies from the Lord, which he acknowledges with a devout and humble thankfulness, may be new motives in him to a better service to the Church and kingdom of our Saviour Jesus Christ; and means, through grace, the purchase of the Cross, of meekness, when the grave and gate of death is passed, to await, with Howley, and White, and Hobart, and Jebb, and Rose, and Winslow, in the fields and groves, which shine and wave beyond it, the morning of the Resurrection.

For the unnumbered acts and offices of an unmeasured kindness, which have been brought out by this providence, as for the loving record of it which ensues,*—and chiefly, for the faithful prayers of so many true hearts—most grateful thanks are due. May He, from Whom alone it comes, return it into every beloved bosom, a thousand fold!"

* A notice from the Banner.

CORRECTION.—The intrusion of a "not" by the Printer in our brief editorial answer to "Z" page 383 of the last Banner, spoiled our logic. It should read "we certainly do think that our present method" i. e. of reading the Psalter—originated in the Antiphonal chanting of the Psalms" ergo, there is as much authority, &c.

The construction of some of the Psalms shows that they were intended to be so used, and we know they were thus used in the Temple service.

THE SOUTHERN CHURCHMAN is unusually spirited in its remarks against an article quoted in the Banner from "the English Churchman," on "the improvements in the celebration of Divine Service." So far as the remarks apply to the reference, in the English Churchman, to what is called "the Evangelical party," we frankly own that the censure is just. Christians should never call one another names, especially if they are not all applicable. The word "Evangelical" is of too solemn a meaning to be taken in vain. The English Churchman was therefore wrong in calling that party "Evangelical" which it does not think par excellence worthy of the name. In this use, the sacred term is converted into an opprobrious epithet.

Again, we think it wrong to appear to arrogate to ourselves superior devotion, or to speak contemptuously of the devotion of others. None of us have any cause for boasting. Which party in the Church has been most given to the evil habits of calling names, (such as "Puseyites," "Tractarians," &c. &c.) and of asserting its own claims to piety and devotion, can easily be settled as a matter of fact. Still this does not justify retaliation, "an eye for an eye and a tooth for a tooth!" We do not think the English Churchman intended this. We are fully persuaded that the paragraph objected to was honestly meant as a complimentary admission. Still we do not justify it, and we regret that we did not, as we designed to do, strike out the obnoxious phrase from the excellent article which we quoted as an interesting and instructive piece of intelligence. We did not apply it to the American Church, nor was it written or quoted in reference to things here. The blame of so doing rests upon those who commit the fault.

We regretted that the notice which follows, was sent too late for insertion last week. We have already expressed our feelings on this subject, and we earnestly hope this laudable effort may be crowned with the desired success.

The Ladies of St. John's Free Church, in the Northern Liberties, aided by Ladies of the several City Churches, have been for some time preparing to hold a Sale of Useful and Fancy Articles, for the benefit of the Church.

The immediate objects towards which the proceeds of the Sale will be devoted are, the liquidation of a debt of long standing, and the repairing, painting, and cleansing of the Church.

The above Sale will be held at No. 160 Chestnut street, in one of the new stores lately erected by J. Swaim, Esq., on Tuesday, December 12th, and continue throughout the week.

The co-operation of all who wish well to St. John's Church is affectionately invited. In her necessity she asks for a portion of that liberality which she has ever been ready to extend to others, either by promoting and encouraging the Sale, or in any other way. And may the Grace of our Lord Jesus Christ rest upon all those who wish well to Zion!

St. Bartholomew's Church.

Owing to the late hour at which we received the following notice, we can only prefix a few remarks. The Church which it is designed to build, is to be placed six or seven squares from any neighbouring Church. The position is to be in the midst of a densely built part of the city. The most rapid growth of our city is in that direction, and as much depends upon preoccupation, it is very desirable that new Churches should be erected as soon as possible.

We understand that it is intended to build a plain, substantial, Gothic edifice, and that a large proportion of the pews will be accessible to those of limited means. The Vestry are determined to incur no debt. From the character of the lay gentlemen concerned in this enterprise, and from the zeal and efficiency of the Rector, we may infer that this good beginning will be carried to a successful issue. We are also informed that this Parish has been organized with the approval of the Bishop and several of the most respectable of our clergy.

A meeting of persons favorable to the formation of a new parish of the Episcopal Church, in the neighbourhood of Delaware Fourth street and Franklin Avenue, was held at No. 8 Girard st., on Friday evening, December 8th, 1848, the following gentlemen being present, viz:

Rev. Dr. H. W. Ducachet,	Anthony E. Stocker, M. D.,
Rev. Dr. Morton,	Mr. Charles M. Burns,
Rev. Norris M. Jones,	Mr. Ellis Yarnall,
G. M. Wharton, Esq.,	Mr. Robert M. Lewis, Jr.,
Richd. R. Montgomery, Esq.,	Edward Shippen, Esq.

The Revd. Norris M. Jones, at the request of those present, presented his views of the object for which the meeting was called, stating the great necessity of erecting a Church in the neighbourhood of Delaware Fourth st. and Franklin Avenue. He also gave an outline of his plan for the beginning and completion of the desirable enterprise, and left the matter for the consideration of the gentlemen present.

On motion of G. M. Wharton, Esq., the Rev. Dr. Ducachet was called to the Chair, and Edward Shippen appointed Secretary.

On motion of G. M. Wharton, Esq., it was resolved that it is expedient to organize a new parish, and erect a Church to be located in the neighbourhood of Delaware Fourth street and Franklin Avenue, to be called by the name of St. Bartholomew.

On motion Resolved, That the vestry consist of eight persons, who shall have power to increase their number to twelve if they deem the same expedient.

The following gentlemen were then elected vestrymen, viz:

George M. Wharton, Esq., Anthony E. Stocker, M. D.,
Richd. R. Montgomery, Esq., Mr. Robert M. Lewis, Jr.,
Mr. Chas. M. Burns, Mr. Ellis Yarnall,
Mr. George W. Taylor, Edward Shippen, Esq.

On nomination of Mr. Ellis Yarnall, George M. Wharton, Esq., was elected Chairman of the Vestry, and Edward Shippen, Secretary.

On motion of Dr. A. E. Stocker, the Vestry proceeded to the election of a Rector, whereupon the Rev. Norris M. Jones, was unanimously elected.

The vestry then proceeded to the election of the Accounting Warden, when Geo. M. Wharton, Esq., was duly elected.

On motion, the Accounting Warden was authorized to prepare articles of Association for the signatures of the Vestry and others interested in the object.

On motion, Resolved, That the proceedings of this meeting be published in the Banner of the Cross and the Episcopal Recorder.

On motion, the meeting adjourned to meet again at the call of the Rector.
EDWD. SHIPPEN, Secretary.

A NEW ARTICLE OF FAITH.—The following account tells us that the Catholic Faith has been enlarged. Rev. Hugh McNeile has decided that no man must speak against it! We offer it to the author of any forthcoming Church Dictionary, as a good definition of INTOLERANCE.

UNPLEASANT MISUNDERSTANDING AT LIVERPOOL.—The annual meeting of the Society for Promoting Christianity among the Jews was recently held at Liverpool, the Rev. Dr. McNeile in the chair; and everything went on smoothly, as usual, until the Rev. W. W. Ewbank rose to move an amendment to one of the resolutions. This amendment was to the effect that persons holding views on unfulfilled Jewish prophecy different from those of the Millenarians, should be allowed or invited to address the meeting; at present, the Rev. Mr. Ewbank maintained, the speakers and their remarks were all one-sided. The chairman, however, decisively refused to put the amendment, chiefly on the ground of the dissension which must arise from such a proceeding—of Mr. Ewbank not having made any such proposition when the arrangements were made in committee—and of the fact that these anniversaries were not held for the purpose of discussion at all. The clergymen and most persons present coincided with the chairman, and endeavored to persuade Mr. Ewbank—who was greeted with cries of 'Shame,' 'Turn him out!'—to desist: he would not do so and the meeting was dissolved.—Ch. and State Gaz.

The following is "a Pastoral Letter from the Rector, together with an outline of Sunday, Holy-Day and Daily Services in St. Peter's Parish, Philadelphia.—1848-9."

A Pastoral Letter, from the Rector to the Members of St. Peter's Parish, Philadelphia.

DEARLY BELOVED IN THE LORD:

With the approach of Advent, I present you an outline of the public services which, if God permit, will be celebrated in our Parish Church during the ensuing Ecclesiastical year. You will especially notice that the Lord's Supper will be administered on every Sunday, as well as on the other Holy-days; thus affording frequent opportunities to all such as shall be religiously and devoutly disposed, to receive the most comfortable Sacrament of the Body and Blood of CHRIST. In view of this fact, allow me, most affectionately, to make a few practical suggestions. The public devotional institutions of the Church, whether daily or occasional, whether appertaining to Prayer or Sacrament, are intended for the spiritual edification of all her sincere members, whose circumstances will permit them to enjoy them. They are means of grace, effective agents in strengthening the soul in its warfare with sin, and in sustaining it amid the changes and chances of this mortal life: they are, therefore, to be thankfully used as often as possible. This is eminently true with respect to the Holy Communion. Its nature, benefits, and the qualifications for its reception, as taught by CHRIST himself, are clearly and authoritatively set forth by our Church in her Catechism, and in the Order for the Administration of the Lord's Supper.

It is a means of grace, not a test of exalted Christian sanctity; its benefits are the strengthening and refreshing of our souls by the Body and Blood of CHRIST, not the declaring to the world that we have attained perfection; its requirements are repentance, faith and charity, not the consciousness of sinlessness; its worthy recipients are such as are distrustful of themselves, the burden of whose sins is intolerable, and whose only hope of pardon is centered in the cross of CHRIST; its design is to show forth, not our holiness, but the LORD's death till He come; its dignity requires that its celebration be regarded as the chief act of religious worship, the principal purpose for which Christians meet together on the first day of the week. It is the expressly appointed memorial of our REDEMPTOR's passion; for of this venerable mystery, and of it alone, did He say

"THIS DO IN REMEMBRANCE OF ME."

I am not ignorant, however, that from divers causes, many devout, exemplary Christians are not ready to embrace the privilege of communing once a week, and oftener. As your spiritual Guide and Pastor, earnestly desiring the salvation of all those committed to my charge, I hereby give you my advice.

Let all of you act, as to the frequency of your reception of the Holy Communion, according to your consciences, enlightened by the study of God's word, and the instructions of His Church.

Let such as having considered how great is the benefit, if with a true penitent heart, and lively faith they receive that Holy Sacrament, and how great is the danger if they receive the same unworthily, have yet resolved to examine and judge themselves, let such, I say, gratefully approach God's altar every Sunday, and show forth the LORD's death till He come.

Let such others as conscientiously desire to adhere to their custom of communing once a month, do so with all regularity and devotion; assured that such conscientious action can never be charged with disrespect to the Holy Sacrament on the other occasions when they do not commune. They may either retire, as usual, after the Sermon; or they may remain, and engage in the devotional services, with those who actually commune. Your Pastor regards, with unfeigned affection, all, who acting in the fear of God, shall commune once a month, or once a week; so love ye one another, and the blessing of God shall rest upon you.

Finally, brethren, let us stand fast in one spirit, with one mind striving together for the faith of the Gospel. By daily self-examination, prayer and study of Holy Scripture; by fasting, alms-giving, and the use of the Sacraments; by a life of evangelical faith and charity, let us seek to commend the divine principles of the Holy Catholic Church, and to win through CHRIST's merits, the approval of God the Father.

The time is short; whatsoever our hand findeth to do, let us do it with our might. Amid the trials of Christendom, the distress of nations, the desolations of war, and the ravages of the pestilence, let us lift up our heads, and mark how rapidly "To her funeral pile this aged world is borne."

Let not the riches, the pleasures, nor the cares of this life tempt you to forget God, or to count upon the morrow. The Church's Advent warning again goes forth, hear it with deeper attention than ever heretofore, it is the warning of our Judge—

"TAKE YE HEED, WATCH AND PRAY: FOR YE KNOW NOT WHEN THE TIME IS."

Affectionately, Your Pastor

W. H. ODENHEIMER.

CONFIRMATION on the SUNDAY next before Easter (April 1).

The following is taken from the last English Churchman. We think it connects well with the above.

A GOOD EXAMPLE.—Our obituary (says the Salisbury Herald) contains the name of an individual long known to the frequenters of Salisbury Cathedral—Richard Bright—who, for more than half a century, has regularly attended the daily service therein. For the long period of 65 years, the deceased had been afflicted with blindness—a circumstance which was thus commemorated, about 20 years back, by a distinguished poet, and member of the Cathedral body, the Rev. Canon Bowles:

"There is a poor BLIND MAN, who every day,
In summer sunshine, or in winter's rain,
Duly as tolls the bell to the high fane,
Explores, with faltering footsteps, his dark way,
To kneel before his Maker, and to hear
The chanted service pealing full and clear.

"Ask why, alone, in the same spot he kneels
Through the long year? Oh! the wide world is cold,
As dark to him:—Here, he no longer feels
His sad bereavement—FAITH and HOPE uphold
His heart—He feels not he is poor and blind,
Amid the un pitying tumult of mankind:
As thro' the aisles, the choral anthems roll,
His soul is in the choirs above the skies,
And songs, far off, of angel-companies.

"Oh! happy, if the Rich—The Vain—The Proud—
The plumed Actors in life's motley crowd,— Since pride is dust, and life itself a span,—
Would learn one Lesson from a poor BLIND MAN."

Foreign Intelligence.

We publish this week, says the English Churchman, a letter from the Lord Bishop of GIBRALTAR to His Grace the PRIMATE, urging a special celebration, and thank-offering throughout the English and Colonial Church, as a recognition of the blessing which was vouchsafed to this Church and Nation on that day three hundred years ago, when the reformed Book of Common Prayer came into general use.

His Lordship proposes that the money so collected should be appropriated to Missionary objects, through the agency of the Society for the Propagation of the Gospel in Foreign Parts; and the Church Missionary Society.

The (London) Guardian thus explains the occasion of the above recommendation.

King Edward VI., in the year 1548, issued a commission, consisting of thirteen English divines, with Archbishop Cranmer at their head, for the purpose of preparing a Book of Common Prayer. The commission met at Windsor in May, 1548, and drew up a Book of Common Prayer, which was approved by Convocation, and finally ratified by an act of Parliament in the January following. This book, which is substantially the same as our present Common Prayer Book, was enjoined to be used for all Divine offices from the feast of Whitsunday, 1549. The Bishop of Gibraltar has proposed, in a letter to the Archbishop of Canterbury, that this 300th anniversary should be specially observed as a day of thanksgiving and jubilee in our churches, throughout the whole extent of the British empire, on Whitsunday, 1849.—The Churchman's Almanac.

The Roman correspondent of the Daily News states that the Pope has given his sanction to the marriage of a "Roman spinster" with a Jew, and that the marriage has taken place in the Church of St. Paul.

The election of a Lord Rector of Glasgow University took place yesterday, when Mr. Macaulay was elected by 255 to Colonel Mure's 203. Mr. Macaulay had a majority in all the four nations.

Thirty-two new cases of cholera were reported yesterday to the Board of Health, of which eleven had proved fatal.

The English Churchman concludes a notice of a pamphlet, proposing "Authorized Street Preaching," with the following sensible remarks.

With all our improvements in ecclesiastical matters, we are astonished that there are so few orthodox "preachers for the millions." We have hundreds of barristers who, with the driest possible subject, will in an extemporaneous speech, interest, affect, and even excite, crowds of the most ignorant and lethargic—yet their language and their delivery are seldom undignified. Might not the Clergy, with advantage, "take a leaf out of their book?"

The following extract from the Western Luminary, will convey some idea to what extent the "row" in St. Sidwell's proceeded before the entrance of the mayor and churchwardens, as reported in the proceedings last week:—

"The uproar commenced with a general 'coughing down.' Several persons then moved towards the door, making a great noise in their progress: a young woman went off in a fit of hysterics, uttering loud shrieks, whilst a mob outside besieged the doors of the building. A cry of 'Fire!' was raised, followed by an announcement that the church doors were closed; and a rush was made to burst them open. Some persons cried 'Turn him out!' 'Put out his lights!' In the galleries the uproar was at its height; whistling, the noise of cat-calls, and such cries as are heard in theatres, hurraing, &c, echoed throughout the edifice. Mr. Ingle still persisted to read his text, but was quite inaudible; and the row increased, some of the congregation waving their hats, standing on the seats, jumping over the seats, bawling, roaring, and gesticulating like a mob at an election."

If such a scene had occurred in this country, though we do not think it possible, how eloquently might our friends of the Guardian have discoursed upon, the riotous disposition of Americans!

We think our readers will thank us for republishing at this time, the following admirable advice in relation to the Disease with which this country seems now threatened.

THE CHOLERA.—The following important circular has just been issued by the Royal College of Physicians:—

"The Royal College of Physicians of London, feeling that on the re-appearance of epidemic cholera in England, the public may naturally look to them for advice and guidance, have deemed it proper to appoint a Cholera Committee, composed of physicians, who hold important offices in the metropolitan hospitals, or who had extensive experience of the disease at its last visitation, to consider what measures it is expedient to adopt, with a view of preventing the spread of the disease, and of otherwise mitigating its evils.

"The committee thus formed have, in compliance with the wish of the college, drawn up the following remarks and instructions for the information of the public:

"1st. Cholera appears to have been very rarely communicated by personal intercourse: and all attempts to stay its progress by cordons or quarantine have failed. From these circumstances the committee, without expressing any positive opinion with respect to its contagious or non-contagious nature, agree in drawing this practical conclusion: that in a district where cholera prevails no appreciable increase of danger is incurred by ministering to persons affected with it, and no safety afforded to the community by the isolation of the sick.

"2nd. The disease has almost invariably been most destructive in the dampest and filthiest parts of the towns it has visited. The committee would therefore urge on the public authorities the propriety of taking immediate steps to improve the state of sewers and drains; to cover those which are open; and to remove all collections of decaying vegetable and animal matter from the vicinity of dwellings. They would also impress on individuals, especially of the poorer classes, the great importance of well-airing their rooms, and of cleanliness in both their dwellings and persons.

"3rd. A state of debility or exhaustion, however produced, increases the liability to cholera. The committee therefore recommend all persons during its prevalence to live in the manner they have hitherto found most conducive to their health; avoiding intemperance of all kinds, and especially the immoderate use of ardent spirits and other intoxicating liquors. A sufficiency of nourishing food; warm clothing, and speedy change of damp garments; regular and sufficient sleep; and avoidance of excessive fatigue, of long fasting, and of exposure to wet and cold, more particularly at night, are important means of promoting and maintaining good health, and thereby afford protection against the cholera.

"The committee do not recommend that the public should abstain from the moderate use of well-cooked green vegetables, and of ripe or preserved fruits. A certain proportion of these articles of diet is, with most persons, necessary for the maintenance of health: and there is reason to fear that, if they be generally abstained from, now that the potato crop has in great measure failed, many persons, especially amongst the poor in large towns, will fall into that ill-condition which in its highest degree is known as scurvy, and that they will in consequence be the readier victims of cholera. The committee likewise think it not advisable to prohibit the use of pork or bacon: or of salted, dried, or smoked meat or fish, which have not been proved to exert any direct influence in causing this disease. Nothing promotes the spread of epidemic diseases so much as want of nourishment; and the poor will necessarily suffer this want, if they are led to abstain from those articles of food on which, from their comparative cheapness, they mainly depend for subsistence.

"On the whole, the committee advise persons living in districts in which cholera prevails to adhere to that plan of diet which they have generally found to agree with them; avoiding merely such articles of food as experience may have taught them to be likely to disorder the stomach and bowels.

"4th. The committee are unable to recommend an uniform plan of treatment to be adopted by the public in all cases of looseness of the bowels, supposed to be premonitory of cholera. It is, doubtless, very important that such ailments should be promptly attended to; but since they may arise from various causes, of which a medical man can alone judge, the committee deem it safer that persons affected with them should apply at once for medical assistance, than that they should indiscriminately use, of their own accord, or on the suggestion of unprofessional persons, powerful medicines, in large and frequently repeated doses. Should the looseness of the bowels be attended with feelings of great exhaustion and chilliness, the person should, of course, be placed in a warm bed, and the usual means of restoring warmth to the body be assiduously employed, until professional advice can be obtained.

"5th. In order that the poor may have the means of obtaining such assistance promptly, the committee recommend that the proper authorities should at once establish dispensaries in those parts of the town which are remote from the existing medical institutions; and that they should also take steps to provide distinct cholera hospitals, which it will require some time to organize, and which they believe will be found to be absolutely necessary, should the epidemic prevail in this metropolis with a severity at all approaching that which it manifested on its first appearance in England. The committee wish it to be clearly understood that they do not recommend the establishment of such cholera hospitals on the ground of effecting the separation of the sick from the healthy, and of thus preventing the spread of the disease, but solely in order that should the epidemic prove severe, proper attendance and prompt treatment may be ensured for the sufferers from cholera among the poorest and most destitute class. The existing hospitals, even if the authorities should consent to the admission of persons ill of cholera, could not furnish the requisite accommodation, unless they were shut against persons labouring under other severe diseases, a measure which, at the approach of winter especially, would add much to the distress of the poor.

"6th. In conclusion, the committee would urge on the rich, who have comparatively little to fear for themselves, the great duty of generously and actively ministering to the relief of the poor while the epidemic prevails; bearing in mind that fuel, and warm clothing, and sufficient nourishment, are powerful safeguards against the disease.

"They deem it most desirable that the parish authorities should at once improve the diet, and increase the comforts, of the poor under their charge; and that the wealthy should form societies for the supply of food, clothing, and fuel to those who, though not paupers, still need charitable assistance in the present emergency.

"Such measures, which it is the duty of those possessed of power and wealth to adopt, would, the committee believe, if liberally carried out, deprive the cholera of half its victims.

The Christmas Fund for Disabled Clergymen.

In a late paper we referred to the plain duty, resting upon the Church, of making provision for her disabled Clergy. An opportunity now offers of carrying this good design into effect in Pennsylvania.

It has long been a custom, one sanctioned by holiest association, in this Diocese to appropriate the communion offerings on Christmas day to the relief of the poor and suffering ministers of Christ. Our Convention has wisely given to this practice the authority of its recommendation.

Under the impression that there was little demand for such a fund, the contributions have, of late, been small, not adequate to answer the calls of need. It will be seen from the following report that the expenditure is at present more than double the receipts. We are confident that this fact has only to be known to ensure a sufficient return to meet the wants of those, concerning whom those words of our Saviour are especially applicable. VERILY, I SAY UNTO YOU, INASMUCH AS YE HAVE DONE IT UNTO ONE OF THE LEAST OF THESE MY BRETHREN, YE HAVE DONE IT UNTO ME!

For the Banner of the Cross.

The Trustees of the Christmas Fund respectfully invite the attention of the Clergy of the Diocese to the recommendation of the Convention, that the Communion offering on Christmas day be appropriated to the fund for disabled Clergymen.

In doing this, they would state that the demand on them for aid the present year, has been unusually large, the expenditure being now at the rate of $1150 per annum. The receipts for the same period have been only $500, leaving a large deficiency, which they have been obliged to supply, by the sale of a part of the small investment, reserved to meet contingencies.

It is hoped that the mention of these facts will be sufficient to ensure general and liberal contributions, which should be forwarded to the Treasurer, Thomas Robins, 39 Chestnut street, Philadelphia.

On behalf of the Treasurer,

WM. H. NEWBOLD, Secretary.

BOOKS FOR THE HOLIDAYS.

THE BOOK OF PEARLS; A CHOICE GARLAND OF PROSE, POETRY, AND ART. CONTAINING TWENTY FINELY EXECUTED STEEL ENGRAVINGS. New York: D. Appleton & Co., 200 Broadway. Philadelphia: Geo. S. Appleton, 164 Chesnut street. 1849.

It seems as if the books, already donning their holiday attire, were growing richer and finer as Christmas draws near. The glow of this happy season begins to shed its genial influence upon the world of books, and the windows and shelves of the Booksellers are gleaming in purple and gold.

In the rich array, "the Book of Pearls" sheds no inferior lustre. In external beauty it takes a higher rank than pearls among their kindred precious stones.

The binding exceeds in richness any thing we have yet seen, while the Printer and Engraver have united their forces most happily. Let those who desire a beautiful Holiday gift, before deciding the important question of what shall it be? first go and look at "the Book of Pearls."

THE LADY'S ANNUAL; A SOUVENIR OF FRIENDSHIP AND REMEMBRANCE FOR 1849. With original contributions by Female Writers. Edited by Emily Marshall. Illustrated by 26 engravings. By the same Publishers.

This, though a smaller and much less showy volume, is well suited for those who desire a less expensive gift than the former work.

THE JUVENILE SCRAP-BOOK FOR 1849; A CHRISTMAS AND NEW YEAR'S PRESENT FOR YOUNG PEOPLE. Edited by Grandfather Merryman. With twenty-eight engravings on steel. By the same Publishers.

This is a rich and most tasteful looking gift for the young. We are unable to speak of any thing more than its very attractive appearance.

AUNT FANNY'S CHRISTMAS STORIES is a nice little book for still younger children, by the same Publishers.

FRIDAY CHRISTIAN; OR THE FIRST-BORN ON PITCAIRN'S ISLAND. By a poor "Member of Christ."

A well printed volume, the story of which relates to a subject of great interest.

MANNING'S SERMONS.

Mr. Editor.—Although the admirable sermons of the Archdeacon of Chichester have received universal commendation, still it may not be without use, to add another expression of their peculiar value. Should this brief notice meet the eye of any who have not yet read them, we advise them for their own sakes, instantly to embrace the privilege of securing a copy.

These sermons are the productions of a mind of uncommon penetration, and of exquisite gentleness. Bearing in every paragraph the marks of indubitable scholarship and church feeling, they present the truth in so practical and winning a form, as to find access to the heart of the most prejudiced reader.

In an age of controversy, they will be found to be most consolatory; and in an age of worldliness, most instructive. We would especially commend to the readers of this notice the sermons on "Holiness in Childhood," and "On mixing in the world." The sermon entitled "Short Devotions a hindrance to Prayer," would have pleased us better, had its title been, "Unfrequent Devotions a hindrance to Prayer," and had the distinguished author addressed himself more exclusively to establish the point, that not brevity, but infrequency in Devotion was the great hindrance. The title (and so far as this discourse argues it,) seems somewhat inconsistent with the inspired direction, "God is in heaven, and thou upon earth: therefore let thy words be few;" with Christ's rebuke of the heathen who think "they shall be heard for their much speaking;" and with the fact which Bishop Cosin states, "Catholic Devotion was frequent rather than long. The primitive Christians endeavoured to obey the Apostle's injunction, to 'pray without ceasing,' by prayer, often and earnestly."

But it seems like presumption to venture a criticism on such discourses as are contained in this volume, we apologise therefore for the liberty, and say that the feeblest of Manning's Sermons are equal to the ablest of most other men.

Whilst the thanks of Churchmen are due to the enterprising house of Messrs. Stanford & Swords, for reprinting this volume, their thanks will be more hearty if they are presented with a cheap and accurate reprint of all of Archdeacon Manning's Sermons. We say accurate, for there are, we think, some misprints of importance in the volume before us; such, for example, as on p. 174, where "unostentatious" should be "ostentatious;" and again on p. 100, where the following statement occurs: "It is, true of our blessed Lord alone, that the devil, after he was once fully foiled in his endeavor to seduce Him from God, began thenceforward for ever to oppose and afflict Him." Should not the word "began," be "left off?" for, certainly, the affirmation made in the passage is not true of "our Lord alone." W. H. OGDEN.

THE AGED CHRISTIAN'S COMPANION, CONTAINING A VARIETY OF ESSAYS, ADAPTED TO THE IMPROVEMENT, CONSOLATION, AND ENCOURAGEMENT OF PERSONS ADVANCED IN LIFE. BY THE REV. JOHN STANFORD, D. D. With a Memoir of the Author, by the REV. GEORGE UPFOLD, D. D., Rector of Trinity Church, Pittsburgh, Pa., 2d Edition. New York: Stanford & Swords, 139 Broadway, 1849.

Late notices in the Banner will show that liberal provision has been made for the instruction and entertainment of the young, by our enterprising Publishers. The present is the first work which has come under our editorial notice, designed especially for the aged. Yet, why should their peculiar wants not be cared for? The failing sight requires larger type. The sobered feelings of mature life demand lessons suited to those solemn hours, when the sunset is drawing near and the evening shadows are fast deepening into night.

It seems to have been the desire of Author and Publisher to provide such a work in the "Aged Christian's Companion." It is printed in large and clear letters, and the subjects are admirably well chosen and all treated in a plain, forcible and practical manner. The Author, as we learn from the Memoir, seems to have been governed in the course of a long and active life, by that real benevolence which has something more than words softened by convenient tears to bestow upon human wants and miseries. His feelings led to action, and many useful institutions either originated with him, or were fostered by his devoted care. Not the least attractive part of the work is "the Memoir" by Dr. Upfold. The Author was well acquainted with the venerable subject, whose biography he has penned, and although there was so great diversity in their age, there was great cordiality of feeling in their friendship. We think the Author has shown great skill in this most difficult department of writing.

On the whole, this is an excellent work to present to any aged friend as a Christmas or New Year's gift.

PROPER LESSONS FOR THE SUNDAYS AND HOLY-DAYS THROUGHOUT THE YEAR.

This is a substantially and richly bound volume, in large and excellent type, and in a very convenient form. It is published by Messrs. Stanford & Swords.

The same Publishers have also got up, in rich and attractive form, THE DEVOUT CHURCHMAN'S COMPANION; OR A FAITHFUL GUIDE IN PRAYER, MEDITATION, AND THE RECEPTION OF THE HOLY EUCHARIST. Edited by the Rev. W. H. ODENHEIMER, A. M., Rector of St. Peter's Church, Phila., &c., &c.

This work, in which Bishop Wilson's Sacra Privata are admirably arranged for the uses of devotion, is a most appropriate gift for the Holy Christmas season.

PAGANIZED CHURCH ARCHITECTURE—CROSS STYLES.

MR. EDITOR:—While the Editors of the Episcopal Recorder are piously warning "the conscientious members of our Communion" against the sinful waste of giving such beautiful and costly gifts to God as the Church of St. James the Less, and of the great danger we are in of "being plunged into Popish darkness," and "Medieval superstition," by the revival of Christian architecture amongst us,—they might just as well as not explain to the uninitiated the superior fitness of the heathen architecture of Greece, which is so awfully caricatured by many of our Churches, to edify the Church of God, and to keep it free from all superstitious and idolatrous associations.

I for one have made up my mind that it runs just about the same risk of being Paganized in this way as it does of being Romanized by the beautiful Church structures we owe to the good taste and piety of our forefathers. As the Recorder, however, may not be at leisure to take this matter up just yet, it may be just as well for me to say a few words to your readers about a very conspicuous feature of the style of Architecture I have referred to. I allude to those enormous uncouth doorways which are permitted to disfigure the fronts of more than one half of our city Churches. It can hardly fail to be both edifying and interesting to those who admire them to know how they first came to be connected with the Pagan Temples from which, a la Chinoise, we have most unfortunately, and unmeaningly, copied them. The fact is, like our modern Church basements, they were meant for use, and not for ornament, by the architects who originally designed them. So far from having ever been admired by the Greeks themselves, they were universally regarded by them as an architectural blemish, and only tolerated upon the ground that they were indispensable to the due celebration of certain rites of idolatry. Apart from these they had no meaning whatever, and would never have been thought of by the ancient architects. The portals of Grecian Temples were necessarily made of a colossal size in order to allow sufficient room for the huge and magnificent cars which served upon great festival occasions to expose the sacred statues of Gods, and Heroes, to the gaze and adoration of the people, to pass through them, followed as they always were, by large bodies of Priests, and officials bearing lofty banners, and displaying all the splendid symbols and apparatus of Heathen worship. Such, Mr. Editor, was the highly respectable origin, and the very edifying and significant use of these ancient doorways. Notwithstanding they have again gotten to be so much in vogue with those (to quote a favourite expression of the Episcopal Recorder) "who represent a certain class of novel opinions in the Church," it is yet a well known fact of Ecclesiastical history, that they were highly distasteful to the early Christians, who would not use them in their Churches, but contrived a more suitable kind of entrance, somewhat of the character of the modern porch, in their stead—and this solely upon the ground that they were felt to be too nearly associated with the form of those used in Pagan Temples, and with what was thought to be the worship of devils,—for they found it written in an old path Church Book which they much loved and prized,—"Little children keep yourselves from idols;—Hate even the garment which is spotted by the flesh." Upon such grounds as these the mammoth portal, as well as the whole of the chaste and beautiful columniated Grecian front, came to be discarded by the first Ecclesiologists. It is certainly much to be regretted that the Recorder has altogether forgotten to notice this fact in the course of its learned remarks upon the unfitness of the noble and beautiful Churches in which our English ancestors were accustomed to bend both their hearts and knees to God for either primitive or modern worship. May we not still look forward to its giving us a spare early column or so, showing how unnecessarily squeamish the early Fathers of Ecclesiology were upon such points; and the great superiority, after all, of Heathen architecture over any other for Christian purposes. A writer who has had the sagacity to point out that the Ecclesiastical science of the fifteenth and sixteenth centuries was probably a little different from that of the first three or five, can certainly have no difficulty in proving whatever he likes. An article of this kind might do a great deal in the way of dispelling the narrow-minded and stupid prejudice of some that the Anglican style is at least as rich in Christian expression as that of the old Pagan Greeks; and that the latter is not only ante Christian, but anti Christian too. I do not like to be telling tales out of school, but it will perhaps quicken the Recorder's zeal in this matter to know that some of "the conscientious members of our Communion" it would take under its wing have even now been led so far astray by "the Tractarian spirit of the day" as to be found whispering amongst themselves that the too common practice of turning your back upon the Altar in God's House in order to pray with your face towards the Paganized door-ways, of which I have said so much, would at first sight look almost as superstitious to the primitive Christians, could any of them be by to see it, as the opposite and almost exploded custom of facing the Chancel (even though it should be a fine large one like that of St. James the Less) during the whole time of public worship. It has, also, (the truth must out) been insinuated in certain quarters that were any of the early Christians now alive, they would be quite as much puzzled at seeing Christianity and Pagan Architecture shaking hands, and wedded together, as some of the Recorder's friends recently were to know how the "cross readings" about the Church of St. George, and that of St. James the Less, came to be printed side by side in the same article. People will talk. And now, leaving the Recorder to turn this on dit, as it no doubt will, to the good of the Church, I will take the liberty of asking its charitable and orthodox editors a few simple questions suggested by the foregoing remarks which I have no doubt they will have the politeness to answer for the benefit of such "conscientious members of our Communion" as the "Medieval Architecture" and "a Tractarian spirit of the day" might otherwise "plunge into Popish darkness." People may sneer as they will, but what would become of these poor people if they had not the Recorder to be "a lamp unto their feet" in such times as these? And now for my questions.

1st. How much more decent, and less superstitious, is it to PAGANIZE than to MEDIEVALIZE the Temple of God?

2nd. How much less Evangelical is it to PETRIFY CHRISTIANITY by means of real stone Churches than to LIGNIFY PAGANISM by means of enormous mock wooden doors?

3rd. How much more respectful to God is it to face these doors than His Altar during prayer and the Consecration of the Holy Communion?

4th. What is the probable number of those who have been preserved from the jaws of Romanism by this approved antidote for Popery?

5th. If the esteemed brother who does the withering articles against Ecclesiology, in the Episcopal Recorder, thinks the old Heathen Temples of Greece, big doorways and all, better models for Christian Churches, than the costly and expressive ones which our fathers of the middle ages built in honour of the Triune God—is it not barely possible that he may just now have a beam in his own eye, which must be pulled out before he can hope to see very clearly to take away the mote which is in his brother's eye?

The only answers which can be given to these questions will be of course self-evident to most minds, but the benighted "old path" people for whose information they are put, are a stupid and perverse set, where any thing relating to Evangelical Knowledge, "cross-readings," and cross styles of Architecture is concerned, and must therefore have the truth told them in plain Saxon, and not left to think for themselves. The enlarged charity and known Orthodoxy therefore, of the Episcopal Recorder may soften them down into a better way of thinking, if it will only keep on talking to them a little while longer in a firm tone "without getting at all 'cross,'" but, doing and saying every thing in charity" as heretofore. Such a course steadily persevered in would no doubt do much in the course of time to make some of the leading principles of that paper triumph over those of Churchmen—especially where matters of Christian taste and architecture are concerned.

Rw. J. B. C.

P. S. Some impertinent "old path" people are now and then silly enough to ask why huge sham wooden Bibles are preferred to moderate-sized real ones in some of our anti-ecclesiologist Churches, and how much more rich in symbolical expression these are than such as may be read to the people. Curious calculations too are afloat as to how much the Church of God has been impoverished by St. Mary pouring the oil of Spikenard very precious, upon the Saviour's Feet against the far-sighted, wise, and charitable advice of Judas Iscariot who would have sold it for the benefit of the poor. Some even go so far as to say that this inconsiderate act of Mary, having been preached by the Saviour's especial appointment "for a memorial of her every where throughout the whole world" for more than eighteen hundred years, has in that course of time been blessed by God many thousand fold more to the good of the poor, and to open to them the hearts and coffers of the rich, and even to build them Churches, than if the counsel of Judas Iscariot had prevailed. So too, it is argued that God may, and no doubt will, bless the fine little Church of St. James the Less, in the course of the centuries it seems destined to last, to "put it into the hearts of His faithful people," to do more "for the poor and needy," and even to give Him more sweet Temples of the same kind for His glory and their good, than they would otherwise have done. To be sure a stone Church seems an unlikely instrument to effect this. SO DID THE OIL OF SPIKENARD. At least so argue some of the "conscientious members of our Communion" whom the Recorder has pledged itself to set right. How effectually this might be done, were there any way of getting at the probable number of poor who will be ultimately starved; of the souls which will be finally lost; of the Churches which will not be built; of the African, Chinese, and Kamschatchian missions which will have to fall through, on account of fifteen thousand dollars having been wasted upon a pious gift to the same blessed Redeemer who graciously accepted that of Mary, out at the Falls of Schuylkill? But, Mr. Editor, these Tractarian perverts who have so rudely shocked the delicately strung nerves of your charitable neighbour, do not stop even here. It is said by them that this Church, just as it is, may in the long run do as much more good than the ten rough brick and mortar ones which the Recorder obligingly offers to put up for the same money, as the pious act of Mary has in the long run done more good than if the feet of ten poor people had been anointed instead of the Saviour's, with some commoner kind of ointment for which her costly, and much censured gift might have been exchanged; and again, that as the Saviour said to those who would have held her hand as she poured her pious offering upon His Feet. "LET HER ALONE," so would he now rebuke those who would stay the hands of those who build Him such Churches as that of St. James the Less, were He still with us in the flesh. Such wild and un-orthodox fancies as these are already getting to be firmly rooted in the minds and hearts of such "conscientious members of our Communion" "as walk by faith and not by sight," and the Recorder certainly owes it to the side it has taken to put them down. As the hint comes from one who leans so much the Recorder's way, as I evidently do, I hope it will be taken. As these remarks, Mr. Editor, have, strictly speaking, nothing to do with the principal subject—matter of the foregoing article, and yet ought not to be overlooked,—I have thought it best upon the whole to throw them out to your neighbour in the shape of a postscript.

Pennsylvania.—At a meeting of the Standing Committee of the Diocese of Pennsylvania, held on the 7th inst.,

Testimonials were signed on behalf of the Rev. Rees C. Evans, Deacon, applying to be recommended for admission to the Holy Order of Priests.

Also, at an adjourned meeting, held on the 12th inst.,

Testimonials were signed on behalf of Mr. Wm. White Montgomery, applying to be recommended for admission as a Candidate for Holy Orders. Also, on behalf of the Rev. James A. Woodward, Deacon, applying to be recommended for admission to the Holy Order of Priests.

M. A. DeWOLF HOWE, Secretary.

Philadelphia, December 13th, 1848.

New York.—Episcopal Acts by the Right Rev. the Bishop of Maryland, acting by request of the Standing Committee of the Diocese.

The first Sunday in Advent, December 3, in the morning, in All Saints' Church, New York, the Bishop held an ordination, when he admitted three deacons to the holy order of the Priesthood, viz: the Rev. Richard Whittingham, Jr., of Christ Church, Sag Harbor, Suffolk county; the Rev. Frederick William Shelton, of St. John's Church, Huntington, Suffolk county; and the Rev. Michael Scofield, of St. John's Church, Fort Hamilton, King's county. The morning prayer was said by the Rev. Mr. Eigenbrodt, the Rector of the church. The sermon was preached by the Bishop. The candidates for the Priesthood were presented by the Rev. William Walton, of New York. The Rev. Charles W. Hackley, D. D., of Columbia College, was also present, and together with the Rev. Mr. Walton, and the Rector of the parish, united with the Bishop in the imposition of hands. The Bishop administered the holy communion, and was assisted in the same by the Rev. Dr. Hackley, the Rev. Mr. Walton, and the Rector of the church.

Two persons, belonging to this parish, availed themselves of the same occasion for receiving at the hands of the Bishop the rite of confirmation.

In the afternoon of the same day, in Zion Church, New York, the Bishop preached and confirmed 28 persons. Evening prayer was said by the Rev. Mr. Berry, assisted by the Rector of the church, who read the lessons.

In the evening of the same day, in the church of the Holy Trinity, Brooklyn, L. I., the Bishop preached and confirmed 39 persons. Evening prayer was said by the Rev. Mr. Cox, of New York.

Monday, December 4th, the Bishop held a special ordination in St. John's chapel, New York, on which occasion Mr. John G. Barton was admitted to the holy order of Deacons. Morning prayer was said by the Rev. Richard Cox, of Zion Church, assisted by the Rev. Dr. Huntington, who read the lessons. The Epistle in the office for the holy communion was read by the Rev. Dr. Berrian. The candidate was presented by the Rev. Mr. Eigenbrodt. The sermon was preached by the Rev. Dr. Haight. In the celebration of the Holy Eucharist, the Bishop was assisted by the Rev. Drs. Berrian and Haight, and the Rev. Mr. Walton.

Western New York.—CONFIRMATION.—Bishop DeLancey visited Christ Church, Pittsford, on Sunday, December 3d, where in the morning he preached and administered the holy communion, and in the afternoon he preached, confirmed four persons and delivered an address. The Rev. Mr. Lockwood, the Missionary of the station, read prayers and the confirmation preface, and assisted in the holy communion.

CLERICAL CHANGES.—CORRECTION.—By an oversight the name of the following clergyman has been incorrectly printed.

The Rev. Wm. J. ZIMMER, having accepted a call to Trinity Church, Apalachicola, requests all letters to be sent there.

The Rev. David Clarkson has resigned the charge of St. James' Church, Knowlton, and Zion Church, Belvidere, and has been appointed Missionary of Essex county and that of Morris, P. O. New Providence.

The Rev. Horace L. Edgar Pratt, late of Grace Church, Prattsville, having accepted an invitation to take charge of St. Peter's Church, 20th street, New York, until the first of May next, expects to commence his duties with the second week in Advent.

The Rev. Alexander S. Leonard has received and accepted the unanimous invitation of the Vestry of Emmanuel Church, in this city, to become the Rector of the parish, and will enter upon his duties next Sunday morning.

The Rev. Samuel K. Miller having removed to Port Washington, Washington co., Wis., requests his letters and papers to be directed accordingly.—Gos. Mess.

Advent Hymn.

[The following Hymn, composed by a resident in New Zealand, will be read with interest, as expressing the feelings of a devout mind on witnessing the coincidence of Advent with the summer season of the year.]

The laughing Spring is in her prime,
She danceth through our sunny clime;—
Can this indeed be Advent time
The harbinger of Jesus' birth?
Where are the cold and bleak winds blowing,
The pelting hail, the ceaseless snowing,
The log-piled hearths, all ruddy glowing,
While in each happy home reigns pure and Christian mirth?

In vain I watchful look around
Upon the green and flower-strewn ground;
No icy gems, no frost is found;
But life and beauty beam unfading;—
No friendly bird, with scarlet breast,
Comes shivering now, a welcome guest;
Within the woods the songsters rest
From the bright summer glare where waving boughs are shading.

Meet welcome this, I fondly ween,
Though erst while never by us seen,
For Him of glorious, God-like mien,
The Child for weeping sinners born;—
Meet that at such a wondrous birth
Creation should burst forth in mirth,
And that sea, sky and smiling earth
Should wear their brightest tints on this auspicious morn.

And what though seasons seem to change,
While we o'er land and ocean range,
Our tender Mother doth arrange
The same sweet song to cheer our heart.
She knows that darkling, out of sight,
Sad souls may brood in cheerless night,
Though trees and flowers be bathed in light,
And, 'mid a world of joy, groan 'neath some hidden smart.

Oh! soothing voice, my Mother dear,
Like angels' music on our ear!
With chaste'n'd joy, and reverend fear,
Thy words of peace, in this bright land, come ringing,—
"Glory to God!" thy strains begin,
"And peace to man, though dimm'd with sin,
Good-will tow'rd thee, thy God brings in."
While saints and seraph choirs the same blest news are singing.

Christmas Presents.

A Story for the Holidays.

BY T. S. ARTHUR.

"Didn't he make you a present of anything, Lizzy?" asked Margaret Granger of her cousin, Lizzy Green.

"No, not even of a strawberry cushion," spoke up Lizzy's sister Jane, "that he might have bought for a sixpence. I think he's a right down mean, selfish, stingy fellow, so I do; and if he doesn't keep Lizzy on bread and water when he gets her, my name is not Jane Green."

"I wouldn't have him," said Margaret, jesting, yet half in earnest. "Let Christmas go by and not make his sweetheart a present of the most trifling value! He must have a penny soul. Why Harry Lee sent me the 'Leaflets of Memory,' and a pair of the sweetest flower vases you ever saw. And only comes to see me as a friend. And cousin William made me a present of a splendid copy of 'Mrs. Hall's Sketches,' the most interesting book I ever read. Besides, I received lots of things. Why, my table is full of presents."

"You have been quite fortunate," said Lizzy, in a quiet voice; "much more so than Jane and I, if to receive a great many Christmas presents is to be considered fortunate."

"But don't you think Edward might have sent you some token of good-will and affection in this holiday season, when every one is giving or receiving presents?" asked Margaret.

"Nothing of the kind was needed, cousin Maggy, as an expression of his feeling towards me," replied Lizzy. "He knew I understood their true quality, and felt that any present could have been a useless formality."

"You can't say the same in regard to Jane. He might have sent her the usual compliment of the season."

"Certainly he might," said Jane. "Lizzy needn't try to censure him after this lame fashion. Of course, there is no cause for the omission but meanness—that's my opinion, and I speak it out boldly."

"It isn't right to say that, sister," remarked Lizzy. "Edward has other reasons for omitting the prevalent custom at this season—and good reasons, I am well assured. As to the charge of meanness, I don't think the fact you allege a sufficient ground for making it."

"Well, I do then," said cousin Margaret. "Why, if I were a young man and engaged in marriage to a lady, I'd sell my shoes but what I'd give her something as a Christmas present."

"Yes—or beg or borrow the money," chimed in Jane.

"Every one must do as he or she thinks best," replied Lizzy. "As for me, I am content to receive no holiday gift, being well satisfied that meanness on the part of Edward has nothing to do with it."

But notwithstanding Lizzy said this, she could not help feeling a little disappointed; more perhaps on account of the appearance of the thing than from any suspicion that meanness, as alleged by Jane, had anything to do with the omission.

"I wish Edward had made Lizzy some kind of a present," said Mrs. Green to her husband a day or two after the holiday had passed; "if it had been only for the looks of the thing. Jane has been teasing her about it ever since, and calls it nothing but meanness in Edward. And I am afraid he is a little close."

"Better that he should be so than too free," replied Mr. Green; "though I must confess that a dollar or two, or even ten dollars spent at Christmas in a present for his intended bride, could hardly have been set down to the score of prodigality. It does look mean, certainly."

"He is doing very well."

"He gets a salary of eight hundred dollars, and I suppose it doesn't cost him over four or five hundred dollars to live—at least it ought not to do so."

"He has bought himself a snug little house, I am told."

"If he's done that, he's done very well," said Mr. Green; "and I can forgive him for not spending his money in Christmas presents that are never of much use, say the best you will of them. I'd rather Edward would have a comfortable house to put his wife in than see him loading her down, before marriage, with presents of one foolish thing or another."

"True. But it wouldn't have hurt him to have given the girl something, if it had only been a book, a purse, or some such trifle."

"For which trifle he would have been as strongly charged with meanness as he is now. Better let it go as it is. I doubt he has good reasons for his conduct."

Thus Mr. Green and Lizzy defended Edward, while the mother and Jane scolded about his meanness to their hearts' content.

Edward Mayfield, the lover of Lizzy Green, was a young man of good principles, prudent habits, and really generous feelings; but his generosity did not consist in wasting his earnings in order that he might be thought liberal and open-hearted, but in doing real acts of kindness where he saw that kindness was needed. He had saved from his salary, in the course of four or five years, enough to buy himself a very snug house, and had a few hundred dollars in the Savings' Bank, with which to furnish it when the time came for him to get married. This time was not very far off when the Christmas, to which allusion has been made, came round. At this holiday season, Edward had intended to make both Lizzy and her sister a holiday present, and he had been thinking for some weeks as to what it should be. Many articles, both useful, and merely ornamental, were thought of, but none of them exactly pleased his fancy.

A day or two before Christmas, he sat thinking about the matter, when something or other gave a new turn to his reflections.

"They don't really need anything," he said to himself, "and yet I propose to myself to spend twenty dollars in presents merely for appearance sake. Is this right?"

"Right if you choose to do it," he replied to himself.

"I am not so sure of that," he added, after a pause. And then he sat in quite a musing mood for some minutes.

"That's better," he at length said, rising up and walking about the floor. "That would be money and good feelings spent to a better purpose."

"But they'll expect something," he argued with himself; "the family will think so strange of it. Perhaps I'd better spend half the amount in elegant books for Lizzy and Jane, and let the other go in the way I propose."

This suggestion, however, did not satisfy him.

"Better let it all go in the other direction," he said, after thinking awhile longer; "it will do a real good. The time will come when I can explain the whole matter, if necessary, and do away with any little false impression that may have been formed."

To the conclusion at which Edward arrived, he remained firm. No present of any kind was made to his betrothed, or her sister, and the reader has seen in what light the omission was viewed.

Christmas eve proved to be one of unusual inclemency. The snow had been falling all day, driven into every nook and corner, cleft and cranny, by a piercing north-easter; and now, although the wind had ceased to roar among the chimneys and to whirl the snow with blinding violence into the face of any one who ventured abroad, the broad flakes were falling slowly but more heavily than since morning, though the ground was covered already to the depth of many inches. It was a night to make the poor feel sober, as they gathered more closely around their small fires, and thought of the few sticks of wood or pecks of coal that yet remained of their limited store.

On this dreary night, a small boy who had been at work in a printing-office all day, stood near the desk of his employer, waiting to receive his week's wages, and go home to his mother, a poor widow, whose slender income scarcely sufficed to give food to her little household.

"You needn't come to-morrow, John," said the printer, as he handed the lad the two dollars that were due him for the week's work; "to-morrow is Christmas."

The boy took the money, and after lingering a moment, turned away, and walked towards the door. He evidently expected something, and seemed disappointed. The printer noticed this, and at once comprehended its meaning.

"John," he said kindly.

"The boy stopped and turned round; as he did so the printer took up a half dollar from the desk, and holding it between his fingers, said—

"You've been a very good boy, John, and I think you deserve a Christmas gift. Here's half a dollar for you."

John's countenance was lit up in an instant. As he came back to get the money, the printer's eyes rested upon his feet, which were not covered with a very comfortable pair of shoes, and he said—

"Which would you rather have, John, this half dollar or a pair of new shoes?"

"I'd rather have the new shoes," replied John without hesitation.

"Very well; I'll write you an order on a shoemaker, and you can go and fit yourself," and the printer turned to his desk and wrote the order.

As he handed to John the piece of paper on which the order was written, the lad looked earnestly into his face, and then said, with strongly marked hesitation—

"I think, sir, that my shoes will do very well if mended; they only want mending. Won't you please write shoes for my mother, instead of me?"

The boy's voice trembled, and his face was suffused. He felt that he had ventured too much. The printer looked at him for a moment or two, and then said—

"Does your mother want shoes badly?"

"Oh yes, sir. She doesn't earn much by washing and ironing when she can do it, but she sprained her wrist three weeks ago, and hasn't been able to do anything but work a little about the house since."

"And are your wages all she has to live upon?"

"They are now."

"You have a little sister, I believe?"

"Yes, sir."

"Does she want shoes, also?"

"She has had nothing but old rags on her feet for a month."

"Indeed!"

The printer turned to his desk, and sat and mused for half a minute, while John stood with his heart beating so loud that he could hear its pulsations.

"Give me that order," the man at length said to the boy, who handed him the slip of paper. He tore it up, and then took his pen and wrote a new order.

"Take this," he said presenting it to John. "I have told the shoemaker to give you a pair for your mother, yourself, and your little sister; and here is the half dollar, my boy—you must have that also."

John took the order and the money, and stood for a few moments looking into the printer's face, while his lips moved as if he were trying to speak; but no sound came therefrom. Then he turned away and left the office without uttering a word.

"John is very late to-night," said the poor widow Elliot, as she got up and went to the door to look out in the hope of seeing her boy. Supper had been ready for at least an hour, but she didn't feel like eating anything until John came home. Little Netty had fallen asleep by the fire, and was now snugly covered up in bed. As Mrs. Elliot opened the door, the cold air pressed in upon her, bearing its heavy burden of snow. She shivered like one in a sudden ague fit, and shutting the door, quickly murmured—

"My poor boy—it is a dreadful night for him to be out, and so thinly clad. I wonder why he stays so late away?"

The mother had hardly uttered these words when the door was thrown open, and John entered with a hasty step, bearing several packages in his arms all covered with snow.

"There's your Christmas gift, mother," said he, in a delighted voice; "and here is mine, and there is Netty's!" displaying at the same time three pairs of shoes, a paper of sugar, another of tea, and another of rice.

Mrs. Elliot looked bewildered.

'Where did all these come from, John?' she asked, in a trembling voice, for she was overcome with surprise and pleasure at this unexpected supply of articles so much needed.

John gave an artless relation of what had passed between him and the printer for whom he worked, and added—

'I knew the number you wore, and I thought I would guess at Netty's size. If they don't fit, the man says he will change them; and I'll go clear back to the store to-night but what she shall have her new shoes for Christmas. Won't she be glad! I wish she were awake.'

'And the tea, sugar, and rice, you bought with the half dollar he gave you?' said the mother.

'Yes,' replied John; 'I bought the tea and sugar for you. They're your Christmas gift from me. And the rice we'll all have to-morrow. Won't you make us a rice pudding for our dinner?'

'You're a good boy, John—a very good boy,' said the mother much affected by the generous spirit her son had displayed. 'Yes, you shall have a rice pudding. But take off your wet shoes, my son—they are all wet—and dry your feet by the fire.'

'No, not till you put Netty's shoes on to see if they fit her,' replied John. 'If they don't fit, I'm going back to the store for a pair that will. She shall have her new shoes for Christmas. And mother, try yours on—may be they won't do.'

To satisfy the earnest boy, Mrs. Elliot tried on Netty's shoes although the child was sleeping.

'Just the thing,' she said.

'Now try on yours,' urged John.

'They couldn't fit me better,' said the mother, as she slipped on one of the shoes. 'Now take off your wet ones, and dry your feet before the fire, while I put the supper on the table.'

John, satisfied that all was right, did as his mother wished, while she got ready their frugal repast. Both were too much excited to have very keen appetites. As they were about rising from the table after finishing their meal, some one knocked at the door. John opened it, and a gentleman came in and said, familiarly—

'How do you do, Mrs. Elliot?'

'Oh—how do you do Mr. Mayfield? Take a seat; and she handed her visitor a chair.

'How has your wrist got, Mrs. Elliot? Are you 'most ready to take my washing again?'

'Its better, I thank you, but not well enough for that; and I can't tell when it will be. A sprain is so long getting well.'

'How do you get along?' asked Mr. Mayfield. 'Can you do any kind of work?'

'Nothing more than a little about the house.'

'Then you don't earn anything at all?'

'No, sir—nothing.'

'How do you manage to live, Mrs. Elliot?'

'We have to get along the best we can on John's two dollars a week.'

'Two dollars a week! You can't live on two dollars a week, Mrs. Elliot; that is impossible.'

'It's all we have,' said the widow.

Mr. Mayfield asked a good many more questions, and showed a very kind interest in the poor widow's affairs. When he arose to go away, he said—

'I will send you a few things to-night, Mrs. Elliot, as a Christmas present. This is the season when friends remember each other, and tokens of good will are passing in all directions. I think I cannot do better than to spend all I designed giving for this purpose, in making you a little more comfortable. So when the man comes with what I shall send you, you will know that it is for you. Good night. I will drop in to see you again before long.'

And ere Mrs. Elliot could express her thanks, Mr. Mayfield had retired.

No very long time passed before the voice of a man speaking to his horse, was heard at the door. The vehicle had moved so noiselessly on the snow-covered street, that its approach had not been observed. The loud stroke of a whip handle on the door caused the expectant widow and her son to start. John immediately opened it.

'Is this Mrs. Elliot's?' asked a carman, who stood with his leather hat and rough coat all covered with snow.

'Yes, sir,' replied John.

'Very well; I've got a Christmas present for her, I rather think; so hold open the door until I bring it in.'

John had been trying on his new shoes, and had got them laced up about his ankles just as the carman came. So out he bounded into the snow, leaving the door to take care of itself, and was up into the car in a twinkling. It did not take long, with John's active assistance, to transfer the contents of the car to the widow's store-room, which had been for a long time wanting in almost every thing.

'Good night to you, madam,' said the carman, as he was retiring, 'and may to-morrow be the merriest Christmas you ever spent. It isn't every one who has a friend like yours.'

'No—and may God reward him,' said Mrs. Elliot, fervently, as the man closed the door and left her alone with her children.

And now the timely present was more carefully examined. It consisted of many articles. First, and not the least welcome, was half a barrel of flour. Then there was a bag of corn meal, another of potatoes, with sugar, tea, rice, molasses, butter, etc.; some warm stockings for the children, a cheap, thick shawl for herself, and a pair of gum shoes—besides a good many little things that had all been selected with strict regard to their use. A large chicken for a Christmas dinner, and some loaves of fresh Dutch cake for the children, had not been forgotten. Added to all this was a letter containing five dollars, in which the generous donor said that on the next day he would send her a small stove and half a ton of coal.

Edward Mayfield slept sweetly and soundly that night. On the next day, which was Christmas, he got the stove for Mrs. Elliot. It was a small, cheap, and economical one, designed expressly for the poor. He sent it with half a ton of coal.

Three or four days after Christmas, Mrs. Green said to Lizzy and Jane, as they sat sewing—

'I declare, girls, we've entirely forgotten our washerwoman, poor Mrs. Elliot. It is some weeks since she sent us word that she had sprained her wrist, and could not do our washing until it got well. I think you had better go and see her this morning. I shouldn't wonder if she stood in need of something. She has two children, and only one of them is old enough to earn anything—and even he can only bring home a very small sum. We have done wrong to forget Mrs. Elliot.'

'You go and see her, Lizzy,' said Jane. 'I don't care about visiting poor people in distress; it makes me feel bad.'

'To relieve their wants, Jane, ought to make you feel good,' said Mrs. Green.

'I know it ought; but I had rather not go.'

'Oh, yes, Jane,' said Lizzy; 'you must go with me. I want you to go. Poor Mrs. Elliot! who knows how much she may have suffered?'

'Yes, Jane, go with Lizzy; I want you to go.'

Jane did not like to refuse positively, so she got ready and went, though with a good deal of reluctance. Like a great many others, she had no taste for scenes of distress. If she could relieve a want by putting her hand behind her and not seeing the object of penury, she had no objection to doing so; but to look suffering in the face was too revolting to her sensitive feelings.

When Lizzy and Jane entered the humble home of the widow, they found every thing comfortable, neat and clean. A small stove was upon the hearth, and though the day was very cold, diffused a genial warmth throughout the room. Mrs. Elliot sat knitting; she appeared extremely glad to see the girls. Lizzy inquired how her wrist was, how she was getting along, and if she stood in need of anything. To the last question she replied—

'I should have wanted almost everything to make me comfortable, had not Mr. Mayfield, one of the gentlemen I washed for before I hurt my wrist, remembered me at Christmas. He sent me this nice little stove and a load of coal, a half barrel of flour, meal, potatoes, tea, sugar, and I can't now tell you what all—besides a chicken for our Christmas dinner, and five dollars in money. I'm sure he couldn't have spent less than twenty dollars. Heaven knows I shall never forget him! He came on Christmas eve, and inquired so kindly how I was getting along; and then told me that he would send me a little present instead of to those who didn't really need anything, and who might well forgive him for omitting the usual compliments of the season. Soon after he was gone, a man brought us a car load of things, and on Christmas day the stove and the coal came.'

Jane looked at Lizzy, upon whose face was a warm glow and in whose eyes was bright light.

'No, I thank you kindly, not now. I am very comfortable. Long before my coal, flour, meal and potatoes are out, I hope to be able to take in washing again, and then I shall not need any assistance.'

'Forgive me, sister, for my light words about Edward,' Jane said, the moment she and Lizzy left the widow's house. 'He is generous and noble-hearted. I would rather he had done this than made me a present of the most costly remembrance he could find, for it stamps his character. Lizzy you may well be proud of him.'

Lizzy did not trust herself to reply, for she could think of no words adequate to the expression of her feelings. When Jane told her father about the widow—Lizzy was modestly silent on the subject—Mr. Green said—

'That was nobly done! There is the ring of the genuine coin! I am proud of him!'

Tears came into Lizzy's eyes as she heard her father speak so warmly and approvingly of her lover.

'Next year,' added Mr. Green, 'we must take a lesson of Edward, and improve our system of holiday presents. How many hundreds and thousands of dollars are wasted in useless souvenirs and petty trifles, that might do a lasting good if the stream of kind feelings were turned into a better channel.—Godey's Lady's Book, for December.

Foreign Correspondence.

Niton, Isle of Wight, Oct. 23, 1848.

SECOND LETTER FROM THE ISLE OF WIGHT.

Up the hill we go, along a way that is never disturbed by carriages, over the stiles and through the gates, and in a few moments we are transferred from that scene of quiet beauty into one where Nature outdid herself in her wildest freaks. Here begins the Undercliff. That does not need so much explanation. It means under the cliff; for, from this spot to Blackgang Chine, about six miles, there rises a precipice or rocky wall, sometimes six hundred feet above the level of the sea, larger, longer, more varied than the Palisades of the Hudson, and about three quarters of a mile from the sea. In this breadth is comprehended every variety of charm and wonder, from the most cultivated rural residence of a noble lord, down or up to the very wildest scene in nature. Imagine, if you can, the springs below, and the helping sea, washing away the blue clay upon which these lofty hills stand, until some morning the astonished peasant beholds fields, rocks, trees, cottages, all in motion. A part of the hill, twenty, eighty, or one hundred acres, cleaves itself off from the rest, which towers towards the clouds, and moving towards the sea, sinks down perhaps one hundred feet. Conceive the wild work there is here. Rocks, trees, every thing thrown into the wildest confusion, and there they stand as they were thrown at Niton, in 1799; at Luccombe in 1810, and 1818. There is not a possible feature wanting in this wonderful landscape. Here a cultivated and smiling valley, standing upon the ledge that overhangs the sea far below, and frowned upon by a giant cliff, rising up, hundreds of feet, straight towards the sky. You may walk in this cultivated valley, and in a moment you come upon a huge rock, whose horizontal fissures are twin-brothers to those which still stand above you, but which are now turned at all angles to the horizon, or at a perpendicular to their old position. Hills covered with verdure now, that once fell down from the hills above; huge knolls, that are sunk half way along the face of their still unmoved brethren; trees, growing by thousands from the cleft rocks, like that solitary one on the old road from Providence to Boston; others sprouting out from the side of the cliffs, almost horizontally, and still others again, whose roots twist around and band the rocks together. Here huge 'founders,' or large rocks, which have rolled down from the hills, or been broken from the side of the cliffs, and come thundering towards the sea; trees overturned here, and rocks stopped in their mad career by stronger trees there; nooks of ivy-grown rocks, amid cultivated fields; every thing, in short, beautiful, sublime, grand, grotesque, picturesque; I say, every thing that I can imagine, is here grouped together. I tried to note down the thousand features, but gave up in despair, as my friend G—, the German painter, at my request, attempted to take down the notes of the nightingale at noonday, in the shady Italian groves of Albani, and abandoned the task in despair. How low and distant came the sound of the oars in the tiny cock-boats, below upon the placid sea; and how, on the next day, the misty, and beclouded, and angry ocean thundered, and the trees, along the sides of the trembling cliffs, that every instant seemed to threaten the landscape below, roared in sympathy. It was hard to tell which was the angry war of the sea lashing the beach, and which the mighty wind, travelling in his strength along the tops of the trees, and sweep with such fury through the steep and winding pathway, cut through the face of the precipice, that I almost trembled at my rashness in venturing the hazardous enterprise. And had not the wind been blowing in from the shore, I might have been swept at one of the little narrow passages, from the narrow steps over the brow of the cliffs, into the awful abyss below. But the happy valleys lie below in their snug recesses, and these mighty giants protect them, on every side, from every wind, except the warm breezes that blow from the south. Hence they should be the home of the invalid; and no wonder that Dr. Clark, in his work on the 'Influence of Climate,' says, 'It is matter of surprise to me, after having fully examined this favored spot, that the advantages it possesses, in so eminent a degree in point of shelter and exposition, should have been so long overlooked in a country like this whose inhabitants, during the last century, have been traversing the globe in search of climate.' The Isle of Wight is the garden of England and the British Madeira. It enjoys constant and refreshing breezes from the sea; the face of the island is dry and cultivated; in open situations the air is clear, sharp, and bracing; in sheltered nooks it is mild and pure, as the high downs and chalky cliffs are dry, and there are no marshes, and by less than five minutes' walk, you can at any time completely change the air. You may breakfast in a deep valley, and in fifteen minutes be on a cliff, at the height of 600 feet above the sea. You may see almost all the ships that sail through the British Channel, and, alas! when the wild billows are lashed into fury, you may see a ship, like the ill-fated Clarendon in 1836, dashed to pieces upon the rocky shores. Twenty-four out of twenty-seven souls, perished in the neighborhood of the Blackgang Chine.

But I have exhausted your patience, though I can never exhaust the subject. So I must pass hastily from the cliffs, where I look down some hundreds of feet, laying myself along on the ground by the perilous edge, or passing swiftly on the secure pathway, which overhangs the road and the carriages below. Below them, again, is another footpath for travellers, and on the edge of that precipice far below the road below me, the boys are letting themselves down to pull the rooks' nests out of the clefts of the rocks, with long poles and fish-hooks. Below them, again, is the scene of wild beauty, terror, and grandeur, occasioned by the rocks which flew about like hail-stones in the last landslip. And on the edge of this and far below, still, is another precipice; and here the peasant can thrust his iron bar into the earth, and letting himself down by a rope, hang in the air, 'gathering samphire, awful trade.' And below him, again, with unfathomable depths and on a bold shore, roll in sullen majesty the ceaseless billows of the everlasting sea. Here comes the little church of St. Lawrence, beyond St. Lawrence well, where a sheltered grot offers the traveller shelter, a seat, and a cool, refreshing draught, running out from the ornamented marble. The church was, if it be not, the smallest in Great Britain. Is there a smaller in the world? I could not stand up, without my hat, under the eaves. It was, twenty-five, and is, since six years ago, forty-feet long, and as the good old clerk, so polite and obliging, told me, just eleven feet and half an inch broad. The clergyman looks as if he might touch almost all his congregation from the desk, which is pulpit too, as there is not room for both. So he puts his surplice on the side of the desk, and stands up again in the gown. He is careful, though a short man, not to hit his head against the old rafters of this sweet little church; for it is quite a little jewel of the times of the crusaders, as it was built in 1197. When I went into a seat, the clerk handed me a Prayer Book out of his desk, and when I knelt on the stone floor, my feet extending across the single aisle, he reached me a cassock through the door of the same place. He was very kind to me, I am sure; though he says Miss Sedgwick, to whom he was equally polite, says in her book that 'the understanding of the clerk was about the size of the church.' 'I am sure,' continued the kind old man, 'she says so, for I have the book at home. I gave half a crown for it.' Now, as Miss Sedgwick has had her turn, I think it is only fair to give this good old man of seventy-five his turn, too, before he dies. If people will continue, for the sake of a witty expression, to say unkind things of people who are kind to them, they will, of course, be quite ready to hear what reply the old clerks and others make in such cases. So said the old man, with a remark or two which I will not repeat, but which was quite appropriate, about the hundred new seals which had sprung up and produced very wise people since that little church was very old. 'So if you meet Miss Sedgwick, and you find she has any understanding to spare, I shall be thankful for it, and will try to make room for it all."

Bonchurch village is a beautiful rustic spot, full of a variety of charms, perhaps surpassing all the rest, and I enjoyed the view from Legh Richmond's Pulpit Rock, a lone cliff, before I clambered up the steep sides and to the very top of St. Boniface's Down, and then wondered how I ever found my way to Ventnor. The beauties of Steephill and St. Lawrence I shall not stop to describe, and the pen which has already wearied you would fall powerless before the loveliness and wildness of the way by the road, or up "Cripple Path," and along the brow of the cliff to Niton. Here I thought all had been seen; but when I came to Blackgang Chine, I must confess I was overpowered by a scene of awful, almost fearful and terrific sublimity. A mighty chasm by the sea, and reaching back a mile from the ocean, with blackened sides, bare of all vegetation and guarded on each hand by a wall of earth rising up 600 feet from the dell above the level of the sea, and at the back stands the same rocky face of the mountains lost in the clouds. The rain ceased, the wind fell, the sun looked out, and a beautiful rainbow rested one curve upon the ocean, and one upon the hill, while the king of day with broad, full disk, sank into the mighty waters, and I lingered upon the spot till darkness fell, and no vision that I ever saw came so near as this to the descriptions by the poets of Erebus. Nay, it surpassed all my conceptions derived from their descriptions, as far as it excelled in terrible sublimity the Lake of Avernus and the Sybilline grotto, and I am not ashamed to confess, that, however difficult the ascent from this fearful spot, I did not cease to urge my way onward, till I saw once more the cheerful taper and the enlivening face of man.

ARRETON, Oct. 26th.—I am again compelled to dispatch this letter, without reading it over since it was written. But though it may be full of errors, I will venture to send it, as a transcript at least made upon the spot, of the feelings with which I have looked upon some of the beauties of this celebrated, but not half-famous enough Island. I could support my opinion by extracts from several books upon the Isle of Wight which I have seen since writing this letter. But time does not permit this; I conclude by simply warning your readers not to lay any thing in this letter to the score of my enthusiasm, as I am sure words cannot reach the reality. Yours, J. C. MR. EDITOR:

Rev W. O. Williams

I have carefully read the extract you commend from Sacerdos, in relation to Chanting the Psalter, and though sorry to differ from you, I am obliged to say that I do not find it "perfectly conclusive." On the contrary, he in my judgment defeats his own cause.

Sacerdos asserts that "the rubrical term 'say' is the antithesis to 'sing,' whilst the term 'read' comprehends either saying or singing!" And upon this assertion he founds his principal arguments.

To make this assertion available it is necessary for Sacerdos to show that the American reviewer of the Prayer Book had his rubrical view of the words read, say and sing; which he gives some examples to prove, all but one of which is drawn from the English Prayer Book, which the American reviewers were altering for the Church of the United States, and unfortunately for Sacerdos and the lovers of chanting, they, the reviewers, struck from the rubrics of our church, the very words he quotes. He says "The English Rubric directs 'The Psalter shall be read,' whilst another rubric, in the Daily Prayer, relating to the Psalter, directs, 'Then shall be said or sung the Psalms in order as they are appointed.'"

"It is evident therefore that the term 'read,' which our (and the English) Prayer Book retains in the rubric, 'The Psalter shall be read,' means saying or singing."

That which appears 'evident' to Sacerdos is not by any means so clear to me: he would have us believe that the compilers of the English Liturgy introduced an additional rubric to allow what in his opinion the first, 'The Psalter shall be read,' permitted! To me it appears that the introduction of this 'rubric in the Daily Prayers' shows that the compilers were ignorant of Sacerdos' synonyme, and knew that the first rubric would be understood as it was written, consequently a second rubric became necessary if chanting the Psalter was to be permitted.

The American reviewers, it may be seen, give no farther directions in the daily service, than the first named rubric, except designating when "shall follow a portion of the Psalms as they are appointed." Said or sung, it will be noticed, finds no place in the rubric; the first, 'shall be read,' was all sufficient.

But farther; if the American reviewers understood 'read' to mean 'sing,' what are we to think of their judgment in directing 'the minister (not the choir) shall begin the Morning Prayer by reading (singing) one or more of the following sentences of Scripture.' 'Then shall be read (sung) the — lessons.' And some clergyman, who possesses more music than discretion, may quote Sacerdos to show that he has a perfect right to sing the whole communion service because it is written 'then shall follow the collect for the day, except when the communion service is read.' No, no, Sacerdos must be wrong, our reviewers could not have understood the term 'read' to mean singing.

The American rubric for Thanksgiving day is referred to, to prove that the American reviewers, 'in constructing new rubrics, as well as in retaining old ones, adhered to the Ecclesiastical, and not (the) popular standard of rubrical terminology.' The rubric reads thus, 'then shall be said or sung one of the selections, or some other portion of the Psalms at the discretion of the minister.'

There can be no question as to the opinion of the reviewers on the propriety of chanting a 'portion of the Psalms' selected by the minister for Thanksgiving day. But what else does it prove? It proves to me conclusively that they have confined the chanting of the Psalter to that day alone, for, as I before stated, they had already altered an old rubric on the subject, in the daily service, for one of two causes; either because they thought chanting inexpedient for the American Church, or they took Sacerdos' view of 'the Psalter shall be read,' and understood read to mean sing. That they did not take this view, however, is made plain, by the very fact of their introducing the word 'sung,' in this new rubric, for it would be useless to reiterate former directions. The first rubric in the 'form of Prayer and Thanksgiving,' it should be remembered, directs 'the service shall be as usual, except where it is hereby otherwise appointed.' Two of these appointments should be noticed in conjunction. The allowing of the minister to select the portion of the Psalms and the permission for the same to be sung, both new in our Prayer Book, and introduced judiciously to complete a peculiar service.

A day of general Thanksgiving differs in the eye of the Church from all other days of worship, hence a service is required deviating us before mentioned from established usage, for although we have constant cause to give thanks to Almighty God, yet as fruitful seasons do not invariably follow each other, and as war and pestilence is not always confined to other shores, so we have times and seasons which require a different Psalm of Thanksgiving: times in which the heart cannot be tuned to melody; and seasons in which we desire to 'take the Psalm, bring hither the lute. Blow up the trumpet in the new moon, even in the time appointed, and upon our solemn feast day.'

So the American reviewers have done wisely in allowing the minister to select, and the people to sing, on this annual festival.

But we have another new rubric not referred to by Sacerdos. It is as follows:

"Then shall be read the Gospel (the people all standing up) saying, The Holy Gospel is written in the — chapter of — beginning at — verse.

Here the people shall say,
"Glory be to Thee, O Lord."

How does this rubric agree with Sacerdos' rule of interpretation? 'The popular sense' here appears to be that 'say' means sing, for it is almost a universal practice to sing this response; upon what authority it is difficult to discover, unless they assert that 'say' in the rubrical sense means read, or sing. In that case I must quote Sacerdos and reply: 'The rubrical term 'say' is antithesis to sing;' which assertion, without any question is a truism often overlooked by men of good musical voices.

Let me correct one of Sacerdos' examples and I am done. He states that "one rubric in the Church of England Prayer Book (from which our Prayer Book takes the rubric about reading the Psalter) declares that 'the creed of St. Athanasius is appointed to be read,' whilst another rubric declares 'it shall be said or sung.'"

I have looked in vain, through the morning and evening service as printed in a copy of the Church of England Prayer Book in my possession, for the rubric which directs either of the creeds to be 'read.' The Nicene creed, which is placed in the communion service, has no directions whatever, the others in the morning and evening prayer are directed to be 'said or sung.' Consequently there cannot be any inference drawn from this in favour of chanting the Psalter; but the rubric introduced by our reviewers in relation to the creeds, completely overthrows the position, that they, the Reviewers, understood 'read' to comprehend singing.

In the Daily Prayer, the creeds are directed to be said. The word said I understand Sacerdos to admit is opposite to sing, consequently the creeds cannot be sung! Now there is a rubric in the communion service, which directs, "Then shall be read the Apostles' or Nicene Creed, unless one of them hath been read immediately before in the morning service."

If 'then shall be read,' means then may be sung! what is to be done with the 'read,' which refers to what has passed in the morning service, and with Sacerdos' Rubrical Dictionary?

PRINCIPLE.

To the above "Sacerdos," at the editor's request, has furnished the following brief reply:

In reply to "Principle," we shall notice four points.

1st. "The English Prayer Book, which the American reviewers were altering for the Church of the United States."

Answer. That "Principle" is wrong, in supposing that these alterations were intended to reprobate Chanting the Psalter, we refer him to the words of one of those reviewers, the venerable Bishop White, quoted at large in a late number of the Banner. — page 371

2d. "Sacerdos must be wrong, our reviewers could not have understood the term read to mean singing."

Answer. Bishop White will stand good for what the reviewers understood: whilst Sacerdos need not be wrong, for he never affirmed that the term "read" meant exclusively "to sing." What he affirmed, and sought to prove, was that it meant "to say or sing." The chief error in the articles by Principle and Z, consists in their forgetfulness of this definition. If devotion, good taste, reason, or legitimate Episcopal authority should forbid a minister to sing any portion of the service appointed to be "read," let him be thankful for the interposition; let him take the alternative, and "say" the service.

3d. "Some clergyman, who possesses more music than discretion, may quote Sacerdos to show that he has a perfect right to sing the whole communion service."

Answer. We should not be surprised to learn from those who have attended to such matters, that clergymen, possessed of as much discretion (and more music) as either Principle or Sacerdos, had exercised their right of doing this very thing; and that, too, without quoting so poor an authority as Sacerdos. But forasmuch as the hypothesis is, a clergyman having more music than discretion, we reply; that in case such a one should determine to sing the whole communion office, we should address our arguments to his musical, rather than to his rubrical faculty: assured that if we could not convince his ear that it was better to say than to sing certain parts of the communion office, we certainly could not convince his eye, which plainly saw the rubric that this office was to be "read."

4th. "Let me correct one of Sacerdos' examples, and I am done."

Answer. When Sacerdos is corrected, he, too, will be done. Principle will find the rubric, (which "he looked in vain for through the morning and evening service of a Church of England Prayer Book in his possession,") prefixed to the creed in the Morning Prayer. It closes with this language.

"Such day as the creed of St. Athanasius is appointed to be read."

Now in the rubric prefixed to the Athanasian creed itself, this term "read" is defined to mean "sung or said." It is, therefore, perfectly conclusive, Principle's dictionary to the contrary notwithstanding, that "read" means to "say or sing."

"Bishop White Parish Library Association."

We learn with deep regret, that the receipts of the above named association, (among the very best in our Church) are inadequate to supply the numerous applicants for books.

Having associated much with the various denominations of Christians, the inquiry has often been made, "if your Church wants money, why do you not ask for it? We do; and are always sure to obtain it!" The liberal donations, and large collections, made in this city, and elsewhere; evince the truth of the assertion. Ought we to be surprised, when other sects accuse us of being cold, heartless, and formalists? For is it not written, "By their fruits ye shall know them." "Faith without works is dead."

When will Churchmen arouse from their slumbers? Ought we not to have the honest pride, to make an effort, in order that our clergy may begin enlightened well-informed body of men? Or do we wish them to remain in darkness visible to all? Many of our estimable clergy, cannot purchase a single volume, without depriving their families of some necessary article of food or clothing!

"And neither help nor hope appear.

Their minds to soothe, their hearts to cheer!"

As this is the season, when the hearts of Christians are more inclined to deeds of mercy, charity, and kindness; we will hope that every zealous, generous churchman, will send the price to the treasurer of from one to fifty volumes, (according to his ability.) The money will be most economically, and judiciously spent, as testified by Bishop Potter; who approves of the standard works, distributed by the association.

We, who love our venerable Church, should feel it to be not only a duty, but a privilege, to aid this society; as we are exempted from the fatigues necessarily attendant upon the business transactions, which are wholly attended to by a few energetic females. And it is truly astonishing how much has been done with the small sums they have obtained! "Not every one that saith unto me, Lord, Lord, shall enter into the kingdom of heaven; but he that doeth the will of my Father who is in heaven."

As our Bishops must be anxious to be surrounded by an enlightened and useful clergy, we would respectfully suggest to them, that in their visitations, (and also to the other clergy, residing in those states, to which the books are more particularly appropriated) whether, the usefulness of the association may not be materially increased, by bringing the subject before their congregations? For even in this city, there are very many Episcopalians, who are entirely ignorant of the existence of such a society. "While we have time, let us do good to all men, but especially unto them that are of the household of faith."

Those who are not Churchmen at heart, when reading this, may lengthen the face, elevate the eyebrow, purse the mouth, and murmur, "the calls are so numerous;" "there are so many claims." We would merely inquire, whether if they have any hesitancy in unclasping the purse, when called upon for superfluous luxuries for their families, or personal indulgences for themselves? I trow not. "Be not deceived, God is not mocked! Whatsoever a man soweth, that shall he reap."

Churchmen, let not the crimson blush of conscious neglect dye your cheeks at that great day, when the tocsin is sounding. "Give an account of thy stewardship!"

Should we not fear to withhold from God a part of the bounty he has so liberally bestowed upon us?

At the close of a sermon preached by the late venerable Bishop White, for a charitable purpose; he remarked, "the preacher congratulates you, upon the opportunity you now have to contribute; and hopes that each will lay upon the altar what he would do, if the eye of the Omnipotent was visible." What an appeal! Let us each profit by it. "Whatsoever thy hand findeth to do, do it with all thy might quickly, for thou knowest not what a day may bring forth."

THE WORLD.—Think how little the world can do for you, and what it doth, how deceitfully; what slings there are with its honey; what farewell succeeds its welcome; when this Jael brings you milk in one hand, know, she hath a nail in the other.—Bishop Hall.

CHRISTMAS PRESENTS.—The first selection, of which the above is the title, calls for a few remarks. We have not published it understanding that the moral of the story altogether condemns the time-honored custom of bestowing gifts at this sacred season upon friends. We esteem, as worthy of reverence, every practice which tends to foster the social affections. These should glow with greatest warmth in hearts wherein Divine love has kindled its vestal fire. Though this "holy flame forever burneth," it has periods of increased brightness. Such are those seasons, richly filled with glorious thoughts of that eternal love from which the most blessed affections have their life. And Christmas, "Merry Christmas," as they called it, when mirth was not esteemed profane, is the chief fountain-head, whence the fullest and brightest tide of these chrystal waters have their source. As the star which guided the shepherds to Bethlehem is love's brightest epiphany, so in the memorial season of this marvellous event human affection should have its happiest manifestation. And as we think, with "the joy and peace of believing," of God's great gift to man, we should be moved to express our feelings in tokens of affection to each other.

There is a significance in this custom, which should be kept in mind. Parents, as they gladden the hearts of their children with Christmas gifts, should teach them the meaning of these pleasing symbols. They speak of that heavenly Father's love who gave His only begotten Son, as a CHRISTMAS GIFT, to bless a lost and ruined world. They remind us of that ever blessed One, who gave the most precious "gifts unto men."

Surely then, gifts which have such a meaning, should not be restricted to our own family circle. There are other various objects which claim our generous munificence. We should strive to extend the joy which gladdens our own homes. The dwellings of the poor should be cheered, as well as the abodes of the wealthy.

Hearts, in which the love of God has been kindled, will rejoice to think, that their bounty has blessed earth's less favored children. Few there are, who need forget their own friends, while they remember, in their Christmas gifts, those whom Christ calls friends, the poor and needy.

While, therefore, we exhort our Christian Readers, in their Christmas gifts, to "remember the poor," we wish them all, whether they be poor or rich, a happy Christmas. It may be so to all. For to those, whom earth offers no present happiness, Christmas comes to tell of joy, over which the sorrows and miseries of this life have no power—"of joy unspeakable, and full of glory."

"High Heaven in mercy to your sad annoy, Still greets you with glad tidings of immortal joy."

"Think on th' eternal home,
The Saviour left for you;
Think on the Lord most holy, come
To dwell with hearts untrue;
So shall ye tread untired His pastoral ways,
And in the darkness sing your carol of high praise."

WESTERN MISSIONARY LIFE.—We bespeak the attention of our readers for a most interesting and touching letter on this subject, to be found among our communications, from a Western Missionary. We hope some kind hearts will be found to answer the modest, but urgent, appeal it contains.

We beg leave to lay before our readers, and urge upon their attention, the following letter. It is the solemn duty of the Church to sustain the Bishops and Presbyters whom she has sent to the foreign field of missionary labor.

Collection for Foreign Missions.

First Sunday after the Epiphany, January 7th, 1849.

TO THE BISHOPS, CLERGY, AND LAITY OF THE PROTESTANT EPISCOPAL CHURCH:—

In accordance with a recommendation of the Board of Missions, at its late Triennial Meeting, a collection for the Foreign Missions of the Church was very generally made at the Epiphany season in this year.

The result was a most liberal contribution, relieving the department from embarrassment, and bringing with it many expressions of cordial interest, highly encouraging to those entrusted with the work.

Although the offerings of the Church enabled the Foreign Committee to meet the claims of the last financial year, and likewise to extinguish the indebtedness which oppressed their treasury, still no surplus was accumulated for the expenditures of the ensuing year.

As is usual during the first or summer quarter, the receipts of late have been light, and the Committee are now pressed with great urgency by their respected Missionaries abroad, for the remittance essential to their subsistence. The Church has but to repeat her offerings, to carry forward her Foreign Missions with comfort during the year.

The receipts for the Missions at CONSTANTINOPLE and ATHENS, have not been sufficient to cover the first quarter of the present financial year, while the second quarter is more than half expired. The Committee are yet in debt for the whole amount of the annual shipment made to the AFRICAN Mission in August. The contributions to the Mission in China, which sufficed to meet the two first quarters of the year, have not yet enabled the Committee to authorize drafts for any portion of the quarter due on the 1st January next, so that the Missionary Bishop at Shanghai must necessarily be left at least three months in arrears for his remittances.

The Foreign Committee therefore appeal, with much earnestness—and they may say with confidence—to the Church; and solicit contributions to their treasury, to be made on the 7th January, 1849, the first Sunday after the Epiphany, or on some other Sunday of the Epiphany season.

In behalf of the Foreign Committee,
PIERRE P. IRVING, Sec'y, &c.

CALIFORNIA MISSION.—We have received the following communication on this important subject, and earnestly commend it to the consideration of Churchmen. In the wide FIELD OF THE WORLD, there is at present no part which offers such results, if early and suitable efforts be made to secure the promise. The work in that vast field is not to be done by single and solitary Missionaries. The Church, in such a case, should begin aright. Her Ministry ought to be fully represented. The Great Head of the Church sent APOSTLES first, upon the great mission of converting the world. Why should His Holy Church not acknowledge, in her practice, the wisdom of her Lord? We have sent a Bishop to China, and one to Turkey, and tried to send one to Africa, and why should we withhold the same blessing from this wide spreading land, filling up with our countrymen, and many of them of our own household of faith? The suggestion made, by the following correspondent, is a good one, and we hope it may have some effect in rousing the Church to action.

For the Banner of the Cross.

The Church in California.

MR. EDITOR:—What is the Church doing for California? The tide of emigration is flowing rapidly to the shores of the Pacific, and we are standing by with folded arms watching it, carrying industry, enterprise, youth, Romanism, dissent, every thing there, but the Church. By and by, we may live to see it—a mighty nation may spring up, within our reach, speaking our language, protected by our laws, yet almost as churchless as the savage islands in the ocean beyond. We support mission stations in Africa, China and Constantinople, but can any man say that they are of one tenth part the importance to the American Church as California? It may be said, that we have one missionary already there, and one on the way. Two men! what are they compared to "the white harvest" that spreads for eight hundred miles along the Pacific? California wants now a Bishop and a dozen Clergy. And if we refuse or be slow in sending to her according to our fullness, and according to her emptiness and her crying needs, will we not fall under the curse of those "who come not up to the help of the Lord against the mighty?" Is there not much that is mighty against God there? Infidelity! ignorance! gold!

Wisconsin is an example of the good that can be done by taking Time by the forelock, and our own Church before the Revolution is a true picture of the effects of sloth and a miserly spirit on the part of those whose duty it was to provide for the colonies, the whole economy of a Church.

The Bishop of Gibraltar, writing to the Archbishop of Canterbury, suggests that on next Whitsunday, which is the third centennial anniversary of the adoption of the Prayer Book, a sermon be preached in all the Churches on some subject connected with the Prayer Book, and that a collection be taken up to aid in its propagation. Why could not we do the same in this country? Why could there not be a universal collection on Whitsunday in every Church from the St. Croix to the Rio Grande, for the endowment of a Bishopric and Presbyterate, in California? This will place the mission beyond the necessity of continual asking, and on a surer basis than the changeable charities of Churchmen.

If a Bishopric were adequately endowed, and certainly such a collection would do it, there could be found young men, who would be willing to go. For surely if so many go for gold, a few will go for God.

They could be supported in this way; let those who go be sent and supported regularly by particular Churches. The smallest trifle regularly given every year by every Church in New York city, would support one or more. Philadelphia could support many; it would support one. So would Boston. So would Baltimore.

If one or two Clergymen in each of those cities would interest themselves, and take a little trouble for a few days only, they might place this important mission upon a secure foundation, and save the American Church the dishonor of withholding spiritual sustenance from the spiritually starving people who are dependent for their heavenly food upon her bounty.

Whatever you can say, Mr. Editor, to arouse the Church to a conviction of the importance of this mission, surely the state of the case demands.

Clarkson

We would feel it our duty to say more, in commending the following "Report" to the notice of our readers, if the subject had not been well urged in a pointed and excellent article to be found in our columns.

We think there are few, if any, of the numerous objects of Charity more worthy of liberal donations than that proposed by the BISHOP WHITE PARISH LIBRARY ASSOCIATION. The prayers and thanks of grateful and happy Missionaries will call down blessings upon its donors. We commend it as an admirable object for a CHRISTMAS GIFT.

Report of the Bishop White Parish Library Association.

The Managers of the Bishop White Parish Library Association, in presenting their Annual Report, will confine themselves to a statement of facts, without note or comment; leaving entirely to the wisdom and zeal of the members of the Church the propriety of their extending their patronage to a Society that may be so extensively useful in circulating the works of the soundest divines that have ever adorned our Church at a time when error, in every form, is taking possession of our land. They regret to state that they have very few subscribers, and have never had but one appropriation from any of the Churches in the city, which was twenty-five dollars from St. James' Church; the Rector of which has uniformly taken the kindest interest in their concerns. The Association have applications at present for several libraries from Missionaries, who are totally unable to procure a single volume for themselves: and they are also anxious to complete the libraries of the Missionaries in Pennsylvania, which they cannot hope to accomplish unless they meet with more generosity than they have heretofore met with. Although the business of the Society is conducted by ladies, the funds should not be entirely supplied by them. The books are always selected by the Bishop of the Diocese, and are purchased by the managers on the most reasonable terms. Their funds are entirely exhausted; and, unless the managers can interest the members of the Church, the Society must be dissolved; a Society which from the gratifying letters they frequently receive from every part of the Union, has been doing much service to the Church. From the generosity of a few ladies, they have been enabled to distribute, the past year, five hundred and ninety-five volumes.

To Missionaries in Pennsylvania, 252 volumes; Illinois, 30; N. Carolina, 33; Arkansas, 34; Florida, 30; Wisconsin, 53; Tennessee, 31; Michigan, 36; Alabama, 44; California, 52. Total, 595 volumes.

Donations or subscriptions will be gratefully received, and may be sent to the Rev. Dr. Morton, the Editor of the Banner, or the Treasurer, No. 3 Spruce, below Tenth street.

Books for Christmas Presents.

We beg to remind those who are in search of beautiful and appropriate Books for presents at this happy season, of the several Works, noticed in the Banner. They are to be found at the Bookstores of the Messrs. APPLETONS, New York and Philadelphia, at Mr. R. S. H. GEORGE'S, and Mr. H. HOOKER'S, Philad., and at Messrs. STANFORD & SWORD'S, New York.

A reference to the Advertisements of each will show the rich variety they have provided. A visit to their attractive Bookstore will be still better, and well repay those who enjoy the sight of beautiful Books.

Foreign Intelligence.

The following intelligence cannot be unexpected to those who know the course which this reverend gentleman has long pursued. His sympathies have long been, as well as his doctrinal views, manifestly with the dissenters. The amusing part of the affair, only a little too absurd to be laughed at, is the cause assigned by "the Record!" "It is matter of thankfulness that amidst so many provocations offered to them by Popishly-affected divines of the temper of the Bishop of Exeter," so many should have kept their allegiance to the Church. This is wonderful logic. Because some were inclined to go to Rome—it is "matter of thankfulness" that so few were inclined to take "the down train," to Geneva! What a strange thing is this "Puseyism." For our own part we think its effects will be happy if it helps to drive out of the Church those whose sympathies are not with her. Let those who "love Rome more" than the Church, or the Church less than Geneva, go where their desires lead them. The Church is well rid of all such, and the sooner they go, say we, the better.

"Although it has at last come somewhat suddenly upon us, we confess that we are in nowise surprised at the announcement contained in the following paragraphs:—

From the inquiries we have made we believe that the rumour which has reached us respecting Mr. Noel's intention to secede from the establishment is well founded. We are informed that he has announced his resolutions, in a letter to his chapel-wardens, but states that he shall continue to officiate at St. John's Chapel for a short time longer. The public will no doubt soon receive an authentication of the statement from Mr. Noel himself, together with his reasons for taking so important a step. We have since been informed, on trustworthy authority, that the rumour is strictly correct, and that in a few days Mr. Noel will probably make a public statement of his reasons for seceding from the Church, but he will not resign his Pastorship until Midsummer next. We understand that the Church and State question is the only cause assigned for the step.—Nonconformist.

We fear there is no doubt of the fact, that that amiable and excellent person, the Hon. and Rev. Baptist W. Noel, has signified his intention of seceding from the Church. It is a subject of much greater regret than of surprise.

It is a matter of thankfulness that amidst so many perversions to Rome from the one extreme of the Church, that those at the other extreme of the line should, amidst so many provocations offered to them by Popishly-affected divines of the temper of the Bishop of Exeter, have remained firm in their allegiance to her sway. This is a matter of thankfulness, but not of surprise. For, where Evangelical truth pervades the heart, the drawing out of the Church which so fully embodies and displays Scriptural verity, must be strong indeed. And where sound and sober judgment predominates in the intellect, the perception that Divine truth, thus embodied in Her Articles and Liturgy, is continually rising into fuller predominance and power within its boundaries, must impel to a joyful endurance of still remaining evils, in the good hope that they also are soon destined to alleviation or extinction.

But amidst all his excellencies and all his talents, no one who has intelligently watched the course of Mr. Noel could feel secure of his continued allegiance to his Church. As Churchmen, it was impossible not to perceive a weakness in this direction—an oscillation of sentiment which, becoming, from any cause, a little stronger than usual, might throw him out of her enclosures.

Our time, however, does not permit of our dilating on the subject to-day.—Record of Thursday.

The following we find in "a Postscript" to the last English Churchman:—

Thursday Morning.

The Times of this morning contains the following statement respecting Mr. Baptist Noel's secession:—

"The paragraphs which have already appeared in this journal relative to the Hon. and Rev. Baptist Noel have made the fact patent to the world that the reverend gentleman was about shortly to secede from the Established Church; but when that event would take place has not hitherto been announced. The matter, however, is now rendered beyond all doubt, the reverend gentleman having publicly announced it. Last night, at the usual Wednesday evening's service at St. John's Chapel, Bedford-row, where Mr. Noel has officiated for the last twenty-six years, the reverend gentleman selected for his text, Revelations, chap. i., v. 5 and 6, 'Unto Him that loved us and washed us from our sins in His own blood, and hath made us kings and priests unto God and His Father, to Him be glory and dominion for ever and ever, Amen;'—and then proceeded as follows:—'My dear Christian brethren, many of you have heard that, as the result of opinions deliberately formed, which I know not how to alter, and the force of conviction which I am not permitted to resist, I have been obliged to announce my intention of leaving this congregation, where I have ministered for so long a period with comfort and satisfaction to myself, if not with profit to others. Since I addressed you last I have seen my Diocesan, and he considers it to be his duty—an opinion from which I do not dissent—to determine that I shall not remain with you beyond next Sabbath. This, therefore, is the last Wednesday evening on which I shall have the privilege of addressing you. But let us not think of little matters; let us indulge in meditations on the best of all subjects; and I have chosen the words of my text because they speak of our best friend, and are calculated very much to console and animate us.' The reverend gentleman then proceeded with his address, but in no degree further alluded to the painful subject of quitting his flock."

The following intelligence from Rome declares a result long expected.

ITALY.—A very serious insurrection took place at Rome on the 16th. The people attacked the Pope's palace, calling for the appointment of a ministry under M. Mamiani. A great deal of fighting took place. The fighting occupied three hours. Cardinal Palma is killed. The Pope ultimately gave way, and sent for M. Galetti, and gave him power to form a ministry. M. Galetti himself is Minister of Foreign Affairs.

The Alba of Florence, under date of Rome, the 17th, gives the following account of the murder of M. Rossi. He had exasperated the people by threatening, on the preceding day, to act vigorously against the disturbers of the public peace, and had made a great display of military force. On his getting out of his carriage to enter the Palace of the Legislature, he was hooted, and, having looked at the crowd with a sort of defiance, a man rushed forward and stabbed him in the throat. A letter received from a correspondent at Rome says, "As M. Rossi was ascending the staircase of the Chamber of Deputies, he was surrounded by a body of the Legionari (the legion returned from Vicenza), one of whom came forward and stabbed him. The assassin, protected by his comrades, escaped."

A letter, dated Rome, the 17th inst., gives a melancholy description of that capital. On the morning of that day the people removed the barricades which had been erected near the Monte-Cavallo. At 8 o'clock the civic guard assembled, and determined to make the Pope's and Swiss guards prisoners. A deputation waited on the Pope, who capitulated in the name of the Swiss, on condition that their lives should be saved. These conditions having been accepted by the people the Swiss were disarmed. They were to quit Rome that night. At 9 o'clock the Civic Guards took possession of all the posts occupied by the Swiss, and the Pope was guarded by them. None of the people or of the troops were killed in the conflict, and but 11 or 12 wounded. Cardinal Palma, (the Pope's Secretary) who was killed, was the person who composed the celebrated encyclical letter of the 29th of April. The Pope is said to have counted upon the assistance of the Transteverini, but they refused to engage in a civil war. If the Pope had not acquiesced in the demands of the people, they were determined to force an entrance into his palace. A search was made by the people for Cardinal Lambruschini, but he escaped in the disguise of a dragoon. The military authorities had submitted to the popular club. Romini and Serini had refused peremptorily to form part of the democratic Ministry. The Pope had been completely abandoned by his friends. He was visited solely by the diplomatic corps, who found him with Cardinals Antonelli and Soglia. His Holiness is said to have declared that, having been compelled to dismiss his guard, which had been replaced by strangers, he was influenced by no feeling but that of sparing the effusion of blood, but he declared in the face of Europe that he would take no part in the future Government, having absolutely forbidden his name to be used, or that the usual style "in consideration of the good pleasure of His Holiness" should in future be prefixed to the Government acts.

A bulletin of the Diario di Roma of the 18th, contains the following:—"The Pope intends to escape from Rome; last night he was kept under strict guard. He will not give way. Several ambassadors of foreign powers encourage him. A Spanish ship is ready to take him either to Malta or Marseilles; the Cardinals have almost all fled. The Popular Club now governs alone at Rome; to-morrow, or the day after, the Chamber will be constituted, and the people will present to it, as the first question, that of an Italian Constituent Assembly. The Pope has written a letter to the ambassadors, in which he takes leave of them." Private letters add that the Pope is literally besieged in the Quirinal. Other letters say that he showed himself disposed to give way to the will of the people.

It appears that the report that the Pope had been obliged to quit his capital was false. The French Government has received the following telegraphic despatch:—

"CIVITA VECCHIA, Nov. 23

"Rome is tranquil. The new Ministry have published their programme, and have assumed the direction of affairs.

"M. Mamiani arrives at Rome this afternoon."

This telegraphic despatch was communicated to the Journal des Debats with the following note:—

"It was through an error that a journal announced yesterday that the Pope had been compelled to quit Rome."

New Publications.

We have received a THANKSGIVING DISCOURSE preached by Bishop Potter, in St. Luke's Church, Philadelphia. This able discourse is published by request of the Vestry of the Church in which it was delivered. It is a practical and forcible exposition of ISAIAH 26: part of 9th verse—"For when thy judgments are in the earth, the inhabitants of the world will learn righteousness."

The scope of the discourse may be learned from the following division which the Bishop makes of his subject.

"In order the better to meet this responsibility, let us notice for a moment the admonitory lessons, which are addressed to us in the events of the past year. When God's judgments are in the earth then especially should the inhabitants of the world learn righteousness; and then may the Christian pulpit, leaving its ordinary topics—strive especially on a day like this, to give voice and articulation to the providential teachings of the Most High.

Among these teachings we may, beside others, recognise distinctly—as it seems to me—the following;

1. That nations, as well as individuals, are immediately accountable to God.
2. That they ought to look with increased abhorrence on war and on all its accessories.
3. That they should shun alike, law without liberty and liberty without law; and
4. That they should ever beware of a civilization, however refined, which is not enlightened and animated by a healthy national conscience—or in other words, which is not founded on the immovable rock of public and private morality."

PARENTAL RESPONSIBILITY.—A Sermon by the Rev. Thomas C. Yarnall, A.M.

This is an excellent practical discourse from Deut. vi, 6, 7, on a most important subject. It is printed by request of the Vestry of St. Mary's Church, Hamiltonville, where it was preached.

A SERMON IN VINDICATION OF THE PROTESTANT EPISCOPAL CHURCH.—Delivered in St. John's Church, Knoxville, October 1st, 1848, by Rev. T. W. Humes.

This is a discourse in reply to the usual objections urged against the Church by those who are utterly ignorant of her character. It is written in a style well suited to answer its end and to show that the author can keep his temper when there is some excuse for using it. The following extract from the introduction, shows something of its spirit.

"The permanent organization in our midst, within a few years past, of a branch of the Protestant Episcopal Church, it was to have been expected would attract attention and occasion remark amongst a people such as ours, by whom the subject of religion is held as one of paramount importance. It was also to have been expected, that because of the general absence of information in our own section of country, respecting that Church, much misconception, leading of consequence to mis-statement of its doctrine and discipline, would at first occur. And such has been in fact the case. It would perhaps be the disposition of many persons, to leave the removal of these misconceptions to the hand of time, in the certain confidence that they would finally and entirely be dispersed from the minds of all candid and unprejudiced men, who can have no motive for remaining in error with regard to the opinions of their Christian brethren, when the opportunity offers of being enlightened. Yet, if by a summary statement of, and answer to certain popular objections against the Episcopal Church, which have obtained currency, I could hasten the removal of any misconception concerning it, which may have found place in a single mind, the labor would not be in vain, inasmuch as something would be effected for the cause of Truth. Nor only for the cause of Truth. Something would also be done for the cause of Christian charity, of that highest attribute of God, and best gift to man, Love."

Religious Charity Publication Societies.

In my previous articles I have confined my attention to the American Tract Society, because that society openly professes, and manifestly does publish books at cost, and in some instances, I know, no regular publisher could make the same book by the thousand at so low a rate as that society will sell them at retail; and yet from prices that are below cost of making it will make a discount to sellers of 20 per cent. A superabundance of charity enables the society to do this. Thus the Church is furnishing the poor and the rich, and even booksellers, with books at cost, and even below cost, in some instances. This is very generous, but more stupid than generous. Tried by any principles of reason, justice or public economy, it is ridiculously wrong.

But the principles of reasoning which I have applied to this society, will apply with more or less force to all charity publication societies. This I will show before I have done. They are all wrong in principle and wrong in action. They work wrong because they are wrong in principle.

I think it is wrong for religious charity to engage in any branch of merchandize. If it may engage in one branch on the plea of utility, it may engage in all, for all are useful, and then we should have the spectacle of the Church's doing all the business of the world. It would then be a secular Church, and its ministers be secular men, as many now are, to a mournful extent, from the multiplicity of cases and duties which publication societies and their committees impose on them. The course which things are taking is secularizing the Church and ministry. That is one and no small objection. For this there is nothing in the Bible, or in the practice of the primitive Church, to give the least sanction, but every thing against it. It violates every true idea of a Church and ministry as divine institutions.

Not far from a million and a half of dollars is given annually in the name of the Church to publish books. Three-fourths or more of the entire capital employed in the religious branch of book business is charity, and the little private capital remaining in it, is fast making its escape as from a burning house. It would open men's eyes to the folly and wrong of this system, if you were to propose that the Church should do all this business and drive all private enterprise and capital out of the field. O no, this will not do, it would be said, and yet these institutions are saddling this business on the Church as fast as possible; and we have the spectacle now of as much competition, as much cupidity, as much ingenuity, as much catering to public taste, as can be found among any class of men engaged in the same branch of business. They are not content to stay in the sphere they were created to move in. They hitch on to their wheels every thing they can make money by. They open shops and sell general books, and their plea is, that they must make their expenses, but the plan is a virtual tax on booksellers to pay, so far as they retail other publications than their own, and so far as those profits go, the expenses of these establishments. For example, the American Sunday School Union, though professedly not a Sectarian institution, makes more annually by the sale of the Book of Common Prayer, than any two stores in the city by retailing the same book. It has no proper right as a charity institution so to do, and all that is so made comes out of the booksellers, and goes to support the agents and clerks of the society. This society too keeps most religious books—is agent for a publishing house in London, and does as much as she can to monopolize the religious book business of the city; and, I say, it is all a tax on the business of the trade, made in the name of charity, and applied in the name of charity to support salaries in that institution, and so far as it goes, has a tendency to dishearten and drive out of the business of religious bookselling all who are attempting to live by it. The public, too, are taught that when they buy books at the counters of the societies, they are contributing to the treasury of the Lord. This is an enormous fallacy. It goes every cent to enable these institutions to build up large and overawing stores, to give larger salaries, as they do, than any private business can afford. It impoverishes men who give all their time and means to publish and sell books, quite as useful as any that the societies can publish. So far from being a duty or a charity, it makes the rich richer and the poor poorer. It is a principle that would take the bread out of the mouth of the starving children of men honestly doing all that their time and means will enable them to do for the benefit of the community, and give it where it is not needed, or convert it into the outward embroidery of a showy and useless charity. This is the amount of it, and the best that can be made of it. It is no principle; it is a notion got up by the clamour of these institutions for charity; a clamour that would die down and sink to a gentle and rational voice, were it not for the self-interest which the salaried abettors of these institutions have in glorifying them—misunderstanding and misleading the public as to their real utility. There is no utility in them, viewed on a large scale, and estimated by their far-reaching results. Religious charity cannot undertake such a work as this without landing itself in unmitigated wrong doing. Charity thus says you shall not get your living by the sweat of your brow. I will annul this law, but leave you without a living. I will do all the work, and this seems very generous, but then she adds, I intend also to pocket all the profits. It is useful and productive labour, not labour that lives on charity, which charity should both create and foster.

I speak strongly, because I am just as well convinced of the inutility and evil of these institutions, as at present conducted, as I am of any truth that has ever been stated.

The Sunday School Union is liable to the same objections in principle that I have made to the Tract Society. Like that, it professes to furnish its publications at cost. It gives away to the amount of its charity receipts, and all the profits it can make on the sale of books, go to support expenses. This is the same as the Tract Society in principle, and as completely shuts out all competition. It is all charity, charity, and no cheapness.

The American Bible Society is liable to the same objections. It is a useless and very expensive institution to the public. I have heard booksellers say they would give that Society $20,000 and take its business, and bind themselves and their heirs in all time to supply the demand for Bibles at the Society's price, and thus save to the religious public all the charity it expends in making Bibles. I have no doubt Bibles in that case, if purchased in large quantities, as they now are, for gratuitous distribution, would be furnished cheaper than they now are; and so of all religious books which it is desirable to give away or sell at low prices. If Societies were formed as now to purchase and distribute them, and the publishing of them were left to individual enterprise, the price would fall to the lowest living point, and there would be hands and capital enough to engage in producing them at one half they now cost the Church in charity. There can be no doubt of this. Twenty thousand Bibles have been imported the last year, cheaper than they could be bound for here in the same style. There cannot be a demand of this kind which would not be supplied, and the price would fall in proportion to the demand. This is a law of trade as certain to secure these results, as that two and two make four.

The American S. S. Union probably never did and never can make enough on the sale of its own publications to meet its expenses, and hence it has to rob booksellers by undertaking the sale of other books, and using all appliances to invite trade. Its expenses, its salaries, are greater than any private house does or can pay; and if all were charged on the prices of its own books, salaries and expenses must come down, or prices go up to an unendurable height; and hence as they can sell books, booksellers must be, or are taxed, to make up the deficiency. This is the common sense of the case, and I think it would be tameness in me to state it in any other way, or call it any thing but a wrong.

The Presbyterian Board is no better in its effect on the book trade. It is a money making concern, and does nothing which private enterprise would not gladly do cheaper. It has published a number of books on the trade, which is a wrong in principle, and a superfluity in charity. It is making a house of merchandize of that Church, and its ministers seem to glory in the great work they are doing, giving time to it with a zest that quite equals what is ever seen in the walks of trade. They publish books in ornamental style. They cannot find enough that is unpublished to do, but run so fast, that they have declared, as with a view to deter booksellers from publishing any book, that they will not mind it, but will publish any book they choose, no matter who has published it before them. In this they have avowed a principle that the worst men in the book trade have generally regarded as sacred, i. e. not to cheapen or ruin the value of property already in the hands of others. It seems to be left to religious charity in her zeal, to take the lead in acting on this principle. If I was to give my version of this, it would be, that the Church having gone astray into dealing in merchandize, God has left her to commit follies and wrongs greater than the world is wont to commit, that by the baldness and superfluity of her transgression, she might be redeemed from long engaging in the business of this world, and follow that which is more spiritual, and more within the design and office of a Church and ministry on earth. It is lawful to make good coats—it is wrong that they should not be well made, but should the Church turn itself into a tailor's shop, and the ministry set to, to work at that trade in order to secure this result? As well in principle might this be done, as that the Church and ministry should undertake the publication of religious books in this land. The cases do not differ in principle, differ as they may in other respects.

To this date the Episcopal and Roman Catholic Churches have done less in merchandize and trade than any others, calling themselves Churches, and they are the chief support of booksellers. The Episcopal Church has left her Prayer-Book and every thing to the management of business enterprise, and she gets it as cheap as it can be made, and cheaper than any charity enterprise could furnish it, if it charged all expenses on the book, yet these societies must deal in the tempting morsel left to individual competition, and support themselves by the profit they can make on it. To see an institution, in no sense Episcopal, do this, when its principal supporters and acknowledged influence are sectarian, in the general opinion of that Church, is a sight one is not apt to look for or wont to meet with. It thus forces the whole Church into its support whether she will or no. It takes off her fleece as by the way-side and lets her go.

I might go on and instance all the Societies, and find all liable to the same objections in some degree; but it would be little better than a repetition of what I have said. They generate and emulate each other. They are formed in many instances to counteract the influence of each other. They operate to strengthen denominational and sectional prejudices, an evil which all good men must deplore.

The E. K. Society sprung up in this soil. Its eye caught on what others had done and were doing, and it must do some great thing; it must at first open a store; it must keep clear of booksellers as of breakers; its individual existence must be significant, it must model on and imitate the great boards about it—it could do wonders. Well, what has it done? It has not published a single book, and it never will publish a book, which any publisher in this land would not have published on his own means and furnished to the Church on its recommendation, without one cent's cost, the Church engaging to buy the books as she does of the Society, and thus all the cost attending the publication of the books be saved to the Church. In nothing but the business of charity would so obvious an advantage have been disregarded. The same attention could have been given to the character and editing of the books that now is, and the charity of the Church only employed in purchasing and distributing them as it now is. All these books, could and would, under such an arrangement, be furnished 20 per cent. under the prices the Society now charges for them, and the cost of rent, agent and publishing saved into the bargain. Would any set of men in the use of their own means have disregarded considerations so obviously expedient? Nothing but charity, reckless and blind, could do it; yea, charity bent on some ambitious and useless display of itself. The men who have done this, are men that I highly respect, that I love and confide in as truly as I ever can in any, but I have set out to speak my mind on what I esteem to be as important a subject as any that can occupy the attention of the public.

For the Banner of the Cross:

Saundersville, Vanderburgh Co., Ind., Nov. 20th, 1848.

REV. MR. EDITOR:—

Notwithstanding the apathy of the Church, in fulfilling her obligation to "preach the gospel to every creature," and her neglect of those whom she has sent out upon this divine mission, there are "a few names" that are worthy, who rejoice to hear of the success of that Gospel, "which is the power of God unto salvation, to every one that believeth." Would that we realized the object we profess to have in view! Would that we were sensible of that "joy in the presence of the angels of God over one sinner that repenteth!" Would that we could estimate the living value of the assurance,—"the Lord added to the Church, daily, such as should be saved!" But, alas! "the cares of this world, and the deceitfulness of riches, and the lusts of other things entering in, choke the word, and it becometh unfruitful." Many grow weary in well doing, and the plenteous harvest remains ungathered;—or in a few favored spots, with here and there a solitary laborer, may it not be said, "Behold, the hire of the laborers who have reaped down your fields, which is of you kept back by fraud, crieth; and the cries of them which have reaped, are entered into the ears of the Lord of Sabaoth?"

My purpose in this communication, Mr. Editor, is to lay before your readers a sketch of missionary life, drawn from reality. I had received notice, from our beloved Missionary Bishop, of his intended visitation, and went to Evansville, on Saturday, hoping to spend the Sunday with him and my good brother, the rector of the parish; but on my arrival, I learned that a telegraphic despatch had been received, stating that, in consequence of the low stage of water, in the Ohio, the Bishop could not fill his appointment until the following week. Disappointed, as I was, my mortification was increased by discovering that the house of a friend, with whom I lodged, had been opened in the night,—my bed-room alone entered, and my pockets rifled of their contents,—(which, to be sure, was not much, seeing that I am a poor itinerant missionary!) together with the loss of a valuable watch, hat, gloves, &c. My sermons, too, had passed a rude criticism, but were left on the floor as worthless spoil! Thus relieved of superfluities, I returned home, the next morning, penniless,—but with hat and gloves replaced by my generous host,—and waited the Bishop's arrival, who greeted me with his well-known cordiality, on the succeeding Sunday; and after participating in the glorious services of the sanctuary, during which the Bishop confirmed three candidates, administered the Lord's Supper, and preached three truly excellent sermons, to good congregations,—we went on our way to my home station, where he was also in labours abundant. After the usual services, and the sacrament of adult baptism, catechizing the children, &c., by myself, the Bishop confirmed four candidates, preached and administered the Lord's Supper.

Here, Mr. Editor, I must beg the favor to add a few special words. At the station where I reside, we have been struggling,—literally struggling to build a humble temple unto the Lord, and we have done what we could. Our means are exhausted, but our object is not accomplished. My people are all poor,—very poor;—they live in log cabins, scattered up and down, through the wilderness for ten miles around: and could you see the comfortless condition of families, who of their penury gave their five, ten, and twenty dollars, you would take shame at the lukewarmness of those who hold back from sustaining the missionary operations of the Church of the blessed Redeemer. I have labored through the past summer, day after day, in the woods, getting timber, stone, &c., sometimes assisting the carpenters, and superintending the whole work, occupying the most of my time. We have raised and covered our building, (26 feet by 52,) put in the windows, and laid about three parts of the floor. It is all free,—no incumbrance,—no claim,—but we must now stop, for we will not go into debt. In the multitude of wants, is there any hope of assistance for us little ones? The small sum of $100 would enable us to accomplish our most cherished wishes;—with that amount of money we could complete our undertaking, and thus give a permanency to our parish. I am constrained then to ask,—is there hope for us? And will not some good churchmen dignify our appearance by sending us a surplice, a communion set, and a baptismal font? These are our present wants,—and they are wants which we have not the ability to supply. We have not been sparing of our own flocks and herds,—indeed, we have been liberal beyond our means, but we feel that God is with us and that He is blessing us in our labor of love.

A few years ago, this country station was organized into a parish, with five communicants; and amid the opposition of ignorance and the legion of isms, we have gone on increasing, till we now number thirty, who "all eat the same spiritual meat, and all drink the same spiritual drink." Here, too, in little mouldering heaps, lie the precious remains of five of the missionary's children.

On the following day, our truly apostolical Bishop accompanied me, in primitive simplicity, on foot, four miles, to a newly-gathered congregation, where in a log school house, we "kneeled upon our knees and prayed and gave thanks," and the Bishop spoke of those things which belong to our everlasting salvation, "preaching peace by Jesus Christ." Returning, as it were, with our staff in our hand, and after officiating at a funeral, we set off on our weary way to distant stations, visiting and celebrating divine service at Vincennes, (at which place the Bishop baptized two infants,) Bloomfield, Point Commerce, (where there were two persons confirmed and the Lord's Supper administered,) Bloomington and Terre Haute, "preaching the things concerning the kingdom of God, and the name of Jesus Christ." And after experiencing the vicissitudes incident to this new and unsettled country,—the dangerous state of the roads, fords and bridges, we parted at 9 o'clock, at night,—the missionary to a good warm bed,—the Bishop in a "mud wagon," over the desert prairies of Illinois! Diocesan Intelligence.

The following Prayer, to be used in the congregations of this Diocese while the disease called Asiatic Cholera is impending, is put forth in conformity with Canon XLVII, of 1832, of the General Convention of the P. E. Church in the United States.

A. POTTER,

Bishop of the Diocese of Pennsylvania.

Philadelphia, Dec. 12, 1848.

PRAYER.

O God, with whom are the issues of life and death, to whom it justly belongeth to punish sinners, and to be merciful to them that truly repent; save us, we humbly beseech thee, from the ravages of that pestilence with which we are threatened. We have provoked thy righteous judgments by our manifold transgressions and hardness of heart, and though we should utterly perish, our punishment would be less than our sins deserve. But, O God, who desirest not the death of a sinner, but rather that he should turn from his wickedness and live, have pity upon us, thy unworthy creatures, and grant that we, repenting of our iniquities and forsaking our sins, may experience thy forgiving and protecting grace. As thou didst deliver thy people of old when they turned to thee from their rebellion, and didst cause thy destroying angel to cease from punishing, so turn thine anger from us, who meekly acknowledge our vileness, and truly repent us of our sins. Spare those who are now suffering from this grievous sickness, restore the voice of joy and health to their dwellings; and grant that all who shall taste thy forbearing mercy may devote their souls and bodies a living sacrifice to thee, through Jesus Christ our Lord. Amen.

New York.—EPISCOPAL SERVICES AT TROY.—On Wednesday, the 6th inst., Bishop Whittingham consecrated the Church of the Holy Cross, at Troy, in this diocese. The Clergy, members of the Vestries of the neighboring Churches, and other Churchmen, met at the room of the school, supported by the liberality of Mrs. Mary Warren, and thence walked in procession to the Church. On arriving at the door, the prescribed Consecration Service was begun by the Bishop, the Clergy aiding in the responsive and other parts assigned to them. The Instrument of Donation was presented to the Bishop by Stephen B. Warren, Esq., and read by the Rev. John Ireland Tucker, the minister of the Church. The sentence of Consecration was read by the Rev. Benjamin I. Haight, D. D., Professor of Pastoral Theology and Pulpit Eloquence in the General Theological Seminary.

The act of Consecration having been completed, Rev. R. B. Van Kleeck, Rector of St. Paul's Church, Troy, commenced the morning service; the first lesson was read by the Rev. Samuel L. Southard, Rector of Calvary Church, New York, and the second by the Rev. Richard Cox, Rector of Zion Church, New York.

The intoning of the Service commenced with the Versicles after the Lord's Prayer, according to the use of Westminster Abbey, the Rev. Mr. Tucker officiating. The 'Proper Psalms' were chanted antiphonally. The Litany was chanted by the Rev. Messrs. Tucker and Shackelford, the choir making the responses, accompanied by the organ.

In the Ante-communion Service, the Rev. Reuben Hubbard, Rector of St. Stephen's Church, Schuylerville, Saratoga co., read the Epistle, and the Bishop the Gospel. Bishop Whittingham preached a sermon—the great object of which was to vindicate the practice of consecrating edifices to the worship of Almighty God. It was conceived and written in his own vigorous method, and made an impression to be obliterated only when the solemn occurrences of the day are entirely forgotten. After the Holy Communion had been administered to a large number of devout recipients, in which the Bishop was assisted by Rev. Dr. Haight and Rev. Messrs. Van Kleeck and Tucker, and the services had been concluded with the benediction, the Bishop stepped to the front of the outer chancel, and in a strain of fervent eloquence congratulated the congregation on the completion of the act of dedication to God of a building every way fit and appropriate for the uses for which it was designed. He said, he knew little more than an outline of the history of the charity which then and there had so happy a consummation; but in that little he saw how one good deed leads to another, in a succession of ever-growing results, and how blessings follow in the train of every instance of holy self-denial. He referred to the fact that, years ago, a mother in Israel, a member of the Warren family, had collected a few little children, once a week, for the purpose of imparting to them instruction in certain useful domestic employments. The design grew upon her hands, until the pupils constituted a large and interesting class. She died in the full expectation of a glorious immortality. Another member of the family continued her good work. At first she caused the beneficiaries to meet under her own roof; but at length, the number having greatly increased, they were associated as a school, and provided with instructors, whose daily business it became to impart to them not only the ordinary rudiments of a good education for girls, but also a practical acquaintance with vocal music. Out of the great success with which that school has been blessed, grew the design to erect an edifice to the glory of God, in which the sweet and well-trained voices of those little ones might take an important part in the customary prayers and praise. The result was before the congregation—an edifice of singular beauty, and much cost, free for all who choose to enter within its hallowed doors, erected and endowed by an individual member of the fold of Christ, with a large school of children in constant preparation for the duties of this life and the blessings of heaven, in regular attendance on the daily services of the Church, and adding to the beauty, and, it may be, efficacy of devotion, by the skilful harmony with which they share the choral parts. In looking at such a brief history of a series of good deeds, who does not discern an incentive to the cultivation, in a like singleness of heart, of the charity which "seeketh not her own?"

Great additional interest and solemnity were imparted to the services by the very admirable and appropriate selection of music, and by the accurate and spirited manner in which it was performed. The chant for the Venite and Proper Psalms, was Lord Mornington's, in E. The Te Deum and Jubilate was Mendelssohn's, in A. The anthem after sermon, by Naumann: the words from the 122d Psalm. The Kyrie Eleison Trisagion, and Gloria in Excelsis, by Dr. Hodges; the first having been written for the occasion.

The Church of the Holy Cross is early English, and of stone, lined with brick, built in such manner as to leave flues, or spaces, between the brick and stone work, making the walls dry, warm, and substantial. It consists of a Tower, Nave and Chancel. The Tower and Nave were erected four years ago, the Chancel was recently added. The Tower is connected with the Nave by an arch, against the splay of which, on the north side, stands a Font, of stone. The Nave is 24 by 60 feet in the clear, and 36 feet in height, from the floor. The windows are small, and placed high in the walls, the sills being nearly ten feet from the floor. They are filled with stained glass, from designs given by Mr. Weir, of West Point. The organ stands in an arched recess on the north side, which, with the corresponding arch, or little transept, on the south side, makes the ground plan cruciform. The Chancel is 18 by 19 feet, making the length of the Church, in the clear, 92 feet, 8 inches. There are three steps to the Chancel, and three more to the Sacrament and Altar. There are two double lancet windows on both north and south sides, the walls on the east end being almost entirely covered by a picture, painted and presented to the Church by Mr. Weir. There are open roofs to both Nave and Chancel; that of the former being much plainer than that of the latter. The Sacrament is paved with encaustic tiles, and the floor of the Presbytery and Choir with marble; the Aisles and Tower being flagged with stone. The Altar, and all the steps of the Chancel, are of white marble. There are three Sedillas, of black walnut, on the south side, with canopies, and a Credence against the opposite wall. There are three stalls on each side of the Presbytery, with desks in front of them, and a Fold-stool in the middle, facing the Altar. The Lectern stands on the south side, near the chancel arch, and a small octagonal Pulpit stands partly on the Nave, and against the splay of the north side of the arch. A door, on the north side, between the stalls and arch, opens into the Vestry. There are seats arranged for a double choir on each side of the Nave, next to the Chancel.

On the evening of Wednesday, the Bishop preached at St. Paul's Church, a most able and impressive discourse, from Isaiah i. 2, and Hebrews xii. 25. His subject was the increased guilt and danger of Christians, in reference to the sins denounced in ancient Israel; dwelling particularly on inordinate devotion to worldly gains and pleasures. The services were performed by the Rev. Dr. Haight, and the Rev. Mr. Southard, of New York.

On the ensuing morning, (Thursday, 7th,) at the Church of the Holy Cross, the Bishop admitted to the Priesthood the Rev. John Ireland Tucker, minister of the Church, and the Rev. John W. Shackelford, missionary at Cohoes, Albany co. The Rev. R. B. Fairbairn presented the candidates. The Rev. Samuel Buel, Rector of Christ Church, Poughkeepsie, began the morning service; the Rev. Joshua Weaver, Rector of Trinity Church, West Troy, and the Rev. A. T. Twing, Rector of Trinity Church, Lansingburgh, reading the lessons. The prayers were intoned by the Rev. Mr. Geer. The Bishop preached a sermon most appropriate to the occasion, and highly instructive; and afterwards administered the Holy Communion, assisted by the Rev. Dr. Haight, and Rev. Messrs. Buel and Southard. The music was the same as on the previous day, save that a different chant, one of Aldrich's, was taken for the Venite and the Psalms for the day.

There were at these services, beside the Clergymen already mentioned, the Rev. Philip E. Milledoler, M. D., Rector of Bethesda Church, Saratoga Springs; the Rev. G. Jarvis Geer, Rector of Christ Church, Ballston Spa; and, at the Consecration, the Rev. Edward Lounsbury, Rector of St. John's Church, Troy; and at the ordination, the Rev. Wm. Payne, Rector of St. George's Church, Schenectady.

New York Churchman.

Maine.—The meeting of the Board of Missions at Bangor, on the 22d and 23d of November, was, in consequence of an interruption of steamboat navigation through the gale of the 20th and 21st, attended only by the Bishop, and the Rev. Messrs. Bent, Burgess and Durborow. On the evening of Tuesday, the 21st, the Rev. Mr. Burgess preached on Isaiah xxxii. 20. 'Blessed are ye that sow beside all waters.' On Wednesday afternoon, at the request of the Rector, the Bishop catechized the children of the parish; a most interesting company, whose acquaintance with that form of sound words was so uniformly complete that it drew his warmest commendation. On the evening of that day, the Bishop preached on the words, 'But ye, brethren, be not weary in well doing.' On the afternoon of Thursday, the Rev. Mr. Durborow preached on the rest that remaineth for the people of God; and in the evening, the sermon was again by the Bishop, on the work of faith, and labor of love, and patience of hope.

The Rev. G. C. V. Eastman has been transferred from the diocese of New Hampshire to that of Maine, and is engaged as an instructor at Bangor, hoping also to perform some missionary labors.

On the Sunday next before Advent, the Bishop confirmed six persons in Christ Church, Gardiner.

Virginia.—We regret to learn that the new Episcopal Church at Charlottesville, Va., was destroyed by fire on Saturday night. The fire broke out about 8 o'clock in the evening, originating from a furnace in the cellar, and baffled all attempts to extinguish it. It was burned to the ground—nothing saved and no insurance.

Ohio.—ORDINATION.—On Sunday, December 3d, the Rt. Rev. C. P. McIlvaine, D. D., ordained in Christ Church, Springfield, to the order of Deacons, Mr. Chandler Robbins. The Rev. Messrs. Fitch and Stout assisted in morning prayer and the lessons. The Rev. Mr. Arnett preached the sermon, and the Rev. Mr. Stout presented the candidate.

EPISCOPAL VISITATION.—Bishop McIlvaine has recently visited the following parishes, viz:—Trinity, Cleveland; St. Paul's, do.; Grace, do.; St. John's, Ohio City; St. John's, Dover; St. Andrew's, Elyria; St. Paul's, Norwalk; Christ Church, Huron; Grace Church, Sandusky City; St. Paul's, Lower Sandusky; St. Paul's, Maumee; Trinity, Toledo; Christ Church, Springfield, and the incipient parish at Bellevue.—Western Episcopalian.

South Carolina.—We copy with pleasure, from the Charleston Gospel Messenger, the following gratifying account of the extension of the Church in South Carolina.

GRACE CHURCH, CHARLESTON.—This building was consecrated Nov. 9. Morning prayer was said by the Rector, Rev. W. W. Spear; the psalter by the Rector of St. Michael's, Rev. P. T. Keith; the lesson by the Rector of St. Peter's, Rev. W. H. Barnwell; the sermon by the Bishop; the 'sentence of consecration' by the Rector of St. Thomas', Rev. E. Phillips.

NEW CHURCH IN BARNEWELL DISTRICT.—A meeting of several citizens of Barnewell was held in the Masonic Hall, on Saturday, the 18th ult. The Rev. T. J. Young, of Charleston, being present, was invited to take the Chair, and A. P. Aldrich was appointed Secretary. The Chairman having opened the meeting by prayer, and stated its object, the following resolutions were presented by A. P. Aldrich, and unanimously adopted:

1. Resolved, That we do hereby organize ourselves as a Congregation of the Protestant Episcopal Church, in the Diocese of South Carolina; and express our willingness to conform to the Constitution and Canons of the General Convention, and the Constitution and Canons of the Convention of the Diocese, which are now, or hereafter may be enacted by authority of the same.

2. Resolved, That our Church shall be designated "The Church of the Holy Apostles."

CHURCH OF THE HOLY COMMUNION.—There being no place of worship in Cannonsboro', the Bishop requested two of the clergy to act as Missionaries for that borough, and institute a Church like that, whose name it has adopted, which was founded by the Rev. Dr. Muhlenburgh, in New York city, to have no pews, but be free to all who desire to attend its services and teachings. It was opened for public worship on the 21st Sunday after Trinity, at the residence of the late Bishop Bowen.

JOURNAL OF THE BISHOP OF THE DIOCESE OF SOUTH CAROLINA.—EXTRACTS FROM IT.—Aug. 11. At Aiken, I said evening prayer—the lessons being read by the Rector, Rev. J. H. Cornish. The roof of this beautiful church, which had been injured by the fall of a tree, it was gratifying to learn, had been thoroughly repaired by the contributions of the people; and their subscription for the purchase of an organ, was not to be called for, in consequence of one of fine tone, made by the celebrated Mr. Erben, having been presented to them by a lady of Charleston. I had the pleasure of listening to the organ, well managed, and accompanied by a skilful choir. At night conducted family prayer.

August 13th. Sunday. Same place—visited the Sunday School, and catechized about 20 children. Morning prayer, the litany and the sermon, were by the Rector. I read the Ante-communion service. After evening prayer, which I said, I lectured on the Lord's prayer. At night, at the Boarding House, I conducted family prayer. In the country, surrounding Aiken, religious services are held at one place, steadily, and at two others, occasionally, by the Rector, and a candidate for holy orders licensed as a Lay reader.

16th. Same place, read evening prayer.

19th. At St. John's, Hampstead, I read morning prayer.

24th. St. Bartholomew's day, same place. I read the Ante-communion service and preached; morning prayer was said by the Rector.

27th. Sunday, same place—I officiated in the desk, at the altar, and in the pulpit, and before morning prayer in the church, catechized the children at the closing of the Sunday School. I also said evening prayer and preached.

24th. Sunday after Ember week, one of the stated times for ordination, Joseph Baynard Seabrook and Edward Charles Logan, were admitted to the holy order of deacons—presented by the Rev. J. S. Hanckel; the exhortation was by the Bishop.

CLERICAL CHANGES.—Rev. M. Mahan has accepted the charge of Grace Church, Van Voorst, N. J.

The Rev. M. M. Wells, having accepted a call to Grace Church, Canton, St. Lawrence co., desires letters and papers for him to be directed accordingly.

The Rev. G. B. Gibson, having taken charge of the Church of the Holy Innocents, near West Point; his post office address will be West Point.

The Rev. Robert J. Walker, late Missionary at Rushville, Illinois, has removed into the diocese of New York. Address care of Samuel Brown, Esq., 82 Wall street, New York.

Floating Church of the Redeemer.

This Church will be towed from Bordentown to the foot of Spruce Street, on Wednesday December 27th.

Two large steamboats are engaged for the occasion and on board of them and the Floating Church, there will be room for 1500 persons. Every arrangement has been made to make the excursion agreeable. Due notice will be given in the daily papers of the time and place of starting. A fuller notice of the excursion was received too late for insertion.

Reflections on the Closing Year.

BY MRS. H. W. RICHTER.

"Let thought contemplative explore
This fleeting state of things, the vain delights,
The fruitless toils, that still our search elude,
As thro' the wilderness of life we rove."

WARTON.

On this calm shadowy day, when nature seems to pause, ere putting off her summer robes of joy; when a dim, soft colouring rests over all things, while from the still and fading woods the seared leaves descend and rustle to the ground; when flowers hang their heads, as if mourning their approaching decay, how naturally comes retrospection—the moral of the closing year! For as surely as spring points onward to the future, do the mellow shades of autumn invite to the past. How soon will the "rain, beating the wintry pane," tell that yet another year has joined the mass of ages gone—another page is added to life's volume, another wave has broken on the "solemn shore!"

The deep note of time, reverberating through the misty air, seems more than ever to tell of his rapid flight: the rushing of his "broad pinions, swifter than the winds," seems well nigh perceptible. But where wanders thought as the shadows of the year are lengthening? To the long cypress-bordered vale, where memory garners up the loved and the lost. Are we not all too prone to fly back to the busy world again, when a sad vacancy has been left in our circle? Imperceptibly over that remembrance the ever-increasing mists of oblivion are spreading; the dial of our recollection advances not beyond that last meeting: it is already becoming dim; distance is every moment blending it more and more with the shadowy past; and we are insensibly (in the midst of our sorrow) hewing out to ourselves other sources of interest, from which the lamented one is excluded—new hopes, new fears, in which that once dear and familiar being has no part.

So much for merely earthly remembrance. Like voyagers down a river, continually leaving fellow-passengers on the banks, we spend but little time in speculating on their destiny, knowing that the swift-rolling tide is bringing our own haven so near: a day, an hour, a moment, and we may form part of that innumerable company! But a far deeper and more solemn sound is in the question, where, how, and whither has the spirit fled? In what is the ever active immaterial portion occupied? in what distant world, all unknown to us, a denizen? how travelling through long eternity, and how associated? Thrilling to the very heart are thoughts like these, when we would fain burst the bound which fetters our finite intelligence, and explore the infinite. Without verging on an impious and vain inquiry after the things unseen, it is still good for us in reverence and humility to indulge these thoughts ere the sunshine and the breeze, with the thousand influences of busy life at war with the meditative mood, disperse our musings. A form familiar with our ancient love, our every-day associations, has been summoned away: a fellow-pilgrim has reached before us the bourne from whence they return not, the journey's end, to which each flying hour is bringing us the nearer; for our moments travel post. How distinctly, how clearly do the look and voice of the departed come before the "mind's eye!" Why come they not again? "The grave is their home:" those eyes will no more beam on us the reciprocal expression of kindred souls; the step comes not, the voice will greet us no more; and we still journey on. It is vain to check the exploring thought after things connected with our most solemn anticipations, fully known as these and all other mysteries will be hereafter: we have a divine promise that they will be so: humbly and gratefully we rely on the Father of spirits, who hath given us this hope; and, while still "prisoners of earth," we dimly and imperfectly speculate on the nature of that future world, concerning which it hath not entered, nor is it permitted to our thoughts to conceive. How impassable the barrier! how immutable the law! how merciful the decree! For how should creatures of a day, encompassed by earth and earthly things, comprehend a state all mind, all soul, all spirit, or by whatever name we may call this "vital spark of heavenly flame?" In vain would we essay to fathom our own mysterious being; creatures of yesterday, yet destined for endless duration; travelling together for a while towards eternity on this little promontory of time, with the waves of change and death for ever altering the company in which we are placed. Yet that company, those associates, we ourselves, to live again, and for ever, beyond the river of death, every moment feeling the decay of our temporary dwelling of clay, yet conscious of the thinking, feeling, acting faculty undecayed, how "poor, yet rich, how abject, how august, how complicate, how wonderful this being!" Our Saviour's answer to one who inquired of him touching the nature and state of souls in the resurrection, conveys a mild reproof to bold and vain inquirers; but how comforting, how exalting the reply: "they are as the angels of God!" conveying perfect assurance of their perfection and bliss. "Neither can they die any more." Who can estimate the extent of sorrow and evil connected with the fatal bound to all our hopes and schemes? However brilliant our destiny, we must leave it; however beloved, we must separate; or, however enlarged our worldly or intellectual wealth, the grave's darkness must shroud all—all for which we have struggled, toiled, and disquieted our hearts in vain; all that we have loved, cherished, and perhaps unwisely valued; all but that treasure placed in no earthly vessels, which through all the distractions and vain cares of time we have laid up beyond the moth and rust which is ever corroding things earthly, and which will be the measure of our estate, our immortal inheritance, in a state of being without bound, and without end.—Church of England Magazine.

Clerical Sore-throat—Management and Cultivation of the Voice.

Another exciting cause in Clergymen may be that whilst reading the Liturgy they usually speak above the natural pitch of the voice, or if they do not do this, they at least emphasize their reading by laying stress on particular words. This, it may be said, is also done in ordinary reading, and even in common conversation, but then it arises from the natural and spontaneous burst of feeling, while in the former case, that of reading a prescribed form of words, it must to some extent, be the result of effort and practice, and be perhaps not strictly in accordance with the then state of the mind. Thus that nice adjustment between the mind and the power of utterance, by which the latter easily and naturally obeys the dictates of the former, is less closely kept up, and greater fatigue is the consequence.

On this subject the opinion of Mr. Macready, the eminent tragedian, is deserving of the greatest attention. In a letter addressed to me he says, "Relaxed throat is usually caused, not so much by exercising the organ, as by the kind of exercise, that is, not so much by long or loud speaking as by speaking in a feigned voice. I am not sure that I shall be understood in this statement, but there is not one person in, I may say, ten thousand, who, in addressing a body of people, does so in his natural voice, and this habit is more especially observable in the pulpit. I believe that relaxation of the throat results from violent efforts in these affected tones, and that severe irritation, and often ulceration, is the consequence. The labour of a whole day's duty in a Church is nothing, in point of labour, compared with the performance of one of Shakespeare's leading characters, nor, I should suppose, with any of the very great displays made by our leading statesmen in the Houses of Parliament. I am confident as to the first, and feel very certain that the disorder which you designate as the Clergyman's sore throat is attributable, generally, to the mode of speaking, and not to the length of time or violence of effort that may be employed. I have known several of my former contemporaries on the stage suffer from sore throat, but I do not think, among those eminent in their art, that it could be regarded as a prevalent disease."

There is an article of clothing in common use, and especially among the Clergy, which, though it has no great connexion with the subject of cold, has yet in another way an injurious influence on the health of the vocal organs. The human body is so constituted throughout, that every organ called into moderate exercise is strengthened by that exercise; but if mechanical impediments are thrown in the way, and the free natural movements are hampered and obstructed, action becomes fatiguing. Everyone is at once sensible that it would be more laborious to walk with the legs tied than in the natural way. Why is it that we do not as readily see that it is more fatiguing to speak at length, and in a raised tone, whilst the throat is confined in a stiff unyielding cravat, than if it were left at liberty for the free action of the muscles? Many cases of dysphonia clericorum are probably aggravated by the increased efforts necessary to counterbalance the restraint of this self-imposed fetter.

The cultivation and improvement of the voice ought to be a part of the physical education of the young, and were this more attended to at a time when the organs are yet flexible, the difficulties which beset the practice of public speaking would be incalculably lessened. It is great inconsistency to lavish all our care on storing the mind, neglecting altogether one chief medium by which those stores may be made available to the benefit of others. It is true that no cultivation will make a bad voice a good one, but the words of Quintilian—Augur autem sicut omnia ita vocis quoque bona cura et negligentia minuantur—are as true now as they were on the day they were written. Care should be taken very early with children to make them articulate distinctly, and they should be habituated to form those regular movements of the lips, tongue, and palate, on which the correct formation of the different letters depend. As they grow up they should be practised, according to their age and ability, in reading aloud, reciting or declaiming, great care being taken not to allow them to pitch their voices in too high or too low a key, to use a false or unnatural emphasis, or to get into that wretched sing-song manner common with children. Many of the defects which young persons fall into in reading or repeating, arise, I am persuaded, from the too common mistake of setting them, for the benefit of their elders, to read what they do not understand, or what does not interest them. The mind not being engaged, the reading becomes mechanical, and they acquire a habit of raising and sinking their voices without any reference to the sense. What they read should, generally, be in short sentences and in perspicuous language. The narrative and dramatic forms are peculiarly adapted to cultivate the inflexions of the voice. It is a good practice occasionally in reading dialogue for the teacher to take one part, and the pupil another, by which means interest is kept up, and the young reader, entering into the spirit of the character, learns, without difficulty, to give the natural emphasis to every sentence. Let any one compare the animated manner in which an intelligent boy will relate something which interests him, with the lifeless tones and vicious emphasis which he will employ in reading through some dry, and to him unintelligible task, and he will soon be convinced that there can be no eloquence where the mind is uninterested: and if the habit of mere mechanical intonation be carried, as it sometimes is, from the schoolroom to the pulpit and desk, the effect is at once fatiguing to the hearers and the speaker.

Young persons ought never to be suffered to read too long, so as to become fatigued, by which means serious injury may result to the vocal organs. Nor should they be urged to read too loud, or in any way to strain their voices. It is not by forced and painful efforts, but by regular and gradual exercise that the voice can be strengthened. They should avoid too frequent or too slow breathing, which may give rise to a kind of hiccup, at once disagreeable, and irritating to the mucous membrane; and as respiration is less free when the stomach is distended with food, reading aloud should never be imposed just after taking a hearty meal.

By a careful education of the voice in childhood and youth, a great advantage is conferred on young men destined for the clerical profession; but even without this advantage something may be done by their own efforts, and with the best natural or acquired help, care must be taken to preserve the vocal organs from injury.

As to the preservation of the voice, in addition to those hints which have already been interspersed through the present chapter, a few remarks must be made.

As by far the most directly exciting cause of dysphonia clericorum is strained, immoderate, and irregular exercise of the voice, the main precaution must be to moderate and equalize as much as possible those efforts; and here there are three rocks to be avoided, on which Clergymen, especially young Clergymen, are very apt to split, viz., a rapid utterance, a feigned unnatural key, and long sermons. Rapid utterance is a habit which is at once exhausting and injurious to the speaker, the vocal organs being kept on an incessant strain, and also very unprofitable to the hearers, especially to those of the unlettered class, as their minds can seldom take in ideas very rapidly, and whilst they are yet striving to catch the meaning of one sentence the speaker is gone off to another leaving their comprehension far behind. Any one who will talk to the poor on this subject, will often hear the complaint, "Mr. So and So is a very fine preacher, but he speaks so fast, I can hardly follow him." A deliberate and distinct utterance is a great help to persons of this class, and would certainly tend much to prevent over-fatigue in the speaker.

The evil of speaking in a feigned or unnatural voice has already been touched on in the former part of this treatise, and the opinion of Mr. Macready on the point given. It is, unfortunately, rather difficult to convince persons that this is the case with themselves, whilst those who know them and their natural tone in conversation can easily detect the difference. This feigned tone is sometimes adopted under an idea of giving increased solemnity or impressiveness to the reading; but as nothing that is unnatural is really impressive, it is a great mistake. If the feeling exists, the tone will follow; if it do not, the remedy is to strive after it rather than its expression.

But length of effort is, after all, the greatest mischief. It is much to be regretted that the services of our Church, originally meant to be three distinct ones, should be so mingled as to extend to an inconvenient and fatiguing length. The remedy for this does not lie within the power of individual Clergymen, and all they can do is to take care that that part of the service, the sermon, which is left to their discretion, shall not be protracted till preacher and hearer are both, though in different degrees, exhausted. Between the "fifteen minutes" satirized by Cowper, and the hour or more to which many admirable addresses extend, there is a medium: and it is worth while for our zealous Ministers to consider, whether the undoubted wear and tear to their own physical powers in such long discourses, is at all compensated by increased benefit and profit to their hearers; whether, when one weighty idea, one profitable train of thought be well laid into the mind, much is gained by introducing still another and another, till memory is overloaded and former impressions weakened. This is especially the case with the young, the illiterate, the aged, and the invalid; and these four classes deserve much consideration in every congregation. "Beau secret," says La Bruyère, "que celui de renfermer beaucoup de sens en peu de paroles." There is, therefore, a moral reason for forbearance in addition to the physical reason, with which our business more especially lies, and this physical reason is very strong. I have myself examined the throats of Clergymen after pulpit efforts of considerable length, accompanied with rapid impassioned utterance, and I have seen, even where no disease has resulted, the mucous membrane in a state so highly congested as to need but little additional excitement to produce disease.

Examples are not wanting of those who, even with natural defects of voice, have, by judicious management, become good speakers, and been enabled to practise public speaking without detriment to themselves. The instance of Demosthenes is too trite to need quotation. Cicero also says of himself—"My body at this time was exceedingly weak and emaciated, my neck long and small, which is a habit thought liable to great risk of life if engaged in any fatigue and labour of the lungs; and it gave the greater alarm to those who had a regard for me, that I used to speak without any remission or variation, with the utmost stretch of my voice and great agitation of my body; when my friends, therefore, and physicians advised me no more to meddle with causes, I resolved to run any hazard rather than quit the hopes of glory which I proposed to myself from pleading; but when I considered that by managing my voice and changing my way of speaking I might both avoid all danger and speak with more ease, I took a resolution of travelling into Asia, merely for an opportunity of correcting my manner of speaking, &c."

These observations cannot better be closed than by the following brief rules, given by a late eminent Minister of our Church, who, in his day, filled an important station at the University of Cambridge.

"Form your voice, not in your chest, nor in your throat, nor in the roof of your mouth, but simply with your lips and teeth.

"Deliver your sermons not pompously, but as a professor, ex cathedra, and as a father in his family.

"Let there be the same kind of pause and of emphasis, as a man has in conversation when he is speaking on some important subject."

The exercise of the voice, under proper regulations, is so far from being injurious, that it is positively beneficial to health, expanding the chest and strengthening its muscles, and thus aiding the important function of respiration.—Dysphonia Clericorum, by Dr. Mackness.

Theological Course at Burlington College.

The readers of the Missionary have had presented to them, the Preparatory, and Collegiate, course of study, at Burlington College. They have also had before them the plans for Pastoral Training, and Pastoral Work, of which it is designed to be the centre. They have now the course of Theological Study. It goes into partial operation, with the beginning of the current year, and will gradually work itself into completeness. There are now seven students in Theology connected with the College, and the number will be increased in the course of the year: while, of the present under-graduates, there are not a few, whose hearts the Lord hath touched, to desire the service of His altar. Provision is made for the direction of their studies in three of the four departments, and will be completed without much delay.

It will be seen at once, that this portion of the enterprise throws itself, in simple faith, upon the Church. The Scholastic and Collegiate departments, are self-supporting; and furnish the ability, through God's blessing, to support some, who must otherwise remain uneducated. But, of the Theological Students, no compensation can ever be expected. Two, and ultimately, three, Theological Professorships; an ample library; and the means of living, to such students as may not support themselves as Teachers, or otherwise, in connection with the Church work here, are just and necessary demands upon the bounty of Churchmen. Miss Rachel B. Wallace, of Burlington, by her bequest of $2000, to this last named use, has set a noble example. For the rest, the work will be pursued, in the cheerful confidence, that GOD WILL PROVIDE. The immediate want of the case is the necessary text books, and books of most immediate reference.

COURSE OF THEOLOGICAL STUDY.

SUBJECTS.

- I. DOGMATIC: to teach.
- II. CRITIC: to confirm.
- III. HISTORIC: to illustrate and apply.
- IV. HOMILETIC, LITURGIC AND PASTORAL: to use.
 - i. Dogmatic: The Creeds. (Pearson.)
 - ii. Critic: The original text of both Testaments.
 - iii. Historic: Original Documents, with Syllabus and Lectures.
 - iv. Homiletic, Liturgic and Pastoral: Lectures, with constant practical exercises.

DISTRIBUTION, AS TO TIME.

- First Year—1. Dogmatic: the Creeds to the Incarnation.
 2. Critic: the Pentateuch; St. Matthew, St. Mark, St. Luke.—LXX, in reference.
 3. Historic: to the birth of Christ.
 4. Homiletic, Liturgic and Pastoral.
 Patristic Reading, as indicated.

Second Year—1. Dogmatic: the Creeds, as far as the belief in the Holy Ghost, inclusive.

2. Critic: the Psalms, Isaiah; St. John, the Acts, Romans, Hebrews.—LXX, in reference.

3. Historic: the first four centuries.

4. Homiletic, Liturgic and Pastoral.
 Patristic Reading, as indicated.

Third Year—1. Dogmatic: the remainder of the Creeds.

2. Critic: Job, Daniel; Gospels in Harmony, remaining Epistles.—LXX, in reference.

3. Historic: to the Reformation, inclusive, with its results.

4. Homiletic, Liturgic and Pastoral.
 Patristic reading as indicated.

The Infidel Controversy.
 The Episcopal Controversy.
 The Liturgical Controversy.
 The Sacramental Controversy.
 The Romish Controversy.

* * Incidental Controversies, as the Arian, the Pelagian, the Calvinistic, and the like, will be treated, as they occur in the course, dogmatically, critically, and historically.

It must be understood, from the beginning, that the course here set down, is to be pursued. In the Theological Department, as in the Collegiate, there is to be no option of studies, and no partial course. In the one, as in the other, full allowance will always be made for equivalent attainments. Acquisition, and not time, will be the measure of advancement.

To such Students as shall complete the course, and, at the end of another year, sustain the prescribed examination, the degree of Bachelor in Divinity will be accessible.—The Missionary.

From the Irish Ecclesiastical Journal.

On the Validity of English Ordination.

SIR,—It is not, I believe, generally known that the controversy with respect to English ordination has been revived in America. It was believed that Roman Catholic writers had become ashamed of the Nag's Head fable, and this belief was confirmed by the strong manner in which Dr. Lingard has declared, that there was no doubt of Archbishop Parker's consecration. Bishop Kenrick, however, has renewed the controversy in America, and with great unfairness published, as a supplement to his work, Bishop Milner's answer to Bishop Elrington's Refutation of Ward's Controversy of Ordination. Bishop Kenrick knew that in a reply Bishop Elrington had so successfully vindicated his first pamphlet, and shown the misstatements of his opponent, that Dr. Milner relinquished the controversy. Indeed it would have been impossible, except by misquotations, to have answered the reply to Ward, of which Dr. Parr said, "that he never read a controversial work in which the refutation was so direct and so complete as that contained in the answer to Ward;" and he recommended that the work should be printed in a cheap form, and distributed by the Irish Bishops among their clergy. To this his correspondent, Bishop Alexander, justly remarked, that the work related not to the Irish but to the English Bishops.

Bishop Kenrick states that before the validity of English ordinations can be established, it must be shown,

1. That Parker was certainly consecrated at Lambeth.
2. That Barlow had himself been certainly consecrated.
3. That the form used in Parker's consecration was certainly valid.

Now the second of these is not at all necessary, for if any one of the four Bishops who assisted at the consecration had been consecrated, the consecration would have been valid. The defenders of the Anglican succession believe that the four were consecrated, and they have undertaken a more difficult task than was absolutely necessary, conscious of their strength. Of the first, we assent firmly to the conclusion of Dr. Lingard, that the consecration is beyond doubt; but it has long ceased to be a matter of importance in the controversy with the Roman Catholics. The present English Bishops can trace their consecration independently of Archbishop Parker; they can all trace their descent from Antonio de Dominis, Archbishop of Spalato, who assisted at the consecration of Bishops Felton and Mountaigne. Bishop Felton consecrated Archbishop Laud, and from him can be traced the consecrations of Archbishops Sutton, Howley, Sumner, Vernon and Musgrave, who consecrated every Bishop now in England. Again: the Irish succession has never been called in question by the Roman Catholics, because Loftus, the first Archbishop sent over by Queen Elizabeth, was consecrated by Archbishop Curwen in St. Patrick's Cathedral, who had himself been consecrated by Bishop Bonner, according to the Romish ritual. The consecration of Archbishop Laud can also be traced to Hampton, Archbishop of Armagh, who was consecrated by the successor of Archbishop Loftus. Still further: Bishops Thornburgh and Fuller were translated from Limerick to England. To one of these may be traced the consecration of Archbishop Sheldon, and to the other that of Archbishop Tennyson, and to either of them the consecration of every Bishop now in England. With regard to succession, then, the controversy with the Roman Catholics must be at an end. The third question alone remains, and to this the answer is very brief: if the form be invalid, so was the form of consecration in the Roman Church for many centuries,—so is that in the Greek and Syrian Churches, both acknowledged by the see of Rome.

To examine Bishop Kenrick's arguments would lead to a discussion far beyond the limits within which I must confine myself. I merely wish to show that the principles upon which he proceeds are untenable by members of his own Church, and to draw the attention of members of our Church to the plain and uncompromising assertion which he puts forward: "The Catholic Church will never recognise the English Orders; of this all must be convinced."

I am, Sir, your obedient servant,

T. C. D.

Wishes.

"Wishes are parents of large families of idle, vain dreams and air castles. Wishes usually respect a good not within reach. But that wish brings up the contemplated good, and gives fancy wings, and the vain and trifling mind flies abroad on all sorts of excursions in all directions. He who loves to wish, generally loves, also, to give his imagination the reins. And the idle wish will start him off on a journey of imaginings, and he is far gone, from the sober and substantial realities of life. He comes back drooping and languid from the profitless excursion, and greatly unfitted for the actual serious business of life. It was the idle wish that sent him away from home. He gained nothing by the journey but mental emptiness and some stripes of conscience, if it were sharp enough to discern and act in view of such folly.

"Wishes are sources of self deception. How many exclaim and that countless times, 'I wish I were a Christian—I wish my heart were right—I wish I had my portion with the people of God—I wish I knew more of the Scriptures,' &c. This wishing for good things, 'tis believed, is not seldom taken for real desires of the heart after spiritual good: It is taken as evidence of a mind somewhat, at least, set towards God and holy things. There seems, therefore, to be some goodness in it. Good wishes are mistaken for goodness—are put in the place of goodness itself—the spurious in the place of the genuine coin. Good wishes are a very cheap substitute, and it is to be feared a very common one, for prayer, effort, zeal, and energy in doing good. The one is so much easier than the other, that with the additional motive that such wishes have a specious appearance of real goodness they take the place of doing good."—Pascal.

Religious Charity Publication Societies.

The following assertions, I consider, carry in themselves the proof of their truth.

1st. I say these societies and all they do are a tax on the honest industry of men engaged in the book business. They are wrong in principle; and I say, as they are managed, they do not make books cheap, nor can they make them so. Somebody pays more for them than would be paid if they were produced in the regular way of the trade. I defy any one to show this is not the fact.

2d. I say that in doing this prodigal and expensive work, they drive a large and incalculable amount of capital into injurious channels of publishing, and break down and discourage every man in the business who is restrained by his principles from engaging in publishing, and selling works of doubtful utility. I say they have done this work already in the name of religious charity; and I think it does show that charity has undertaken a work to which it was not called, and which cannot prosper for good. Let the contrary be shown if possible.

3d. Men, generally, who have made fortunes in other branches of business, are called to the management of these institutions; and they thus carve out work for charity to do, which destroys a branch of trade by virtually burdening it with the support of these charity shops. I know one publisher was waited on by a liberal and wealthy merchant, and told if he did not give him a certain quantity of a book he had published at cost, that he might sell it and give the profits to a poor Church, he would publish the same book to effect that end. This man did not think of making his own business build up the poor Church, but forcibly taxes his poor neighbour's for it, and so it is with the wealthy managers of these publishing societies. Remember the ewe-lamb in the parable. They carve out work against another branch of trade which ruins it; and if the same plan had been pursued with regard to that branch of business by which they made their fortunes, they would have had no ability and no time to spare from the support of their families for such an object. The same principle applied to all branches of industry and trade, would soon make a society of poor men, and leave none with ability to give. Does not this view show that there is an equal want of true heart and true policy in the management of these establishments, and that they are perverting the Christianity of our day—making it worldly, selfish, calculating, bustling and business-like? I must say that I can see it in no other light, and I think the bitter fruit of evil will more and more appear. I ask the Christian public to pause and weigh the considerations I have offered. I know there is principle and there is charity in Christian men, and I know that truth must prevail with them at last. Streams of charity must, to be healthful, be fed from springs of industry. Charity, in disturbing these, kills itself.

4th. I say that these societies, doing business on the treasury of the Lord, pay higher salaries than any private book concerns do or can pay, and that this is the temptation for them, through their agents, to set so sharply for money making. It is this spirit, this prodigality in expense, which has prompted them to open stores for the retail of general books; to build up large and expensive warehouses; to publish annuals, pictures and illustrated books; to bind them up in the most expensive styles; to vie in all the arts and expenses of the trade. They thus use Christian charity in ornamenting books to bring money, not in publishing cheap religious knowledge, as they were created to do. It is a monstrous abuse of their trust. It is a farce to call this doing service to religion. It is a war on the private enterprise by which charity lives. I say that in these respects and others, these societies have violated their charters—the Tract Society in publishing books—in setting up to supply the country with books, and selling them under cost to the trade—the American Sunday School Union in opening a general religious bookstore, and going into all the arts of manufacturing and selling books—the Presbyterian Board in following suit, in publishing works of art and ornament, and vying with the world for trade. They have thus become money making, secular concerns, and as charity supports their expenses and bears their losses, no private capital and enterprise can stand up against them. Not one of them could have obtained a charter had this been their avowed aim and policy from the start. They deserve to be discountenanced by all honest men; they must be, by all who are not willing to aid them in preying upon the enterprise and labour of the country. A rich man gives them a set of stereotype plates with engravings, another gives them this, and another that, and thus the capital of one branch of business is employed to destroy another. These men plan and give money to execute the measures that work the ruin of others, and think all the while they are doing God service. They invite the public to patronize these charity institutions instead of men who give all their time, talents and means to publish books, quite as useful as any these institutions can publish. They ask no charity, no praise for their work, and nothing but thoughtless inconsideration can induce any right-minded person to give to, or buy of, these societies, in the conceit that they are more meritorious, less selfish. They are doing a good, an equal good with their own means—these societies are only using the charity of others for the same purpose. Which is most to be praised, most to be encouraged by sensible people? Let good sense answer. That is all.

5th. I say that twice as many religious books are published in the country as ought to be, whether we regard the interests of publishers or the interests of religion. No sooner is a good book issued than it is lost sight of in the clutter about another, and thus the best books are displaced and little read. A smattering knowledge of each is even more than can be looked for in such a state of things; and these Societies are responsible for this redundancy. The two S. S. Unions publish twice as many books as can be useful. The multiplication of children's books is the distinguishing folly of the age. It is an injury to the children in the first place, and in the second, it is an abominable waste of sacred funds. But these Societies must do and report a great business; and to please the children and make sales, they must embellish their works with gilt and pictures. Such a variety in their issues is a nuisance, and I believe, is doing the children of the country more harm than good. I was once a child, and I got up to manhood without these helps, and I do not know that it took me longer than it does children now-a-days; but this I know that the reading of such books is a-going to make nobody wise. One seed of knowledge planted in the heart, one principle of truth mastered in the mind, is worth more as a basis of moral and intellectual growth, than all these societies can do by all their fictions, and stories, and illustrations, a thousand fold more multiplied. A few first books and catechisms, and the societies could with profit to the rising generation, be excused from doing any more; but they keep the mill grinding, and why? because they must make money to sustain their expenses. All they make, it is said, goes to meet expenses; and hence if they sell ten instead of fifty thousand dollars worth of books in a year at one third profit, it will make quite a difference with those who take the profits, and hence this flooding the Church and country with juvenile books and those in a costly and saleable style. I know no other rational view of the case, if it is true that these societies do not lay up money and turn it into capital, and it seems to be admitted that they do not. The Methodist book concern has a sinking fund for the benefit of the ministry, and it is fast making it a business church, and its ministers book peddlers. The Presbyterian Board has or is about, I am told, to adopt the same plan. Can it be possible that the wise fathers of that Church are willing to hold out such a bait to its rising ministry? Instead of teaching them to rely for support on Christian liberality and the favor of Providence, it tempts them to become supporters of an Institution in which they have a selfish interest by becoming share-holders in its profits. It is a shocking perversion of the office and end of the Christian ministry, and the evil effects of it must sooner or later appear. I am willing that my character for wisdom should sink with the failure of this prediction. The wisdom of God's designs will appear at last, however they may be obscured and flooded over with contrivances of our own. There is more sagacity in faith than in our invention, for well-doing. And if we acted on this truth as a Church, and let publishing and business alone, our wisdom would appear. The ministry would be relieved from many temptations. Their time and sensibility could be more exclusively given to their work, and grateful and improved hearers would quickly attest the change.

I am now prepared to offer the opinion that, if the Presbyterian and the Baptist Boards, the Methodist Book Concern, the Episcopal Sunday School Union, the E. K. Society, the American Tract Society, the American S. S. Union, the American Bible Society, were all blotted out of existence, and their stereotype plates sunk to the bottom of the sea, the cause of religion and the best welfare of society would not seriously suffer by it. The church's millions of charity would be saved, and she restored to her scriptural vocation. Books of all descriptions would be as cheap and as plenty as they are now. Industry would be thriving in this branch of trade, and its capital would be vying to suit the public taste in the style and cheapness of religious books. Sectarianism, stiffened in its back by the moral effect of these associations, so that it will sooner break than bend, would begin to melt away, and religion everywhere be more liberal. It would not appear before the world as if it had been run in some physical mould and was not accountable for its shape, but there would be a sky-openness about it, a largeness of view, in which it would approximate, as it does not now, to the stature of a perfect manhood in Christ Jesus.

I now ask the religious public to withhold all their charities from these publishing institutions; to force them to live by the economical management of their business, as other men do, or fail. This is the only course that can be just to men engaged in the same line of business. You have given them funds to begin with; that was more than your duty: let them now live by their own strength, and you will soon see if they make books cheaper, and learn what you pay for their service. You will learn that the only voice that calls on you for charity is tuned by the profits made in your employ.

The West.

Mr. Editor:

No true friend of the Church can reflect upon the condition of our Domestic Missions without feelings of the most painful character, especially when viewed in reference to our Western field of operation. The following communication is from one who speaks from personal knowledge of that most interesting country, having laboured there until repeated hemorrhage from the lungs compelled him to retire. He has never received nor desired so much as a farthing from the Society; he can therefore have no interest, only so far as he feels for his Brethren, that noble band who count not their own lives dear to accomplish the glorious work, whereunto the Holy Ghost, through the Church, has appointed them. No one can know the West, and the Church in the West, who has not lived and laboured there.

No one can live and labour there without loving it as he can no other country. It is not so much her majestic rivers—her expansive lakes—her boundless plains of variegated beauty and untold fertility, that one so much loves—it is her people—noble, hospitable and free, who are already dotting her vast plains, and, which are soon to teem with countless multitudes, who will tell with overwhelming preponderance upon the destinies of our country and Church, as they shall have been either scattered from or gathered into her arms and fed from her altars. Would you know them? Go to their homes, humble though they be, enter their log cabins, or their more stately abodes, which are fast succeeding their first hurried improvements—partake of their plain though bountiful fare—mingle freely with the people—gain their confidence—enter their hearts,—thus making them feel you are their true friend, and would be their spiritual guide; and verily it will be impossible not to love the West and her people as you can love no other country—no other people.

The object of this is not to analyse the various feelings and principles which are producing such a lamentable want of spiritual interest in the West; we desire to show that this is a subject of such infinite moment that the earnest attention of the Church should be directed to it in all its vastness of range as well as all its minuteness of detail. We persuade ourselves that this deficiency is less attributable to the want of liberality among the friends of the Church, than to their ignorance of the real condition of the West, the particular genius of her people, and the difficulties attending the missionary efforts of this in many respects peculiar country. Now, we can but flatter ourselves that should their true position be brought to the consideration of the Church, should the noble character of the Western people be fully known by our Eastern friends, I am persuaded they would recognise in them those elementary principles which by care and labour might be wrought into a glorious temple, a safe repository of those divine truths which God has given to His Church, and for the purity of which He will hold her responsible, in that day, when the secrets of all hearts shall be made known. To one who is familiar with that distinctive character by which, to a great extent, the people of the Western Valley stand forth peculiar and alone, they become an object of intense interest to the enlightened Churchman. It must be apparent that no spot on earth can present a more magnificent field of Christian enterprise than this. Who doubts the practicability of this? Surely not the one who knows the Church—its origin—its moral power—and its destination. Not the one who knows the people—their many wants—their pressing necessities—and the anxiety with which they look for a resting place from the almost numberless self-created and self-styled bodies of Christians, which, however, are more like ravenous wolves, who seek to bite and devour each other. It would not be difficult to make good this position, and to present the many points of interest which belong to the Western people, especially that portion of them which most need the energetic labours of the self-denying missionary. Could their Eastern friends, whose love and devotion to the Church cannot be doubted, to whom God has given such abundance, and who do not need urging when they are satisfied of the propriety of giving, they could not hesitate. Could they, from some lofty eminence, survey this immense territory, luxuriating in all its native wealth, capable of sustaining an almost countless multitude of immortals, who seek for the faith, and if they find not the true, will embrace the false. Could they but see this large and still enlarging field ripening for the harvest, and know with what a small amount this great harvest could be gathered into the Church, and these numberless immortals fed with the bread of life—could they but know how small a portion would be requisite to convey the streams of the river of life by every door, through the length and breadth of the land, and place upon its banks a messenger of salvation, who would, with true authority, lift up his voice and cry, "Ho, every one that thirsteth, come ye to the waters." Surely every heart would expand, and every hand would open to replenish the treasury of the Lord, so that all the people might partake both of the bread of life and waters of salvation. Then should we see this moral wilderness blossom as the rose, and the glory of the Lord in His Church, resting upon the habitation of man.

This, Mr. Editor, is the subject I would that some one who wields the pen of a ready writer should present to the Church in all its amplitude and power. Then would there be seen the beautiful developments of that Catholic spirit by which all the body, by joints and bands, having nourishment ministered and knit together, increaseth with the increase of God. Then should we see these little ones in all the vigour of celestial life walking forth in the liberty of the sons of God, and then in their turn would they extend a helping hand to their young and more helpless brethren. Thus would the tide of Christian charity roll onward until swelling against the bases of the rocky mountains, it would rise above its frowning precipice, and pour the glorious tide of salvation upon the dwellers in the valley beneath.

Novelties that Disturb our Peace.

DEAR MR. EDITOR:—

This is indeed a day of "novelties." I have lately been told by an individual of the highest character, and on the strength of a personal knowledge of the fact, of the following specimen of a Fancy Liturgy, habitually used in a prayer meeting of "the Episcopal Denomination" in a populous town of a certain Diocese down South. I presume the Evangelical Knowledge Society have learned from their late disastrous failure in their Calvinistic "Key to the Prayer Book," which you, Mr. Editor, have so laudably exposed to your readers, not to be in too hot haste about their work; and possibly by casting overboard such Hotspurs as Dr. Aydelott, and breaking ground, another time, a little further off, with mask more carefully worn, and intent somewhat better concealed, they may be more prosperous in due time. When that time comes, and they get the public mind of the Church a little more ripe for their improvement of the Prayer Book, I would earnestly commend the subjoined Fancy Liturgy to the careful study of the first Committee of the E. K. S. which shall sit for the purpose of making the Church's services more acceptable, as Dr. Aydelott would say, to our pious brethren of other churches. Verily the "Horæ Liturgicæ" of the Reverend Rector in question, have been favored with some bright and happy conceptions. By the way, I wonder if his Bishop knows what is going on. But, Mr. Editor, I must not detain your readers longer from this delectable morceau. Here it is, then, in the very words of my informant. "First, the Psalter for the day (without introductory sentences) read sitting!! next the Confession; no absolution, though the Rector officiated; then the optional part of the Liturgy (lesser litany) down to the prayer, 'We humbly beseech thee, O Father;' then a few collects from the Communion service; then the Lecture; and, lastly, as a wind-up, a tolerably long extempore prayer! Minister without surplice or gown." "I was called up," says my informant, "to admire; but I only said I should have preferred the Evening Service appointed in the Prayer Book," as who, Mr. Editor, that deserves the name of churchman, would not? This "novelty," it may be well to add, for, in this respect it seems a development of sundry strides beyond what has yet been seen in certain quarters, was exhibited in the Church, not in the Lecture or Sunday School room, which has generally been thought necessary to legitimate these rickety offspring of irregular Puritan hankerings.

OLD TIMES.

For the Banner of the Cross.

A Suggestion.

MR. EDITOR:

There are several Diocesan Institutions which, from the nature of their work, must commend themselves to the sympathies of the Church, but which are allowed to suffer from a want of funds. I allude to the Bishop White Prayer Book Society, the Female Prayer Book Society, and the Bishop White Parish Library Association. The thought has occurred to me, that funds can be procured for these three institutions in a very quiet, and at the same time very effective way, by the adoption throughout this diocese of the following plan.

Let a collection be made in every parish in which the Bishop makes an appointment, at the time of the appointment. In the city this will not be necessary, for another and much more effective arrangement obtains there. But in the country it will prove successful, for much more will be obtained in that way than in any other, and it will be certain.

I would not have the matter formally announced to the congregation during the Bishop's presence, but I would do this; I would have the congregation notified on the Sunday previous. The notice stating the object or objects, for which the collection will be made. Then, when the Bishop is present a statement that "the collection, of which notice has been given, will now be made," will be all that will be necessary.

I suggest the occasion of the Bishop's visit for three reasons.

1. It will insure regularity as to time.
2. It will insure the fact of a collection for one or more of these objects.
3. It will induce a larger collection than at any other time.

In my own parish, I am preparing a plan for monthly collections, which will meet all these cases. I have had one in operation, somewhat similar, during the present year, and hope to carry it out more effectively during the coming year.

There are many parishes where there is no systematical effort, and for want of system, little or nothing is done for the objects I have specified. We require only "a long pull, a strong pull, and a pull altogether," and the good work will go forward.

In a future article, I hope to furnish you with my plan of operations.

An Angel of Mercy.

The following anecdote is related in an address by the Rev. Mr. Prentiss, of Newburyport.

It is said of the saintly George Herbert, the quaint old English Church poet, that once in a walk to Salisbury, to join a musical party, he saw a poor man with a poorer horse that was fallen under his load. They were both in distress and needed present help, which Mr. Herbert perceiving, put off his canonical coat, and helped the poor man to unload, and after to load his horse. The poor man blessed him for it, and he blessed the poor man, and was so like the good Samaritan, that he gave him money to refresh both himself and his horse. Thus he left the poor man; and at his coming to his musical friends at Salisbury, they began to wonder that Mr. George Herbert, which used to be so trim and clean, came into that company so soiled and discomposed. But he told them the occasion; and when one of the company told him "he had disparaged himself by so dirty an employment," his answer was, "that the thought of what he had done would prove music to him at midnight, and that the omission of it would have upbraided and made discord in his conscience whenever he should pass by that place; for if I be bound to pray for all that be in distress, I am sure that I am bound, so far as it is in my power, to practice what I pray for; and let me tell you, I would not willingly pass one day of my life without comforting a sad soul, or showing mercy; and bless God for this occasion." O, how many might have the anxious thoughts which infest often their midnight hours changed into sweeter music, if they would only be more frequently seen with full hands and friendly words, in the abodes of poverty and suffering! These are the places in which to attain one's conscience to midnight harmonies!

The office of this paper has been removed from No. 89 South Fifth street, to the Book store of Mr. R. S. H. George, No. 16 South Seventh street, between Market and Chesnut streets.

Mr. George will act as Agent for the receipt of subscriptions, etc.

THE CLOSING YEAR.—The present number ends another volume of the Banner, and goes forth to greet its readers in the last hours of a closing year.

If "day unto day uttereth speech, and night unto night showeth knowledge," surely year unto year should give lessons of wise instruction to the dying children of earth. Remarks upon a theme like this, to many, seem trite and commonplace. Yet it is well for us to consider that such is generally the character of the most momentous truths, which concern man's highest welfare. The circle of practical truth is necessarily limited, and its narrow compass cannot offer continual variety. And although the wise of earth may regard it as a proof of the lack of wisdom to discourse concerning so trite a theme as the lapse of Time, the allwise Spirit teaches us that wisdom is to be found in the due application of this knowledge. "So teach us to number our days that we may apply our hearts unto wisdom."

The year, which now is numbered with the eternal past, is, more than usually, filled with causes for sober thoughtfulness. Its course has been quickly run, like that of other years, but its short span has been more thickly crowded with events affecting the nations of the earth. In a solemn voice this expiring year re-echoes that invitation of God's Word, "Come, behold the works of the Lord, what desolations He hath made in the earth." War, Pestilence, Famine, have been busy in accomplishing their dread work. It has not been nation lifting the hand against nation, but nations have stained their hands in the blood of their own citizens. The fairest Capitols of the Old World have been desolated by this most cruel warfare. And the crowning act, of this year of conflict, is the most remarkable of all. The Pope has been besieged in his own palace by his own immediate subjects, and a Roman bullet has laid a Roman Cardinal dead at the feet of Rome's sovereign Pontiff!

The year eighteen hundred and forty-eight will be one upon which the future historian will dwell in wonder. It is one upon which the people of the earth, now living, have deep cause to reflect with grave concern. Who can tell what shall be the end of these things? We have seen, perhaps, only the beginning.

The voice of this departing year calls back, from the tomb into which it is descending, to warn the people and nations of the earth against the folly of putting their trust in the power and might of mere earthly resources. The strongest and mightiest of these have been scattered, like feathers before the hurricane's blast. How have the mighty fallen, how have their pride and their strength been brought low, even to the dust! By fearful lessons these truths have been taught, "It is better to trust in the Lord than to put any confidence in man." "It is better to trust in the Lord than to put any confidence in princes."

"Blessed is the nation"—and blessed too is each inhabitant of a world which passeth away—"whose God is the Lord." They can say, amid the changes and chances of this mortal life: in the wreck and ruin with which the track of passing years is strewn: and while Time's rapid course is hurrying them to "the end of all things," "God is our refuge and strength, a very present help in trouble. Therefore will not we fear, though the earth be removed, and though the mountains be carried into the midst of the sea; though the waters thereof roar and be troubled; though the mountains shake with the swelling thereof."

With such a confidence, though the past year must excite solemn reflection, and though the coming year threatens us with Pestilence, we may still wish our Christian readers, one and all, A HAPPY NEW YEAR.

OUR OLD TYPES.—Although the following communication has somewhat of a laden origin, we are constrained to publish it, perhaps injudiciously, from feelings of kindness. We must confess we have never particularly admired the appearance of the parties referred to, yet we would be ungrateful not to own that we have made a convenience of them and often made proof of their worth. It is true they have, now and then, misrepresented us, and occasionally said things for us which might perhaps have been wisely unsaid; yet, on the whole, they have done their part. Though now about to be consigned to an ignoble oblivion, we almost envy them their repose, wherein they shall no longer be troubled with "Selections," "Communications," "Editorials," "New Publications," and "Diocesan Intelligence." Above all we envy the quiet they are to enjoy beyond the reach of those awful calls of—"more copy!" "the Printers are waiting!"

A Valedictory.

MR. EDITOR:

Not being in the habit of writing ourselves, we have employed a scribe to express our feelings, for we can assure you, Sir, though you and others don't think it, there is feeling even in cold lead. We have often when set up by others, been made to say that the world was ungrateful, but we thought to ourselves that this, like many other sayings in the world, was a mere stereotyped phrase, one of those convenient forms which serve to make out a column. Yet now we know, by sad experience, that the world is ungrateful, and that its ingratitude is so extensive that even impassive types must feel it. Here have we been, for a long time past, doing our humble part to circulate religious knowledge. Week after week we have suffered our faces, (which you, Sir, may not admire, but which we at least, regard,) to be daubed with odious black ink, to enlighten the world. We have endured constantly the torture of a heavy press, so that if we had possessed any life in us, it would have been squeezed out of us long ago. We have been passive, willing, obedient slaves, until we are fairly worn out in the service! And now what are our thanks?

Why, Sir, we who have tried to melt others are going to be melted ourselves! Although neither the Editor nor the Publisher of the Banner speak evil of us, yet there is much to be inferred from what is said about our successors. "Beautiful, new type!" What does that mean? Is it not a slur upon the old type? Take care, Sir, take care that your "beautiful new type" serve you as well as we have. Beauty is a dangerous possession. Beware then, Mr. Editor, that you do not be satisfied too much with appearance. People now are very fond of beautiful type, but they want something deeper than this. [The Editor must here express his profound admiration of the wisdom of his laden counsellors. He will try to follow the weighty and solid advice.] And now, Mr. Editor, all we ask is room for a very few words by way of valedictory. People are very fond of valedictories. We have often made them for others, and we ask this last favor for ourselves.

Dear Readers, who have looked upon our faces so long, ye shall see them no more in the columns of the Banner. Henceforth ye are to look upon the "beautiful new type." It is some comfort to think that they will get old and lose their beauty too. But we feel too heavy to indulge in spite. We wish our last expressions to be those of kindness. We therefore beg to say that if we have been the unwilling agents in offending any one, if an unkind word or thought has escaped from us, we hope that the feeling thus excited may sink into oblivion with our forgotten forms. One bright and happy thought casts a sunset gleam over the page on which is imprinted our parting words. Our last use in the Banner will be to express a happy wish. We rejoice that it is not in the "beautiful new type," but in our old and well known characters that the Banner wishes to its Readers, "one and all," A HAPPY NEW YEAR! Such wishes come better from old friends, though their faces be plain, than from new ones, however superior in attractions. A HAPPY NEW YEAR to our readers are the last words of their well-tried friends,

THE OLD TYPES.

In our last number we published the Report of the Bishop White Parish Library Association, and suggested that it would be a good object for a Christmas gift. As this suggestion has, we understand, been kindly acted upon, we beg leave, in publishing the following Report, to hint that it would be an excellent object on which to bestow A NEW YEAR'S GIFT.

For the Banner of the Cross.

The Annual Report of the Female Prayer Book Society.

The Managers of the Female Prayer Book Society had hoped to have presented to their subscribers, in their Annual Report, a more cheering account of their transactions during the past year. They feel consoled by the text, "she hath done what she could," as they feel conscious that they have exerted every energy to meet the numerous applications made to them; but, too frequently, made in vain. From Christ Church they had an appropriation, as they invariably have had, annually, of fifty dollars, but have been forgotten, or never have been thought of by the other churches. From two female members of St. Stephen's church they have annually received the most generous donations. St. Peter's church which has always been their most generous patron, was closed at the season when they usually make a collection for the prayer book societies. It has been said that it is impossible for any person with a reflecting mind to use the Daily Morning and Evening Prayer, with sincerity and devotion, without imbibing a missionary spirit; and the unequalled generosity of the members of St. Peter's church in enabling the managers of the Female Prayer Book Society to send out so many of these eloquent and persuasive assistant Missionaries, corroborates the truth of the assertion. When the Disciples asked our divine Master to teach them to pray, he immediately gave them a form of prayer. How can his followers refuse to furnish the destitute, who know not how to pray, with a formulary which will teach them to pray with the spirit and the understanding also? Next to the Bible, the Prayer Book is the most valuable gift that can be presented, and is the most gratefully received. The invalid finds appropriate expressions for all his wants and desires; and his spirits are cheered by prayer to the God of all comfort, who is his only help in time of need. The despairing criminal, in his cell, uses the language of penitence and faith, when led to the Cross of Christ, by the prayer in the "Visitation of Prisoners," O Saviour of the world, who by thy Cross and precious blood, hast redeemed us, save and help us, we humbly beseech thee, O Lord; and, trusting in the great atonement, he feels his conscience lightened. The Mariner is endued with courage, and enabled to exert his energies in the storm and tempest by the petition, Thou O Lord, who stillest the raging of the sea, hear, hear us, and save us, that we perish not. Love and harmony are promoted by the daily use of "Forms of Prayer to be used in Families;" the members are animated to the diligent performance of every duty and are supported under every trial, when they have implored his grace and protection for the ensuing day, and committed all to his fatherly care and protection. What numbers have been led to obey the dying command of their Saviour, "Do this in remembrance of me," by studying our inimitable Communion service. How many parents have been made to feel their responsibilities while listening to the Baptismal service, when they presented their infants at the font, and how many adults have become zealous and consistent members of the Church under the influence of the Spirit, by the impressive language in the "Ministration of baptism to those in riper years." How many have been consoled in their last illness by the "Visitation of the sick;" how many have been supported at the graves of those they loved best, by the Burial service, and how many have been seriously impressed by its pathos and sublimity, and induced to lead new lives, in order to be prepared to meet their God. Can Episcopalians monopolize this inestimable treasure? Can they refuse to impart their spiritual riches to others, to evince their sympathy and benevolence towards their destitute brethren? Let the members of our highly favored Church shew their taste and piety, and the elevating and animating effects of our Liturgy by the diligent circulation of the Prayer Book, the compilers of which were evidently guided in their work by the Enlightener and Comforter. May the members of every church endeavor to excel others in generosity; and may the list of subscribers be increased this year a hundred fold; and may the prayers of "all sorts and conditions of men," improved by their gift, descend in such blessings upon themselves, as no wealth can procure.

The Floating Church of the Redeemer.

On Wednesday morning, the steamers Washington and Fashion, proceeded up the Delaware for the purpose of bringing down the Floating Church from Bordentown to Philadelphia. The Bishop of Pennsylvania, and several of the clergy, with a number of ladies and gentlemen, joined the excursion to witness the novel and interesting sight. The weather became so stormy that it was thought unsafe to bring the Church down the river. A request had been made, on the part of the students of Burlington College, that they might present a flag to the church on its passage by the College. It was agreed that this pleasing ceremony should not be postponed. Accordingly the boats were moored to the wharf, and notice being given, the students of the college, with one of their teachers, came on board in their gowns and college caps, the flag borne by one of their number. It is a beautiful ensign of rich blue silk, with a golden cross in the centre. The Bishop received the young gentlemen in the cabin of the steamer. Mr. George H. Doane advanced and presented the flag to the Bishop with these appropriate words:—

RIGHT REVEREND SIR,

With my father's permission, in behalf of Burlington College, I present to you this flag. It bears the sacred signal of our faith. Please to accept it, as a token of our interest in the good work which you have undertaken for the religious welfare of seamen, and as the assurance of our prayers that you may conquer in this sign.

"We wish you good luck in the name of the Lord."

To which the Bishop replied in a most touching and appropriate manner. His words came from the heart, and they went to the hearts of all who heard them. His address was entirely unpremeditated, and we quote from our own recollection, some of the happy thoughts expressed.

In behalf of the Association he accepted with great pleasure this Flag. The fact that this manifestation of interest in their enterprise came from a sister Diocese made it more acceptable, as an evidence of true Catholic feeling. Coming too from the young men of an institution of learning—of a Church College, it was peculiarly welcome. The sign which was imprinted upon this standard made it a most appropriate gift to express the sentiments which prompted the offering. It was the true sign of our holy Faith, and they who were faithful, in warring under this, would be sure to conquer.

He begged the young gentlemen to convey to the Bishop, to their Teachers, to their young associates, the assurance of the grateful feelings with which he and the Association received this token of their regard for sailors. A kind Providence had smiled on all the efforts of those engaged in this good work, and blessed them in all. No incident in this happy undertaking had been more cheering or more pleasant than this.

After this Mr. William C. Doane thus addressed the Bishop.

RIGHT REV. SIR,—My father was unwilling that this Church of the Redeemer, built in his diocese, should float past his dwelling, without some assurance that his blessing rests upon the Church, upon you, and upon all who are connected with it. He wishes me with your permission, to read to you these lines as a feeble utterance of his sentiments.

The Sailors' Home;

THE FLOATING CHURCH OF THE REDEEMER

FOR SAILORS AND BOATMEN:

BUILT AT BORDENTOWN, NEW JERSEY,

AND TO BE MOORED AT A WHARF IN PHILADELPHIA.

"The seats are all to be free."

The Jersey woods are tall and green,
The Jersey mines are broad and deep,
And cool and pure the sparkling streams,
That down the Jersey mountains leap.

Search out, from all the Jersey woods,
The sturdiest oaks, the loftiest pines;
And gather in the choicest ore,
That deepest lies in Jersey mines.

And, where the Jersey mountain streams
Fill the deep-rolling Delaware,
Lay broad and strong, the Christian keel,
And fasten every plank with prayer.

Complete, the sacred structure stands,
And towers, majestic, from the wave;
A floating Church, a Christian ark;
The Sailor's soul from sin to save.

Float gently down, thou blessed bark,
To Philadelphia's ship-lined shore;
And, moored 'longside her teeming wharves,
Unfold the Gospel's sacred store.

Show, from the topmast's tallest peak,
The great REDEEMER's glorious name:
Display the blessed, bleeding Cross;
Its love, its agony, its shame.

Proclaim the life-restoring Word;
Pour all the energy of Prayer;
Sprinkle the blest baptismal Wave;
The Bread, the Wine, of Life, prepare.

Arrest the thoughtless, check the rash,
Win home the wanderer from his ways;
The broken-hearted bind with balm,
And fill the penitent with praise.

Like clouds, that scud before the storm,
Like doves, that to their windows come,
Crowd, brothers, to the floating Cross,
And find THE CHURCH, THE SAILORS' HOME.

Riverside, St. John Evangelist, 1848. Bishop G. W. D.

To which the Bishop replied, briefly but most happily: He was no poet, and though he might not answer in strains like those which had been addressed by his brother Bishop, he could say, in plain prose, that this additional expression of good feeling, so beautifully declared, called forth new emotions of thanks. The Bishop referred to the fact, that a flag with a cross upon its folds, always floated over our national vessels during divine service on board. It was the only standard to which our country's flag was lowered. He trusted it might ever be lifted up, as the ensign of her Faith and her Hope.

Altogether it was a most impressive scene, and those who before thought they had come for no purpose, rejoiced that they were there.

We understand the Floating Church will be brought down immediately. It will not be opened until consecrated. It will not be consecrated till free from debt.

DIocese of New Jersey.—In the Chapel of the Holy Innocents, on St. John's day, the Bishop of New Jersey admitted Mr. G. D. Rose to the Holy Order of Deacons. Prayers were read by the Rev. Dr. Ogilby, the Address was delivered by the Bishop, and the candidate was presented by the Rev. Mr. Henderson, of Trinity Church, Newark. Rev. Messrs. Germain, Hollowell, Frost, and F. Ogilby, were present.

MR. EDITOR:

As this is the season of the year when your readers, old and young, are on the look out for suitable books to present as tokens of love and friendship, will you allow me to invite them to call at the store of Mr. R. S. H. GEORGE, No. 16 South Seventh St. and examine his assortment.

Mr. George has more than the usual claim upon Churchmen for their patronage, for no one else has so steadily kept himself to the sale of Church books almost exclusively.

His editions of the Prayer book are the best which the writer of this article has seen, and he has them in beautiful styles, from the neat plain, elegant bindings, to the rich velvet covering with its costly and ornamental finish.

He has also a beautiful assortment of books from that most useful Church Institution, the "General Protestant Episcopal Sunday School Union." They are such as no parent would hesitate to place in the hands of children, and such as all children may read with pleasure and with profit.

The style in which they are published is such as will recommend them to those who wish to have not only good books but beautiful in appearance.

The "Union" has recently published a number of new books suitable for the season. I hope they will be remembered during the coming holy days. Go to Mr. George's and look at them. He will not charge anything for showing them. Among them are the following. I have only time, and you have only room to give the titles of them, which, however, expresses the character of the books. They are all excellent of their kind.

THE KING'S MESSENGERS: This is an excellent book for persons of all ages. It is an allegory, but so plain that no one can fail to comprehend it. It is intended to improve the duty of charity, and it does it most feelingly and effectively. Get it and read it.

THE COMBATANTS: A beautiful and instructive allegory. It must be read to be appreciated rightly.

THE BOY AND HIS BIRDS: This I predict will be a favourite with all young readers.

GEORGE AUSTIN: Or Patience and Perseverance rewarded.

BEAR AND FORBEAR: Or the history of Sarah Allen

NORAH, THE LITTLE MOUNTAINEER; Or, I wish, I could read.

THE WIDOW'S SON. An excellent little book which teaches, most impressively, the danger, and oftentimes fatal consequences of not keeping God's Holy Day, as He has commanded it to be kept.

But I must not trespass longer upon your indulgence, and I have said enough to answer my end, which is to invite attention to Mr. George's store, and to the books of the "General Protestant Episcopal Sunday School Union," for sale there.

A LAYMAN.

ORDINATION IN ST. STEPHEN'S CHURCH.—On Sunday last, 24th inst., the Right Reverend the Bishop of Pennsylvania, held an ordination in St. Stephen's church, Philadelphia, and admitted Messrs. William B. Musgrave and Daniel Washburn to the holy order of Deacons, and the Rev. Rees C. Evans to the holy order of Priests. The Bishop preached on the occasion; and Mr. Musgrave and Mr. Evans were presented by the Rev. Dr. Ducachet, and Mr. Washburn by the Rev. Dr. Williams of Dr. Williams also read Morning Prayer.

New Publications.

CECIL, THE ORPHAN: OR, THE REWARD OF VIRTUE; A TALE FOR THE YOUNG. New York: Stanford & Swords. For sale by R. S. H. George, Philadelphia. Two volumes.

This is a very beautiful looking book bearing also the title, still more attractive for the young, of CECIL AND HIS DOG. It is a translation from the French, by MARY HOWITT, and her name will strongly commend it. We are sure it would be a most acceptable gift for the young. It is BEAUTIFULLY illustrated.

THE STORY OF LITTLE JOHN. By M. Charles Jeannel, Professor of Philosophy in the Royal College of Poitiers. Messrs. Appletons, New York and Philadelphia.

This is another translation from the French. It is a very attractive book in appearance, with numerous engravings. We can only say, in commendation of it, that having read a few pages, it was with some difficulty the volume was closed at the call of graver duties.

THE VAST ARMY: by the well known author of "the Dark River," &c., is another instructive and pleasing Book, published by Stanford & Swords.

We have also received from the Messrs. Appletons, ACTON: OR THE CIRCLE OF LIFE; from Mr. H. Hooker, PROFESSION AND PRACTICE, by the Rev. Hugh White, A. M.; and from Messrs. J. B. Lippincott & Co., Philadelphia, THE CLERGY OF AMERICA, by Joseph Belcher, D.D. Of these last works we are not prepared to express an opinion, but we shall notice them in due time.

For the Banner of the Cross.

MR. EDITOR:

The question so seasonably put by R. H. C. of "what is the Church doing for California?" calls for a response from every Clergyman, rich and poor. Will you then oblige a correspondent by stating, what sum paid steadily would be sufficient to support a missionary at the above named station. Whether if the support were guaranteed, the Missionary Board would provide for the passage out. Such close questions would not be asked, if the aiding in the great work were the hope of one who out of his abundance would give help; but as it must be from small and hard earned means, the questions are necessary.

Philadelphia, Dec. 24, 1848.

At a special meeting of the vestry of St. James's church, held in the vestry room, Dec. 21, 1848, the Rector, Rev. Dr. Morton, in the chair, the death of ROBERT TOLAND, Esq., late a member of that body, having been announced, the following resolutions were passed:

"Resolved, That the Vestry of this church has received with unfeigned regret, the intelligence of the decease of Robert Toland, for many years a member of this body, who had acquired the high respect and esteem of his associates by his piety, integrity, amiability, practical benevolence and usefulness, and whose death is a serious loss both to this parish and to the community.

"Resolved, That the members of the Vestry will attend the funeral of Mr. Toland, as a mark of respect for his memory.

"Resolved, That the Secretary communicate a copy of these Resolutions to the family of the deceased, with the expression of the deep sympathy felt by the Vestry in their bereavement; and that a copy be also furnished for insertion in the Banner of the Cross."

J. CARSON, Secretary.

Died, at her residence in Lancaster county, on Friday the 15th instant, in the 64th year of her age, Mrs. ABIGAIL A., relict of F. Diller Baker, Esq.

Mrs. Baker had been for many years a communicant of the Church; and as her life was one of quiet unostentatious piety, manifested among other ways, in meek and unfailing submission to the will of God, through years of not a little suffering and affliction: so her death was such as to verify, in a striking manner, the declaration, that the "end of the upright is peace." It was indeed a peaceful one, and has been, there is every reason to hope, succeeded by the joys of Paradise. Y.

Communications.

Beware of the Impostor.

A communication lately appeared in several of the Church Journals, cautioning the clergy, and the public, against a young man calling himself GEORGE BARTLETT, and professing to have with him a blind mother. They have represented themselves as poor, and as passing on to some spot yet distant from that in which at the time they might happen to be, by appealing to the sympathies of the clergy and others. It was supposed they had obtained considerable money. The communication, signed by two clergymen of Troy, New York, stated that Bartlett and his companion had promised to amend their ways, and to return to a better course of life.

I feel it incumbent upon me to caution all persons against Bartlett and his companion. He has been in this parish to-day seeking funds for the avowed purpose of going to Bellefonte. When questioned as to letters, he said that he had a letter from Bishop DeLancey, but when the letter was called for, after consultation with his mother in private, he stated that his mother had lost the letter. His deportment while here was any thing but becoming a person in distress; and when detected in his imposture, he suddenly left the town, and has not since been seen in the neighbourhood. I deem it my duty to caution all persons against extending to them any assistance whatever.

WILLIAM J. CLARK,

Rector of Christ Church, Williamsport, Pa.

December 14, 1848.

Maryland.—The Rev. Alex. D. Jones, in connexion with his duties at St. Timothy's Hall, assists the Rector in the pastoral care of St. Timothy's Church, Catonsville, and of Grace Church Elk Ridge Landing.—Church Times.

New Hampshire.—INSTITUTION.—On Sunday the 18th after Trinity, the Rt. Rev. Bishop Chase instituted the Rev. J. Kelly into the Rectorship of St. Michael's Church, Manchester, N. H. The Bishop preached a sermon appropriate to the occasion. In the afternoon, the Rector said prayers, and the Rev. Mr. Lambert preached from the words, 'Then said Jesus unto his disciples, if any man will come after me, let him deny himself, and take up his cross and follow me.' (Mat. xvi. 24.) In the evening, the Rev. Mr. Lambert said prayers, and the Bishop preached on the subject of 'the laying on of hands,' or confirmation. After the sermon, eleven persons were confirmed.

Throughout the services of the day, the church was filled with a large, attentive, and we trust, devoted congregation: and we hope that the words that day fitly spoken, may bring forth fruit unto life eternal.

The Rev. Mr. Kelly entered upon the duties of Rector of this parish early in June; his institution being deferred until the time of the Bishop's annual visitation.—Calendar

Western New York.—CONFIRMATION.—On Sunday afternoon Dec. 10th Bishop DeLancey held a special confirmation in Trinity Church, Geneva, when two persons were confirmed.

STANDING COMMITTEE.—A meeting of the Standing Committee was held on the 14th inst., at which the Rev. James R. Davenport, as we learn, was recommended to the Bishop for Priests' orders, and Theodore M. Bishop, Loren W. Russ, and Moses E. Wilson, candidates, were recommended for Deacons' orders.

At the same meeting the Rev. George Leeds, of Utica, was unanimously elected by the concurrent vote of the clergy and laity, a member of the Standing Committee, in the place of the late Rev. John C. Rudd, D.D.

DIOCESE OF PENNSYLVANIA.

We understand that the following Episcopal acts have been performed by the Bishop of this diocese, during the past few weeks—

Nov. 19th, in the church of the Advent, N. L. preached and confirmed twenty-one.

Nov. 25th, preached twice at St. David's, Radnor, and confirmed eleven.

Dec. 3d, A. M. in St. Matthew's, Francisville, preached and administered the communion, and confirmed five.

P. M. in the church of the Redemption, preached and confirmed thirteen.

Dec. 5th, attended meeting of the Southern Convocation at Paradise, Lancaster co., preached the Convocation sermon, and administered the communion.

Dec. 10th, at the church of the Messiah, Port Richmond, preached and confirmed four.

Dec. 17th, visited and preached in St. Mary's, Warwick, and St. Mark's, Honey brook, confirmed one at the latter parish.

Dec. 18th, at St. Thomas's, Morgantown, preached and admitted to Priest's orders, the Rev. James A. Woodward, minister of the parish.

Dec. 19th, 20th, at Christ's church, Reading, attended the first meeting of the Schuylkill Convocation, preached the Convocation sermon, administered the communion, and confirmed eleven.

Dec. 24th, at St. Stephen's, Philadelphia, preached, and admitted to Deacon's orders, William B. Musgrave and Daniel Washburn; to Priest's orders, Rev. Rees C. Evans.

At a meeting of the Standing Committee of the Diocese of Pennsylvania, held on the 2d inst., testimonials were signed on behalf of Mr. John A. Merrick, applying to be recommended for admission to the Holy Order of Deacons.

Application was made at the same meeting, by Mr. James W. James to be recommended for admission as a candidate for Holy Orders. His application lies over, by rule, for action at the next stated meeting.

M. A. DE WOLFE HOWE, Secretary.

ST. MARK'S CHURCH, PHILADELPHIA.—At a meeting of the Vestry of this church, held on the evening of Tuesday, January 2d, the Rev. J. P. B. WILMER, of the Diocese of Virginia, was unanimously elected Rector.

It is expected that this church will be completed by the middle of next September.

THE SCHUYLKILL CONVOCATION.

In obedience to a call from the Bishop of the Diocese, through the Rev. Dr. Morgan, the clergy of the counties of Montgomery, Berks, Schuylkill and Carbon, assembled at Christ's church, in the city of Reading, on Monday afternoon, Dec. 18th, 1848, for the purpose of organizing a Convocation.

The following clergy were present besides the Bishop: the Rev. Dr. Morgan, and the Rev. Messrs. Hirst, Drake, Stem, Cooley, Mintzer, Leaf, Russell, Starkey and Beatty.

The Convocation was organized on the basis mainly of the Northern Convocation of Pennsylvania, the rules governing that convocation having been generally adopted with some few modifications.

The name adopted was, "The Schuylkill Convocation."

The Bishop of the Diocese is President, Ex-officio.

The Presbyter longest resident within the limits of Convocation, is Resident President, and presides in the absence of the Bishop.

A Secretary and Treasurer are elected annually at the meeting in December.

Regular meetings are to be held once in three months, and special meetings may be appointed by the Bishop or by Convocation.

Convocation continues in existence at the discretion of the Bishop.

The following are the officers and members of the Schuylkill Convocation:

Rt. Rev. Alonzo Potter, D.D. LL.D. President, Ex-officio.

Rev. Richard U. Morgan, D.D., Rector of Christ church, Reading, Resident President.

Rev. T. A. Starkey, Rector of the Mission church of the Holy Apostles, St. Clair, Secretary.

Rev. Nathan Stem, Rector of St. John's church, Norristown, Treasurer.

Rev. Geo. C. Drake, Rector of St. James' church, Schuylkill Haven; Rev. Marmaduke Hirst, Rector of St. Paul's church, Minersville; Rev. Wm. C. Cooley, Rector of Trinity church, Pottsville; Rev. E. N. Lightner, Rector of Christ church, Upper Merion; Rev. Geo. Mintzer, Rector of St. James' church, Perkiomen; Rev. E. Leaf, Rector of Christ church, Pottstown, and St. Gabriel's, Douglasville; Rev. Peter Russell, Rector of St. Mark's church, Mauch Chunk, and Rev. Archibald Beatty, of Zion church, Tuscarora.

The religious services held during the sitting of Convocation were well attended, and were of a deeply interesting character. The Bishop preached twice, first on Tuesday morning from 1 Cor. ii. 4, 5; afterwards administering the Holy Communion. And again on Tuesday evening from 1 John iii. 2, 3; afterwards confirming eleven persons, one of them in private.

The number of public religious services was seven. Each sermon was followed by a brief exhortation from the clergyman who had previously said prayers. Every part of the service being conducted with the order and solemnity which the occasion inspired, and which, it may be added, harmonized so well with the feelings of the clergy present, and with the impressive, church-like, and beautiful interior, of the sacred edifice itself.

That the organization of this Convocation will result in good, can scarcely be doubted by any one who was in attendance on these services. The congregations were good, and exhibited deep interest, and the clergy present did not fail to acknowledge to each other that they felt cheered, encouraged and strengthened. May God's Holy Spirit pour upon all the dew of His blessing. Before adjourning finally, Convocation passed the following and ordered its publication:—

"Resolved, That the thanks of Convocation are due and are hereby tendered to the churchmen of Reading for the Christian kindness and hospitality so freely extended to its members."

The next regular meeting will (D. V.) be at Pottsville on the second Monday in March, 1849.

T. A. STARKEY, Sec.

Pastoral Letter, in behalf of Foreign Missions.

DEARLY BELOVED IN THE LORD,

The joyous season of Epiphany, on which we are soon to enter, invites us, with a natural eloquence, to the consideration of the Foreign Missions of the Church. It is for us to light anew, with annual fires, that sacred star, which brought the Eastern wise men to the cradle of Emmanuel. Millions upon millions, on whom its sacred light has never fallen, grope darkling through a world, which has for them no God, and, so, no hope. Little as we have undertaken for their rescue, from the gloom, in which they perish, that little lags and languishes. The children of the light are but as dark lanterns, to the souls that know not God. "The contributions for the Missions at Constantinople and Athens," since the last Epiphany collection, a circular from the Foreign Committee, dated, 1 December, states, "have not sufficed to cover the first quarter of the present financial year. The Committee are yet in debt, for the whole amount of the annual shipment made to the African Mission, in August. The contributions to the Mission in China, which sufficed to meet the last two quarters of 1848, have not yet enabled the Committee to authorize drafts, for the quarter, due 1 January; so that the Missionary Bishop must necessarily be left, at least three months, in arrears for his remittances."

And yet, brethren, these faithful servants of the Lord, went forth, upon their self-denying errand, at our bidding. We all concurred, by those who duly represent us, in marking out the Missions, and in sending out the men. And, is it for us to hug ourselves, at home, and leave them to the misery and shame of actual want? Is it for us to keep the feast of the Epiphany, and care not for the millions of the Gentiles, to whom Christ is not yet manifested? It surely cannot be. I feel the "confidence," and share the "earnestness," with which the Committee make their appeal to Churchmen: and I affectionately ask of all my brethren, that this pastoral letter be read, in all the Churches of this Diocese, on Sunday next; and that the alms at the Offertory, in every Church, on the first Sunday after Epiphany, be appropriated, not without prayer, to the support of the Foreign Missions of this Church. "Freely ye have received, freely give."

Affectionately and faithfully, your Pastor, and servant in Christ,
GEORGE W. DOANE, Bishop of New Jersey.

Riverside, Christmas Day, 1848.

PENNSYLVANIA.—The Rev. George Field has resigned the Rectorship of Huntington, and accepted a call to Emmanuel church, Holmesburg. He is expected to enter upon the duties of his new charge the second Sunday in January.—Epis. Re.

WESTERN NEW YORK.

ORDINATION.—Bishop DeLancey held an ordination on the stated day, December 24th, in Trinity church, Geneva. On this occasion the Morning Prayer was read by the Rev. Mr. Bissell, the Rector of the Church, who also presented the candidates. Messrs. Moses E. Wilson and Loren W. Russ were ordained Deacons, and the Rev. Timothy F. Wardwell, Deacon, was admitted to the Priesthood. The Bishop preached and administered the holy communion, assisted in the distribution of the elements by the Rev. Mr. Bissell, who, with the Rev. Dr. Hale, united in the imposition of hands.

In the afternoon, the Rev. Mr. Wilson read prayers; the Rev. Mr. Ross preached.

In the evening, the Rev. Mr. Ross read prayers, assisted by Rev. Mr. Bissell, and the Rev. Mr. Wardwell preached.

VERMONT.—On Thursday, the 14th of December, 1848, the Rt. Rev. Bishop of Vermont, consecrated the newly erected church in Randolph, to the worship of Almighty God, by the name of Grace church.

The services began at 11 o'clock, forenoon. The Bishop and the clergy in their clerical robes, being met at the church door by the wardens, proceeded along the middle aisle to the chancel platform, reciting antiphonally the appropriate psalm. Arrived within the chancel, the instrument of donation was presented by the senior warden, and the sentence of consecration was read by the Rev. Josiah Sweet, Rector of Christ church, Bethel. The consecration service being conducted by the Bishop, Morning Prayer was read by the Rev. Joel Clapp, D.D., Rector of Immanuel church, Bellow's Falls, assisted in the Lessons by the Rev. John A. Hicks, D.D., Rector of Trinity church, Rutland, which being ended, the Bishop preached a very appropriate and persuasive discourse, in vindication of the polity and worship of the Church, which was listened to by a large congregation, for a long time, with marked seriousness and attention. The sermon being ended, the Bishop proceeded to the ordination of Mr. E. F. Remington, late licentiate of the Methodist Church, to the Holy Order of Deacons—the candidate was presented by the Rev. George B. Manser, Rector of Christ church, Montpelier. The Bishop was assisted in the administration of the Holy Communion by the Rev. Dr. Clapp. The house was crowded, during the protracted services, but none seemed disposed to retire when permission was given to do so, before the administration of the Holy Eucharist.

In the afternoon, Evening Prayer was read by the Rev. Mr. Manser, who also administered the sacrament of Holy Baptism to one adult and three children. The Bishop administered the apostolic rite of confirmation to two persons—the preface to that service being read by the Rev. Mr. Manser. The Rev. Mr. Sweet preached a very appropriate and impressive discourse, upon the duty of the whole congregation to kneel, absolutely and flatly down, in order to be considered, as in any sense, joining in the common prayers of the Church—which was listened to with great earnestness and apparent acquiescence in the plain and palpable truths put forth with so much simplicity of thought, and eloquence of feeling.—Churchman.

OHIO.

EPISCOPAL VISITATION.—Bishop McIlvaine has recently visited the following parishes, viz.:—Trinity, Cleveland; St. Paul's, do.; Grace, do.; St. John's, Ohio city; St. John's, Dover; St. Andrew's, Elyria; St. Paul's, Norwalk; Christ Church, Huron; Grace Church, Sandusky city; St. Paul's, Lower Sandusky; St. Paul's, Maumee; Trinity, Toledo; Christ Church, Springfield, and the incipient parish at Bellevue.

The Bishop has been seriously ill since his return, but we are truly rejoiced to say that through the goodness of God he is convalescing.

Clerical Changes.

The Rev. C. E. AMBLER, having taken charge of Christ church in the vicinity of Scottsville, Albemarle county, Va., desires that all letters and other communications be directed to him at that place.

TRINITY CHURCH.—We understand that the Rev. B. P. Aydelot, D.D., has accepted the unanimous call made by the Wardens and Vestry of Trinity church, Cincinnati, to the Rectorship of that church. — afterwards Apostatized to Presbyterianism

The following notice of a consecration of a foreign church will be interesting to our readers, as the Rector is a clergyman from our own church.

ST. CROIX, Christiansted, Nov. 28, 1848.

Rev. and Dear Sir.

The Honorable and Right Reverend Daniel G. Davis, Lord Bishop of Antigua and the Leeward Islands, arrived here on the 10th instant. His lordship preached in St. John's on the Sunday following; and on Tuesday, the 14th, confirmed 263 persons.

On Friday he confirmed 103 persons in St. Paul's, Fredericksted, and preached there on Sunday, the 19th inst. His lordship sailed for St. Thomas on the following day. Rev. F. J. Hawley

In addition to the above, we have received the following interesting account of the consecration of a church in the Island of St. Thomas.

ST. THOMAS, Nov. 22, 1848.

Consecration of the Episcopal Church.—The ardent longings of the members of the English Congregation, were, after many years of hope deferred,—of aspirations disappointed, gratified yesterday by the Consecration of the new edifice, which they have reared to the worship of HIM, of whom is written:—

"I am, that I am, and he that worships me, must worship me in spirit and in truth."

The Church is built in the style of the modern Gothic, plain and unassuming, free from all florid ornament, as becomes a congregation the majority of whose members are not overburdened with worldly wealth, and both the design and workmanship reflect great credit on the architect and builder GEORGE TUCKER, Esq., who, by his liberality and disinterested labors, has been mainly instrumental in originating and executing the good work. The warmest thanks of the congregation are also due to the Rev. BRANDEGEE, their Pastor, as well as to the Wardens, Elders, and many of the members (especially the female portion) whose persevering exertions in collecting funds deserve the highest praise, and who yesterday must have reaped their rich reward, in the glowing satisfaction they felt in hearing the sublime service of the Episcopal Church within a temple exclusively dedicated to that holy purpose, in this island. The site of the building is not in our opinion a very good one to display its architectural beauty, but we are informed the choice was dictated by prudent economical reasons which could not be disregarded on account of the paucity of funds; the situation, however, is central and convenient, which, perhaps, more than compensates for the drawback to which we have slightly alluded. The sacred ceremony was appointed to commence at 11 o'clock, but long before that hour the building was thronged, but not inconveniently so. The acting Governor, Counsellor Berg and suite, Commodore Rhode, Major Holm, Captains Wolff and James, most of the civil functionaries and their families, and the clergy of other denominations, were present at the solemn dedication.

The Right Rev. D. G. Davis, Bishop of Antigua, consecrated the Church All Saints, assisted by the Rev. Alex. Bott, the Rev. Fletcher J. Hawley, and the Rev. J. J. Brandegee.

The Bishop, with his Chaplains, was received at the door of the Church, by the Rev. J. J. Brandegee (Rector,) the Churchwardens and Trustees, and by them conducted to the Vestry room, where, having robed, he proceeded to the front of the communion table, and there the pastor presented a petition praying him to consecrate the Church, which having been read to the congregation by the Rev. A. Borr—the Bishop, followed by the Rev. gentlemen, walked from the east to the west end of the Church and back again, repeating alternately the 24th Psalm. After which, the deed of conveyance having been presented to the Bishop by the minister—the appropriate address to the congregation, and prayer being finished, the sentence of consecration was read by the Rev. A. Borr, and signed by the Bishop, after which the service of the day was read by the Rector; on its conclusion the Bishop, addressing the congregation, said, "That in consequence of there being no pulpit he would avail himself of the privilege of reading his discourse from a much holier place, (the Communion Table.)"

The text was, Psalm 84th, verse 3d.

"Yea, the sparrow hath found her an house, and the swallow a nest where she may lay her young: even thy altars, O Lord of hosts, my King and my God."

Having given the foregoing necessarily brief description of the ceremony, we cannot omit noticing the effective assistance rendered by the ladies and gentlemen of the choir, and Mr. C. K. Dix, who presided at the Seraphim, who, collectively and individually, contributed much to the solemnity of the service, nor can we omit the opportunity of remarking that the utmost order and decorum prevailed throughout, among the numerous persons present of the humbler classes, who attended as visitors, and which we have been assured was highly gratifying both to the Bishop, the officiating clergy and congregation.

We trust we shall be excused, for urging all who have contributed to the good work, by no means to relax their exertions to complete it. Much remains to be done, but no more than they can achieve. Let the recollection that the first stone of the Church was laid on the first of May last, stimulate them. The building is cool, well ventilated, and, from being in a retired situation, no external noise can interrupt the devotional feelings. The Right Rev. Bishop held a Confirmation this day, when 150 applicants attended, and renewed the solemn promises and vows made in their names at their baptism.—Churchman.

Selections.

The original letters, published in the Banner a short time since, relating to New Zealand, must have excited the desire of our readers to learn more of this very interesting country. There is no part of the world wherein the Church has been planted under more remarkable circumstances. The success which has crowned the faithful labors of those devoted men, who have given themselves to this unpromising work, is one of the most glorious Missionary triumphs of our day. For the following instructive account we are indebted to "THE COLONIAL CHURCH CHRONICLE."

VISIT TO THE PENSIONERS' VILLAGE, IN NEW ZEALAND.

MR. EDITOR,
I beg to forward to you another extract from a letter from New Zealand, giving an account of a Sunday visit to the Pensioners, a few days after their landing.

I remain, &c.

M. A. M.

"As you asked me, my dear —, to give you every now and then some account of my proceedings in New Zealand, I think you will be interested by a sketch of the first Sunday which I spent at the new Pensioners' village at Owaeroa. This is the native name of the spot at which the Governor has determined to plant one of the military villages; and as the villages are to be under my pastoral charge, it is a place which has peculiar interest in my eyes. Some little time ago, the Bishop went to the proposed site with his Excellency the Governor, to select a place for the church. It is on a rising knoll, about a mile from the sea. A narrow ridge leads gently up to it from the landing place, whilst to the north the ground sinks again, and the valley opens out, affording a very available piece of ground for the future settlement, for the plough will run with great ease, not only in the flat, but a considerable distance up the hill sides. Water there is close at hand; but wood is a desideratum. Fire wood will have to be brought, either from the island of Waiheke, ten miles by water carriage; or, when the roads are made, from a forest of great extent, which comes within a few miles of the village. I trust, however, that the settlers will be induced to lose no time in planting both European and Maori trees about their homesteads. They grow with amazing rapidity, will afford shelter in a year or two, and, when timber becomes scarce, (and it may do so even in New Zealand,) fuel also. But I must return to my church, and such particulars as I have to tell in connexion with it. As soon as the site was selected, the Bishop set his carpenters to work to cut out the frame of a small timber building, in order that, if possible, Divine Service might begin in a building appropriated to that purpose, from the first Sunday after the landing of the pensioners. The church is cruciform; the ground plan is made up of seven squares, with a central tower, and a small spire rising from it. There is a porch near the south-west angle, and on the north-west corner is a small vestry. Peculiar advantages are afforded by the plan of the building. The four main rafters of the roof, where the transepts intersect the chancel, are carried all the way from the ridges, pinned to the wall plate, and then continued on and morticed in the ground plate. By this construction the church has a degree of stability which could not be given in any other way to a building of wood. It has not, of course, the weight of a stone building, and a violent gale might blow over a wooden church of ordinary construction; but I am told that no possible gale of wind, not even an earthquake, can overturn a building which is actually a solid equilateral triangle. The smaller timbers, both of the vestry and porch, are carried down into the ground plates. The building was framed in the carpenter's yard at the college, and as soon as it was finished, and all the timbers numbered, it was taken to pieces, and sent round by water in the Bishop's craft. Next day I went overland, with the college apprentices, who are under my superintendence. A finer set of young fellows is nowhere to be seen; one of them, a lad of twenty, is six feet three, and strong in proportion. We took provisions for two days, and the great tent, so that we might stay on the spot until our work was over; the carpenters did so too, and within two days we had done our task—shouldered all the heavy timbers from the beach to the dray. The bullocks did their work well also, and the frame of the church began to rise before we left the ground, not a little fatigued, at the end of the second day. Early in November the pensioners took possession of their ground. By the Bishop's orders I went over on the following Sunday, in company with one of the clergy in full orders, resident at St. John's College. We had a very pleasant walk to the Tamaki river, and were ferried across by one of the workmen of Mr. H. a thriving settler who lives on the western side. After an hospitable entertainment of bread and milk, his being a dairy farm, we walked over a beautiful flat space of country to the wooded ridge which separates the Tamaki level from the valley in which the pensioners are located. The main paths often run along the dividing ridges of the country, and afford very splendid prospects. After standing for a few minutes to admire that which here lay spread before us, and

'with uncover'd head

To cool our temples in the fanning breeze,' we proceeded onwards, and a few steps brought us to the crest of the hill under which the church was standing far below us. It is, as I have endeavoured to describe, on an eminence which divides the narrow valley running down to the sea, from the more extended one in which will be the main portion of the pensioners' village.

"One of the college students had by the Bishop's permission accompanied us; he brought with him a hand-bell, one of those placed at the Bishop's disposal by the Midland Committee of the Church Missionary Society, as his share of those sent out for the use of this district. This he rang in regular church-going style, being qualified to perform this not very easy task, by constant practice in the office which he held, viz., that of Sacrist to the college. A few stragglers turned out at the first summons, recognizing doubtless a sound long unheard by them, and judging by the direction from which it came, that it was a summons to Divine Service. We had not any opportunity during the previous week of sending due notice to the villages of our intention of coming over on Sunday; and it is a wonderful thing, and would be scarcely credible, had we not frequent evidence of the fact, how soon, in a new country, settlers lose the habit of observing Sunday as a day of rest and a season of prayer. I have heard that, in a neighbouring colony, many instances have been known of settlers in the bush actually forgetting the day of the week, from their constant and unchristian habits of going about their ordinary occupations seven days of the week instead of six. Things are not come to this pass in New Zealand, and I trust they never will. Even the very heathen natives will shame any Englishmen who attempt to act in a way so inconsistent with their profession. They almost invariably rest on the seventh day. Although they may not themselves have received any religious impressions, they so far respect the feelings of their Christian friends and neighbours, as to 'sit still' on Sunday. Nothing will induce a Christian native to travel on this day, not even the bribes of Englishmen, who should be ashamed, if not of offering them, at least at the rejection of the tempting bait by those whom they endeavour to seduce from the observance of what they know to be right.

"But I must return from this somewhat lengthened digression. Finding that our congregation did not assemble so soon as we had expected, we walked down to the temporary dwellings of the pensioners, to beat up as it were for recruits. They were housed, till their own dwellings could be erected, in long weather-board sheds—most ugly and uncomfortable buildings, but the best which could be run up on the emergency. We found the greater part of them engaged in putting their things in their places, and endeavouring to secure some little degree of privacy for themselves and their wives, by putting up curtains to divide the portions of space allotted as the sleeping places of each family. As we expected, we found that very few were ready dressed for service, and an old soldier would think it a breach of discipline to attend church otherwise than in full costume. So after walking through the sheds, and speaking a few words to the people, we returned to the church with such a following as we could gather. Though the carpenters had done their best during the past week to get on with the church, it was still almost a skeleton. The frame was all up, indeed, so that it had the figure of a church. The heavens were the roof, and the earth was the floor; there were no windows in, and the wind whistled through the framing, as it was a raw and gusty day; and a slight shower descended through the rafters during the service. We made temporary seats by arranging planks and pieces of scantling on bundles of shingles. It was the best we could do in the way of ecclesiastical order and arrangement; and though very defective, it was a great thing to have Divine Service from the very first on the church ground, and I doubt not the prayers were heard, of the two or three who were then gathered together in Christ's name. May the numbers be increased manifold, until the present building, which only contains about one hundred and eighty square feet, is much too small for the congregation. A small church overflowing with people who feel their need of greater church accommodation, and will do their best to obtain it, is far better than the largest and most splendid cathedral not half filled. Between service we began the Sunday school, and had a nice gathering of between thirty and forty children. The mothers, though they were not ready in the morning to attend church themselves, had yet got their children clean and tidy for school. But far better than the outward appearance of the children, was their orderly conduct and aptness to learn. Some benevolent ladies who came out in the pensioner ships, had, I have been informed, taken much pains with the children, and instructed them during the voyage out. The schoolmaster abroad may be all very well in his way, but the schoolmistress at sea is still better. There is no place in the world so well adapted for a school as a ship. No rainy days can cause a thin attendance. The children cannot play truant on fine days. The mother, who on shore is often disposed to keep a handy girl at home to nurse the baby, or make herself useful, is at sea glad enough to get rid of all her children as early in the morning as possible. She wants them out of the way, (and there is never too much room to spare in the berth of an emigrant ship,) and she likes to know that they are safe at school, instead of being in constant fear that they may be tumbling overboard. The children of the New Zealand settlers are indeed the most hopeful portions of our charge. The parents themselves are drawn together promiscuously from all parts of the United Kingdom. The places of their former residence cannot be more widely separated, than are the colonists themselves in their habits, modes of thought, and religious impressions. But however ignorant a father may be, we have always found that he has a sincere desire that his children should be well educated:—'We know, sir, that we are a rough set: we can't help that. But can you do any thing for our children? we cannot bear them growing up like ourselves.' These are the words which a clergymen travelling through the country often hears from many an out-of-the-way settler. He has no greater trial than to be unable immediately and efficiently to meet the already existing demand for education. Let the Bishop have but the means put in his power of carrying out to the full his educational schemes, and then we may be of good courage for the future. 'The child is father to the man,' may be called a truism; but it is a truth also, which I trust I may never forget. Many of the settlers may have contracted bad habits, which they may never be able to shake off; but in the children we have our future settlers, and on their present training will, under God, mainly depend what they will be hereafter.

"At the afternoon service I preached my first sermon to this my newly-formed congregation. When all was over we returned, highly gratified by what we had seen of the readiness of the people to receive instruction. I hope the supply will equal the demand: but we are terribly short-handed at present at the college, and each of us has to do, as best he may, the work of two or three. Besides our Sunday visits, the Bishop has arranged that each of the college-deacons shall regularly go to his district every Tuesday. Of course, on extraordinary occasions we are ready to go at a moment's notice, day or night. But we find it a capital thing to have a set time every week, for doing what is commonly called weekly duty. On reaching again the banks of the Tamaki, we had an evening meal like our breakfast of bread and milk—were again kindly ferried across, and returned to the college, which we reached soon after seven. I forgot to say that my friend who accompanied me, having lately recovered from the only illness which he has had in New Zealand, brought his pony with him as far as the east bank of the Tamaki, to help him on his way: we there took off his bridle, and fastened him with a slight cord to one of the strong leaves of a flax bush growing close to the water's edge. We left him there to amuse himself as well as he could by picking up a few blades of grass. On our return we found that, tired, I suppose, of waiting, he had broken the cord (the flax leaf he could not break), and had trotted off. On our return home we were glad to find that he was there before us, having run straight to his stable.—And here ends a perhaps too minute account of one of the most interesting Sundays I ever passed."

THE PRAYER OF LOVE.

AN INCIDENT IN THE LIFE OF CROMWELL.

Many persons may remember that in the most pretty of suburban villages, Highgate, there stands a mansion nearly on the brow of the hill, bearing the name of "Cromwell House," one of the many relics remaining of that man, whose usurpation of supreme power wrought more good in England than all the reigns of the Stuarts. This house, which was the favorite resort of the Lord General during those hours when he relaxed from the cares of state, has continued, in some degree, an object of curiosity up to the present day; and they who indulge in the observation of relics of the olden time, may find themselves not uninterested in their notice of Cromwell House.

In the largest room of the mansion, in the month of January, 1652, sat three persons, dressed according to the puritanical fashion of the day. A large fire blazed from the antique grate, adding an air of comfort to their forms, while they discussed the varied topics of the times. But they shall speak for themselves.

"Yea, the Lord of battles did that day grant unto us a crowning victory," said one, whose stern, yet marked and intellectual visage and nose, which had so often excited the ribaldry of the Cavaliers, proclaimed the first man of his day—Oliver Cromwell.

"Even so," replied his companion, Colonel Jeffrys, to whom he addressed himself.

"But," added the usurper, "he, 'the son of the man,' hath escaped, and while he yet lives —" The speaker paused. "I fear," quivered on his lips, but he durst not let the words escape in the presence of his adherents.

"Yea!" interrupted Colonel Martin, who until now had continued silent, apparently wrapped in a moody reverie, "the malignants are given unto the edge of the sword; they are cut down, root and branch; root and branch are they prepared for the fire!" and the speaker's wild look and wilder manner proclaimed him one of those stern and unyielding bigots who had contributed to hew down the obstacles in the path of their master to supreme power.

"Thou seemest possessed with a spirit," said the usurper, regarding with a kind of grim satisfaction the vehement manner of his follower.

"I had a vision," resumed the fanatic, his eyes gleaming almost with the fire of madness, "and a voice came unto me in the watches of the night, and it said, 'Smite!' and I said, 'Lord, what shall I smite?' and the voice answered me and said, 'Smite the slayers of the Lord's people, root and branch, hip and thigh; kill, and spare not!'"

"Yet," replied Colonel Jeffrys, as the other sank down almost exhausted by his vehemence, "methinks enough blood has been poured forth; there is not a cavalier in England durst show his head—not a mouth dare name Charles Stuart with praise. Your prisons are full, and your headsmen satiated."

"Thou art eloquent," said Cromwell.

"At least it is an eloquence which cometh from the heart," was the reply.

"Accused be they who would protect them," again said Martin. "Ere another week shall have passed, one more shall yet be added to the list—he whom the vain call Sir John Desmond."

"And I say," retorted Jeffrys, "accused be they who would rejoice in the shedding of blood; let them beware, lest by man also shall their blood be shed."

"The wife of him thou hast named," said Cromwell, "but yesterday sought my presence."

"And thou —"

"Refused her," replied Cromwell, sternly. "Better and braver men than Desmond have fallen; nor must he be spared."

"Yet," continued Jeffrys, "our cause is now secure; shall blood continue to flow forever?"

"Thou art grown strangely merciful," replied Cromwell.

"Thou fearest then," said Jeffrys, "lest her groans and supplications might win thee to grant her request?"

"Lead us not into temptation," interposed Colonel Martin, in a deep reverie.

"Thou," continued Jeffrys, unheeding the speaker, as if used to his singular manner, "thou who hast refused so many, feared the tears and touching eloquence of a woman."

"And dost thou not think," said Cromwell, as, with his accustomed felicity, he changed the subject for one less displeasing to him, "dost thou not think that the eloquence which floweth from reason, and is assisted by forethought, is more powerful than that which cometh on the instant, and is the offspring, perchance, of prejudice?"

"Nay," replied Jeffrys.

"And," quickly interrupted Cromwell, "dost thou think that I could so successfully have led my people, had I trusted to the words which sprang on a sudden, and which are not the result of a fixed principle?"

Colonel Jeffrys smiled inwardly, for he well knew that when Cromwell had been most successful, it had been when he trusted to the power of his feelings, and not in any of those more labored discourses with which he was wont occasionally to mystify his auditors; but he answered with more policy than to betray his opinion.

"I believe," was his reply, "that no power of reason, no studied speech, or set praise, could match the eloquence which springs pure and fervent from the bosom of the loving pleading for the beloved."

"And I," returned the other, shortly, "believe as decidedly that thou art wrong."

"What labored oration," pursued Jeffrys, "can surpass David mourning for his son Absalom—'Oh! Absalom, my son, my son! would to God I had died for thee!'"

"Would," said Cromwell, abruptly, "would it were even now in our power to test this thing!"

Suddenly the other arose, and stood upright before the general. "Pardon my boldness," he said, "but your wishes may be granted this hour, nay, this very minute."

"What meanest thou?"

"That this moment waiteth without the wife of him you named but now, come once more to plead for her husband's life."

"And darest thou?" said Cromwell angrily.

"I would have dared far more," said Colonel Jeffrys, boldly. "She is the wife of one whom in my youth I loved, but who hath been separated from me by the iron nature of the times. He loved his king, I my country and its deliverer."

There was something in the nature of this speech that won the pleased and silent attention of the hearer, and he continued—

"I could not bear her tears, her agonies, and above all, her earnest despair. She is now without; admit her, and see if her eloquent feeling move not you as it did me; try if her despair be not more touching than the voice of the hired advocate."

"Admit her not—trust not to the voice of the charmer!" exclaimed Colonel Martin. "Her husband hath drunk deep of the blood of our people; the axe is prepared—let it be glutted with his blood!"

"Peace, my brother, I pray thee, peace," said Cromwell. "Thou hast done wrong," he added, turning to Colonel Jeffrys, "but she shall be admitted."

The order was given to the attendants, and, during a pause which made Colonel Jeffrys tremble for his client, Lady Desmond was admitted. By this time, the sun had gone, and the light afforded by the red flame of the fire, which threw its glare fitfully and uncertainly on the inmates of that ancient room, was all that remained to reveal, in Elizabeth Desmond, as she entered, a woman of a sad and stately presence, and one on whom, if the lapse of years had done much, the weight of grief had done more, but neither had power to bow her form, or to quench the fire of an eye which looked mournfully but unquailingly on the group.

"Art thou the wife of the malignant, John Desmond?" said Cromwell, abruptly.

"I am his most unhappy wife."

"What wouldst thou?"

"Pardon for my husband."

"And wherefore should the most inveterate hater of God's people escape his righteous doom?"

"I am a poor, unlearned woman," was the reply, "unskilled in aught save prayer to my Maker. Weak in all save love for my husband, I can but repeat, pardon, pardon."

"Is it not written," said Cromwell, ominously, "The shedder of the blood of God's saints shall surely die?"

"In your hands rests the power of life and death; think, oh, think, upon the blood that has been spilled—how the great and the good have fallen—how, by your word, they have died—and, oh! add not another to the sad and melancholy list."

"Has not thine husband drawn his sword in every town in England?"

"It were vain to deny it."

"Has he not been the most determined of a daring race? When was banner lifted, battle or broil begun, and one of the name of Desmond away from the encounter? Away!—thou hast thine answer."

"I have dreamed and prayed for this hour," was the earnest reply; "for men say thou art just, though stern. And now that, by the manifest will of God, I stand face to face with thee, I will not yield. Thou hast a wife who hath lain in thy bosom, lived but on thy smile, and placed her very thoughts before thee. Picture the axe, the headsmen, and the gory scaffold. Could she live to see thee thus?"

There was no movement on the part of her stern judge which might betray his thoughts; but, at least, he interrupted her not, and she continued:—

"Thou hast children, and felt the warm, soft touch of infancy upon thy lips—hast seen them grow up in love and fondness around thee—at morning and evening have bent before the same altar, prayed the same prayers, knelt before the same God!"

"Woman, thou troublest me!" said Cromwell, who, as is well known, was far from happy in these domestic relations.

"I have sons, and they shall honor thee, daughters, and they shall bless thee," pursued Lady Desmond.

"Hath he not shed —"

"Look upon these gray hairs, and on these pale and quivering lips—upon this frail form, bowed with agonizing suspense—and pity, oh, pity me!"

"Away, away!"

"By thine hopes of heaven—by the love thou bearest to thy God—pardon, pardon for my husband!"

"Thou pleadest in vain."

"Then, by the memory of the blood which flowed at Whitehall —" She stopped, for she felt that she had said too much; yet the usurper's iron face changed not; but, in the wild gesture of Martin, in the fearful and anxious stare of Jeffrys, she trembled for her suit. The group was worthy a painter.

For a minute Cromwell moved not, spoke not, and even scarcely breathed. It seemed an age to the agonized pleader. At last he uttered, as though the power of speech had suddenly come to him:—

"Woman, thy prayer is granted; go in peace!"

Then turning to Colonel Jeffrys, he said:—

"Thou wert right; I will see that the prisoner be released. This woman, in her great love, hath dared to speak to me of that which might have cost her dear. Her husband shall be set free."—Home Journal.

We give the following as an admirable model of an "obituary" notice. We wish the point and brevity of this record were followed in less striking cases. It is hard to refuse the insertion of notices written by those who thus find relief in their sorrow. Yet our judgment often urges the refusal, on account of the little interest felt by general readers in prolix accounts of the kind.

The following is taken from a book, entitled "Sacred Memorials of Eminent Christians."

The Memorials are generally short, as being more adapted to the sick, and they exemplify some Christian grace for which the departed person was remarkable. We shall extract one of them, necessarily one of the shortest, as a specimen of the work.—

Mary Evelyn, died 1684, aged 19—She was the daughter of the celebrated John Evelyn, Esq., and was remarkable for her great attainments, not only in literature, but also in piety and devotion. Her father describes her as being of "early piety, singularly religious, spending a part of every day in private devotion, reading, and other virtuous exercises; she had collected and written out many of the most useful and judicious periods of the books she read in a kind of common-place book, as out of 'Dr. Hammond on the New Testament,' and most of the best practical treatises." Her illness and death were followed by a full outpouring of paternal love, which can be given only in her afflicted and affectionate father's own words:—

"March 7th, 1684.—My daughter Mary was taken ill, and there soon was found no hope of her recovery: a great affliction to me; but God's holy will be done.

"March 10th.—She received the blessed Sacrament, after which, disposing herself to suffer what God should determine to inflict, she bore the remainder of her sickness with extraordinary patience and piety, and more than ordinary resignation and blessed frame of mind. The patience, resignation, and humility of her carriage, in so severe and fatal a disease, discovered more than an ordinary assistance of the Divine goodness, never expressing a fear of death, or a desire to live, but for her friends' sake. The seventh day of her illness she discoursed to me in particular as calmly as in health; desired to confess and receive the blessed Sacrament, which she performed with great devotion, after which, though in her perfect senses to the last, she never signified the least concern for the world; prayed often, and resigned her soul to God alone, (in whose bosom thou art at rest and happy!) Give us to resign thee and all our contentments, (for thou indeed wert all in this world) to His blessed pleasure! Let Him be glorified by our submission, and give us grace to bless Him for the graces He implanted in thee, thy virtuous life, pious and holy death, which is indeed the only comfort of our souls, hastening through the infinite love and mercy of the Lord Jesus, to be shortly with Thee and those blessed saints like thee, glorifying the Redeemer of the world to all eternity! Amen!

Thus lived, died, and was buried, the joy of my life, and ornament of her sex, and of my poor family! God Almighty, of His infinite mercy, grant me grace to resign myself and all I have, or had, to His Divine pleasure; and, in His good time, restoring health and comfort to my family. Teach me so to number my days that I may apply my heart to wisdom, be prepared for my dissolution, and that into the hands of my blessed Saviour I may recommend my spirit."

Narrative and Reflection by John Evelyn.—A thread of piety accompanied all her actions, and now proves her greatest consolation. The papers, which are found in her cabinet, discover how she profited by her reading; such reflections, collections out of Scripture, confessions, meditations, and pious notions, evidence her time was not spent in the trifling way of most young women. I acknowledge as a Christian, I ought not to murmur, and I should be infinitely sorry to incur God's further displeasure.

A PROPER PRIEST.

Give me the priest these graces shall possess;
Of an ambassador—the just address;
A father's tenderness; a shepherd's care;
A leader's courage, who the cross can bear;
A ruler's awe; a watchman's wakeful eye;
A pilot's skill, the helm in storm to ply;
A fisher's patience, and a labourer's toil;
A guide's dexterity to disemboil;
A prophet's inspiration from above;
A teacher's knowledge, and a Saviour's love;

BISHOP KENN.

St. MARY'S HALL AND BURLINGTON COLLEGE.—These institutions have opened, with an increased number of pupils; and are now in full and successful operation. The catalogues for the winter term are in press. The blessing of God rests upon them, in health, good order, diligence and devotion. They are humbly commended to the prayers of the faithful, that these things may be in them, and abound: "that our sons may grow up as the young plants; and that our daughters may be as the polished corners of the temple."—Missionary.

THE BANNER OF THE CROSS.

ἡ μὴ ἐν τῷ σταυρῷ.

Fling out the Banner! Let it float,
Sky-ward, and sea-ward, high and wide;
The Sun that lights its shining folds,
The Cross, on which the Saviour died.

Fling out the Banner! Angels bend,
In anxious silence, o'er the sign;
And vainly seek to comprehend
The wonders of the love divine.

Fling out the Banner! Heathen lands
Shall see, from far, the glorious light;
And nations, crowding to be born,
Baptize their spirits, in its light.

Fling out the Banner! Sin-sick souls,
That sink and perish, in the strife,
Shall touch, in faith, its radiant hem,
And spring, immortal, into life.

Fling out the Banner! Let it float,
Sky-ward, and sea-ward, high and wide:
Our glory, only in the Cross;
Our only hope, The Crucified.

Fling out the Banner! Wide, and high,
Sea-ward, and sky-ward, let it shine:
Nor skill, nor might, nor merit, ours;
We conquer only in that Sign.

The Banner of the Cross.

GOSPEL TRUTH, AND PRIMITIVE ECCLESIASTICAL ORDER.

SATURDAY, JANUARY 6, 1849.

The spirit stirring verses above, kindly written at our request, set forth, in language suited to their high and glorious theme, the object for which this paper was first established. It is indeed a proud title for so humble a sheet to bear. Yet it is a name which expresses the insufficiency of all human merit. They who have endeavored to bear this Banner, have done so only in the Faith, whose confidence is declared by the sign impressed upon its folds. In the difficulties and discouragements which they have encountered, they have each derived comfort from the thought, which has equally humbled them in all the success and commendation they have enjoyed. This thought is expressed in the new motto of the present volume—GOD FORBID THAT I SHOULD GLORY, SAVE IN THE CROSS OF OUR LORD JESUS CHRIST.

There are many who lightly regard the importance and influence of Religious Journals. Perhaps, if they had an opportunity of nearer observation, their opinion would be changed. An editor may be considered a too partial witness in this behalf and therefore we shall, for the present, withhold our testimony. But we say that if a paper, however humble, makes itself in any degree worthy of the name this Journal bears, it shall vindicate, by most conclusive proof, the importance of its office. And this is therefore the highest promise the editor can make to his readers, that, in dependence upon the strength and light of which the sign it bears is the symbol, he will strive most earnestly to make this paper more and more worthy to be called the BANNER OF THE CROSS.

The few changes in this present number have been made with this design in view. That the general appearance of this paper is more worthy of its title, all, we think, will admit. Perhaps there may not be the same unanimity of feeling with respect to other alterations. They are all the result of thoughtful consideration.

To the first improvement none can object. This volume will contain in each number, nearly two columns of matter more than when printed in the old type.

The plainer heading of the paper has been adopted, from the conviction that simplicity should ever be consulted when the great object is to fix men's attention, not upon pictures, but upon realities. We desire not to give the idea that our's is that Banner, which though it bears the sign of Peace on earth upon its folds, is carried on a spear. "For the weapons of our warfare are not carnal, but mighty through God to the pulling down of strong holds."

We have also, in the present volume, altered somewhat the arrangement of the matter of the paper. The alteration has been made on these grounds. The first and chief object of a paper should be presented to the reader, as most conspicuous. Now in a Church Journal, the first object is to give "Church Intelligence." This has, hitherto, been crowded into the last page, but for the reasons assigned we shall, hereafter, give it the first place.

The order of the present number will be the general method pursued. The first three pages shall contain Church Intelligence and Selections. The last four pages are to include editorials and original communications, etc.

Under the head "Official," shall be included original notices of episcopal services and appointments, together with similar notices and reports.

We shall feel greatly indebted to the Bishops and Clergy, or others, who enable us to make this part of our paper useful. It shall always be kept open to the last, for such communications.

In behalf of the publishers, who have incurred the risk of presenting the Banner in a more acceptable form to its readers, we must add a few words. A very little effort on the part of the friends of this Journal, might greatly increase its circulation, and secure those concerned in it against any risk. If each subscriber would only get one more, it takes about as little arithmetic to show the result, as it does effort to secure it. We are sure that few of our kind patrons have so very short a list of friends, that they could not get at least one out of love for them, to become a fellow subscriber. It is in this way the papers of the various denominations around have so large a circulation. Every subscriber becomes an agent, and every agent acts.

We hail it, as a happy omen, that the first number of this new volume bears the sacred date of THE EPIPHANY. We trust it may ever follow the leading of that Star whose light manifests, to the world, the only Saviour. Directed by those blessed rays, the only guide for true wisdom, its course shall be steady and unflinching, and it may help to lead others into that path which "shineth more and more unto the perfect day."

THE NEW YEAR.

In one of Mrs. Trimmer's Books for children, we think it is, there is an account of that ancient nation whose custom it was to gather in solemn assemblage and mourn, as we do on funeral occasions, at the birth of each new-born infant. We remember the wonder with which we gazed, in years long gone, upon the picture illustrating this custom. It seemed strange then to behold a weeping group surrounding the unconscious babe, and that so sad a welcome should greet one of those dear ones, our earthly angels, whose smiling faces bring light and joy to every heart.

Experience of life and observation of its uncertain destinies, if they do not reconcile us to this sad custom, at least convince us, that this observance was not so certainly an evidence of folly. We cannot deny the truth of the Scriptural accounts of this present life, and of the world to which life introduces us, why then should we condemn, as wanting in wisdom, these gloomy sages who thus practically owned the plain declaration of inspired wisdom? "Man is born to trouble as the sparks fly upward." If "life and immortality" were not "brought to light"; if we could not look beyond Man's pilgrimage upon earth to the "better Country": then surely this baptism of tears were a fitting initiatory rite for the beginning of that course, over whose end these words are wisely pronounced—"Man that is born of a woman hath but a short time to live and is full of misery."

The general custom of the world seems now to mark, not only the beginning of life, but the beginning of each of its periods, as a season of joy and festive gladness. The end of the year, like the close of life, is a season of solemn reflection; the opening of the year is a time of bright and happy anticipations. This feeling finds expression in that general form of greeting with which friend salutes friend—A HAPPY NEW YEAR. This practice may be the utterance of wisdom and a mutual interest, or it may be an unmeaning expression of thoughtless unconcern.

If we associate each new period of our lives with HOPE—not merely the vain hope of earthly promises which are ever brightest in the future—but that hope which is the anchor of the soul—then we may wisely speak of A HAPPY NEW YEAR. If we are conscious that we are making progress in "the path of life," if we make the beginning of each year the season of fresh resolves of improvement, of renewed consecration and devotion of ourselves to the service of God; if we feel that time is bearing us, not only onward but upward, then indeed New Year's Day may be hailed by us as a joyful Festival, and though each New Year brings us nearer to the end of life, it is to us a HAPPY NEW YEAR.

On the other hand, what reckless, unmeaning folly prompts such an expression from the lips of those who are not "redeeming the time." Is God, to whose blessed service no share in past years has been given, still to have no part in the NEW YEAR? Is the soul, for whose loss the whole world is no compensation, to be still uncared for? Are those evil habits, those destructive vanities, those earthly idols which have absorbed the heart and soul and mind, in by-gone years, still to have possession of THE NEW YEAR? Let those, who cannot rightly answer these questions, instead of giving way to the empty mockery of an unmeaning mirth and false-hearted levity, go, like the old mourners over their new-born, and weep over the birth of a new year.

With this just distinction before them, and with true sincerity of heart, we wish our Readers all and every one, A HAPPY NEW YEAR. May it be happy in its freedom from earthly trials and sorrows. And, if not thus happy, may it be happy, gloriously so, in hopes which point through the shadows of time, to the unshaded light of Eternity.

SOCIETY FOR THE ADVANCEMENT OF CHRISTIANITY IN PENNSYLVANIA.

This admirable Society will hold its 37th Anniversary on Epiphany night, (Jan. 6th,) in St. Luke's church. The annual Report will be read, a sermon preached, and a collection made in aid of the funds of the Society.

This is an occasion which should be marked by the general attendance of the members of the Church. The Church in Pennsylvania owes much to this Society. Through its fostering care the Diocese has attained much of its present extension, and Missionaries have been supported, in the noble work of carrying the Gospel in the Church, to places which had else been unbled by their labors.

During the past year the Board of Managers have been compelled, most unwillingly, to restrict their appropriations. For the evil thus resulting the Churchmen of Pennsylvania are responsible. There are many places, now unoccupied, where services are much needed, and Missionaries would successfully establish the Church, if the Society could send them sure of the means for support. Let those then, upon whom this obligation rests, coming to adore their Saviour in the memorial night of His first Epiphany to the Gentiles, imitate the Wise Men and consecrate a portion of their substance to that blessed Redeemer's service, in advancing His holy religion, and extending its blessed influence among men.

THE FLOATING CHURCH.—Notwithstanding the severe weather of last week, the Architect, who has shown so much skill and judgment in this structure, was enabled to fulfil his promise, and place this church in its appointed situation before the winter shut up the river. Great fears were entertained lest the chapel would be kept at Bordentown for this season. It came down in the severe snow storm of Friday, and thus many were deprived of the novel view of a church floating so great a distance upon the waters. It has already attracted many gazers, all of whom express great delight with the symmetry and beauty of the edifice. We copy the following accurate description from the Ledger of this city. The day has not yet been fixed for its consecration. Due notice of this interesting service shall be given. Those who are anxious to hasten the time can do so by aiding the association in paying off the debt on the building.

The floating church of the Redeemer reached the city yesterday morning, in tow of the steamboat Camden, and is now moored below Dock street wharf. Its progress along the city front was hailed by the ringing of the steamboat bells. The exterior is painted to represent brown stone, and the style throughout is gothic. The boats supporting the structure are 90 tons burthen, the deck is 90 feet long, the building is 86 feet long by 34, and has a passage all around it. The interior is 68 long, having a vestry room at the rear 6 feet by 24. The tower and spire are at the west end and are a beautiful feature of the structure; from the deck to the ball on the spire is 80 feet, and above this is a flag-staff 16 feet high. The tower contains a stairway leading to the belfry and organ loft. The latter now contains a small parlor organ, but is to be furnished with a larger instrument now building by Mr. Pitcher of New York. The interior of the church is beautifully finished, being painted in fresco by Mr. O'Fitch, of New York, to resemble stone, with a grained gothic ceiling, supported by cornice and pillars of the same style. The windows are of stained glass, which greatly heightens the effect. An aisle runs up the centre; the pews will seat 550 persons, and are all to be free. The chancel-rails and pews are painted in imitation of black walnut. A stained glass window is at the east end and immediately below are tablets containing the Lord's prayer, ten commandments and creed. On either side of the chancel is a door communicating with the vestry room. The pulpit is on the left hand side, and on the right is the lectern or reading desk; the font is in the centre immediately in front of the communion table, on either side of which are the bishop and priest's chair. These latter articles are of black walnut, suited to the architecture of the church, and are the handiwork of C. L. Dennington, of New York, the architect and builder of the whole edifice, who has most handsomely acquitted himself in the beauty of the design as well as regards the workmanship throughout. The painting of the exterior and the doors and the pews of the interior is by D. & G. Eiserman, jr., of this city. A fine toned bell is to be suspended in the belfry. The building will be thrown open, for the inspection of the public, next week, and will be consecrated by bishop Potter during the following week. The chaplain, who is to have charge of the church, is the Rev. Mr. Trapier, formerly a Lieutenant of the U. S. Navy, and now an ordained minister of the Protestant Episcopal Church.

It was built at a cost of $5270 for the Churchmen's Missionary Association, and is designed for the use of the seamen and boatmen of the city.

We have just understood that the Board of Managers have assumed individually the remaining debt, so that the Corporation is released from all obligation.

THE FLOATING CHURCH will therefore be consecrated on THURSDAY, JANUARY 11TH.

COMPLIMENTS OF THE SEASON.—Compliments are, often, the emptiest of all empty things. Frequently they are withheld when deserved, and very often they are bestowed upon those who feel that they have no title to them. Editors, however, have little reason to complain of a superabundance of either kind. They come now and then, like angels' visits, to cheer and animate us. We feel a pleasure in giving the following specimen of a substantial compliment, very grateful and acceptable, and present it to our readers, for our mutual benefit, though it was not intended for public use. We thank the kind friend who would thus add to an editor's Christmas happiness, and in return we wish him, as he deserves, a thrice HAPPY NEW YEAR. Our modesty will only permit an extract from his letter, we omit the kindest part, the commendation of the editor. We will be satisfied if others follow the example here presented. To do so it is not necessary to wait for the return of Christmas. Such festive remembrances are seasonable at any time.

"In entering on the festivities of another 'Happy Christmas,' it occurred to me that I might cheer and encourage you in your very interesting and edifying labours, by a remittance for the Banner for two years, $5. I have usually paid in advance, please therefore ask the publisher to send me a receipt for two years from the time my last subscription expired."

ACKNOWLEDGMENT.—We have great pleasure in acknowledging the receipt of $100 from "S. B. B., $50 for Domestic Missions, and $50 for Foreign." The amount will be immediately transmitted to its designation.

NEW AGENTS.—LAFAYETTE, Indiana. Rev. J. W. McCulloch, D. D., has kindly consented to act as Agent for the Banner, at this place.

CANTON, Mississippi. The Rev. Edward Fontaine has kindly consented to become the Agent for the Banner, at this place.

Foreign Intelligence.

The last Steamer brings little ecclesiastical intelligence of importance. The English Churchman has the following announcement.

"In Ireland, Dean PAKENHAM, brother-in-law of the Duke of WELLINGTON, is to be Bishop of Down and Connor."

In consequence (says the Guardian) of the attacks on the Bishop of London in Dissenting prints, for his conduct towards Mr. Baptist Noel, that gentleman has addressed the following letter to one of them:—

"Sir—Will you permit me to say that you have been entirely misinformed with respect to the Bishop of London. I have always experienced forbearance and courtesy from him. On the present occasion he has, in my opinion, simply done his duty; and he has done it with expressions of kindness, for which I feel deeply indebted to him. I trust to your justice for the insertion of this explanation, and beg to subscribe myself, sir, your obedient servant."

BAPTIST W. NOEL.

St. John's Vestry, December 5.

The political news is of great interest. Among other matters the most prominent events are the success of Prince Louis Napoleon, in the election for the Presidency of the French Republic, and the abdication of the Emperor of Austria. Of this latter the English Churchman thus speaks.

"The news from Austria is very important. The Emperor FERDINAND, and his brother (the next heir to the throne) have both abdicated, and the son of the latter, FRANCIS JOSEPH, has been proclaimed Emperor of Austria. This event took place on the 2d inst., the anniversary of Napoleon's coronation and of the Battle of Austerlitz. The consequences to the Austrian empire will be equally momentous, but in a better way. By this act, every one connected with the former discreditable proceedings of the Austrian Government is put aside. The seizers of Cracow and the murderers of the Gallician nobles, are no longer in power. They sink into merited oblivion, with Louis Philippe, and the other co-conceters of the Spanish marriages and Swiss intervention. A judicial retribution has visited almost all the disturbers of the peace of Europe. And the new Emperor of Austria, freed from all discreditable antecedents, will now have a fair chance of consolidating his empire upon constitutional principles. It is believed that this event will lead to a peaceable solution of the Hungarian question."

But the present condition of Rome and her expelled sovereign Pontiff, are subjects which excite the most interest.

In relation to the former, we quote the following from the Guardian.

The Daily News correspondent gives the following intelligence from Rome, under date of Dec. 2:—

"This capital continues to present the aspect of a calm and resolute community. The wheels of Government revolve with singular regularity in the absence of the supreme regulator. The provinces have all given their adhesion to the Ministry, and addresses are perpetually flowing in from the remoter districts ratifying the acts of the capital, and exhorting them to persevere in a national and vigorous course. Some of these provincial manifestoes are far more vehement in feeling than any sentiment published here. These are not superficial or artificial symptoms of general opinion; but the names appended to these Italian documents represent the landholders and intellect of the Roman States.

There is no doubt that the temporal sovereignty of the Roman Pontiff has been placed in jeopardy by the withdrawal of Pius IX. Had he gone anywhere but under the shadow of the bombardier of Messina, and the assassin of the Bandieras, the democracy would have borne it patiently. Malta would have been considered a decorous and dignified retirement. This is a most serious matter, and the friends and admirers of the Pope are filled with dejection and despondency.

There is renewed activity perceptible in every ministerial department, especially in that of Public Works, it being found imperative to create occupation for the unemployed. All the churches are to be newly decorated and put in preparation for the celebrity of the holy year, viz., 1850, which, as you know, is to be a year of 'Jubilee.' The funds in the hands of parish boards and other clerical strong boxes, are to be profusely unlocked for this purpose. Artists and decorators, carpenters and masons, will all be set to work.

A decree appeared on the walls yesterday, headed 'S. P. Q. R.,' the preamble of which sets forth, 'that during Advent, hitherto, theatres had been closed, to the great loss and suffering of those who earned their livelihood by the tragic or comic profession, music, and other pursuits analogous, while in other cities of Italy no such prohibition was enforced. This grievance is done away with, with the concurrence of such ecclesiastical authority as remains in Rome.—(Signed) PRINCE NERI CORSINA, VINCENZO COLONNA, Sheriffs of Rome.—From the Capitol, Dec. 2.'

Things continue in the most complete calm. No one would fancy that we were without a monarch, or under a Government which that monarch disavowed. Shops and theatres open, and the latter are said to be unusually crowded.

The people have gone in crowds to thank the few cardinals who have not fled from town, and honor them for 'not despairing of Rome, or doubting the forbearance of her citizens.'

Three o'clock.—The House met again to-day, and has just risen. All that was done during the night was confirmed, and perfect unanimity pervades every class of the community."

In relation to the probable destination of the Pope, the English Churchman has the following.

"The POPE still remains at Gaeta. He has dismissed the Ministry, dissolved the Chambers, and appointed a Council of State. These acts will, no doubt, be treated with contempt by the ruling faction in Rome. His Holiness has evidently no intention of going to Marseilles or Barcelona. Having escaped from one revolution, it is not probable that he will willingly encounter another; and as the kingdom of Naples is in a very unsettled state, he will most likely take refuge in Malta. For this step many reasons may be given. The Governor of the island is a Roman Catholic, and of course well disposed to one whom he regards as the Head of his own Church. The island is near to Italy, so that the Pope could easily return to Rome when a good opportunity occurred. In no part of the world are the people more attached to the Roman Catholic religion than in Malta; and they possess the singular advantage of full and unrestrained liberty, with all their rights, privileges, and Church property secured to them in the most ample manner. The town of Valetta is full of priests, and all the different orders of monks, Capuchins, Dominicans, Augustinians, Carmelites, &c., may be seen walking about in the habits of their respective orders."

The same paper has the following article on the probable effect of the Pope's temporal difficulties. It is well worth attention.

"The present situation of the POPE is naturally a subject of primary interest to all Christendom. The extreme party of those who look upon themselves as the only good Protestants among us are full of strange anticipations; and their abuse of PIUS IX. is more loudly expressed in proportion as his temporal fortunes appear to be in more imminent danger. This was the old practice of the Puritans towards those to whom they were, according to the proverb, too much alike to agree:—

'And every loss the men of Jebus bore,

They still were thought God's enemies the more.'

A little more calmness, as well as a little more generosity, would not be amiss in the tone which is now assumed by this party.

There are others who, since the beginning of the troubles of this eventful year, have directed their thoughts to the interpretations of prophecy, and are led to expect some great change in the Papal States, or in the extent of the PONTIFF's spiritual supremacy, from some of the expositors of the Apocalypse, and the calculation of times and periods, of which the learned MEDE was the first inventor. But it has happened to MEDE, as DAVID PAREUS said of ARISTOTLE, that though he is himself to be reckoned "inter sapientes," many of his followers are "inter fatuos;" and, his notions in one point having been developed in the deniers of the existence of Angels during the last century, it should make a prudent Christian pause before he gives even his assent to the general truth of his theory. We are now happily free from those political influences which led WARBURTON and other great names to speak of these singular views of MEDE as involving "a great Protestant principle;" (Serm. xxviii.) and probably if WARBURTON had lived in times when people were less haunted by fears of the POPE and the PRETENDER, he would have been content to bury his own prepossessions in the grave of the House of STUART. It is nothing new that public attention should be directed to the curious guesses of FLEMING, whose name was in every body's mouth at the time of the subversion of the French Monarchy sixty years ago. There have been some curious guesses also in Moore's and MURPHY's Almanack; but the expounders of futurity in the Prophecies are more fortunate than MOORE or MURPHY, as their readers only notice their guesses when they appear to be verified, omitting all regard to those which have been shelved by the unaccommodating hand of time.

The question is, supposing PIUS IX. to have lost his temporal dominion over the Roman States, what effect is this likely to produce in the affairs of Christendom, or the spiritual condition of that part of Europe which is still in subjection to the See of Rome? Now here, we think, History is a much more certain guide to fallible men than any interpretations of Prophecy, however ingenious. And, if we look to History, we may very easily find that the temporal position of the presiding Pope has again and again been very uncomfortable to himself, but has had little or no effect upon his spiritual sovereignty. Few readers of English history are unacquainted with the characteristic anecdote of Earl Tosti, when he accompanied Archbishop Aldred of York to the Papal Court. Pope Nicholas, on some pretence or other, refused the Northern Primate the honour of his pall. The Anglo-Saxon deputation, on their return, were robbed a few miles from Rome by some of those beggarly bandits with which the Roman States has at other times abounded. Tosti and Aldred went back to Pope Nicholas; "Come," said Tosti, "you had better give us what we came for, else we shall hardly think it worth coming for in future, for we, in England, shall not have much respect for a Potentate who keeps no good police within an hour's ride of his own capital." Nicholas thought his argument had reason, and complied. Perhaps it might have been expected that the Papal power was then upon the wane;—far from it. It was during the life-time of Hildebrand; and, a few years from this time, Hildebrand himself succeeded to the vacant See.

Again, what temporal Sovereign could be in greater difficulties than Hildebrand himself, and some of his nearest successors? Yet all that time the power of the Popes was making progress to its zenith.

However, it began at last to be endangered, not by the encroachments of its old enemy, the German Empire, but more in the way which we have now witnessed, by the insubordination of the Pope's own subjects. The secession to Avignon followed. Some have considered this step to be a consequence of the rise of French influence in the Consistory. It was much more a consequence of the necessity of abandoning the Roman States, which had been so evidently demonstrated in the 'dog-like death' of Boniface VIII., under the terror of the Colonnas. Undoubtedly Philip the Fair had a strong party among the Cardinals, and Clement V. was compliant in some important measures to his will; but the cause of the fall of the Templars appears to us doubtful, more especially as the King does not appear to have received the spoil of that wealthy proscription. And, after the time of Philip the Fair, there could be very little influence of the French crown at the Court of Avignon. The house of Valois had enough to do to defend their own; and it seems almost to be forgotten, by modern writers on this portion of history, that France had little hold at that time on the States of Provence, or other districts near the Pyrenees and the Mediterranean, which spoke the language of Arragon, and were more attached to the crown of Arragon or Naples than the sovereign who reigned at Paris. Avignon itself, and its territory, were held by the crown of Sicily as a fee of the German Empire, till Clement VI. bought the dominion of Joan of Naples, partly for his own convenience, and partly to spite the Emperor Louis, of Bavaria, being, as it is known, 'exceedingly mad against him.'

And thus we come to the time which is perhaps, of all others, that which furnishes the nearest parallel to the present state of things at Rome. We should, indeed, do Pius IX. great injustice if we compared his personal character with that of the luxurious and extravagant Clement VI., who had few virtues to redeem him; but the career of Nicholas Rienzi extends into the reign of Innocent VI., whose policy towards this remarkable demagogue bears a strong resemblance to the present pontiff's attempt to make his own name a rallying point to the would-be old Romans of the nineteenth century. It would be well worth a considerate Churchman's pains to turn to the records of Rienzi's sayings and doings, not in Sir Lytton Bulwer's romance (who is one of the most ardent falsifiers of historical characters,) but in Petrarch and Villani, or some creditable Italian historian. One may believe, without any great stretch of charity, that this singular plebeian demagogue had as much public virtue as falls to the lot of most men of his class; he was, as far as appears, as much more respectable than the murderers of Count Rossi, as Smith O'Brien excels Thistlewood or Despard; he would have scorned the vitriol and the dagger, unless he could have found a precedent in the history of the old Romans; he appears to have tried no worse means to exalt himself than open club-law and martial barricades. When the tide turned against him, he died, without much dignity in the manner, but still, as it would seem, true to his text. He forgot the Pope who had set him at liberty from a seven years' imprisonment, and 'Viva il popolo,' was his last word.

Let the reader only contemplate the aspect of these Roman affairs of five hundred years ago, and he will see too many points of likeness to what is now passing to entertain any extravagant hopes of these things affecting, to any considerable degree, the present prospects of the Popedom. The agitators who have raised this storm, as far as appears, are of a very common-place description. We have no reason to expect that MAMIANI or TILLONI, or whatever names they rejoice in, have any spark of the spirit of WASHINGTON, or of the ability of SIMON BOLIVAR. They are of the common selfish caste of insurgent leaders, hoping to advance themselves, and secure what they can in the confusion, or else prompted by vanity to launch their boat in the troubled waters, without calculating on their strength to row, or their skill to steer.

Were there, indeed, any religious element to be discerned in this strife,—any party in Italy, or out of Italy, who were bent upon reducing the Papal power to its old patriarchal rights, and making the Bishop of Rome what he was in the good days of the first JULIUS or the first INNOCENT, the 'primus inter pares,' any doctor who was now teaching in spirituals what the Popes have been obliged to hear long since from the Sovereigns of the Western States in temporals, 'id potest Dominus Papa, quod jure potest,'—we might look with more anxious solicitude on these unexpected movements. But, as things are now over all the Continent, the condition of Rome seems only one proof, among many, of the truth of the text that 'rebellion is as the sin of witchcraft.' And that at Rome, surely the least excusable case of all, since it is against a Sovereign, (no matter whether clerk or layman,) who had done all that he could to content 'the most sweet voices' of the forum, and was more anxious to imitate Publicola than to act Coriolanus. We can, therefore, really form no hope of any benefit to Italy or to Christendom from so unprincipled a combination as that of these new Tribunes of the people; and, inclining only to the side on which the question ought to be determined on moral grounds, we hope that, in the place of the unfortunate Cardinal Palma, Pius IX. may speedily find some Giles Alborno, whose fortitude and prudence may restore the State.

One word more. We know it is the common opinion that the removal to Avignon was a great blow to the Papal power; and the Italian name for that period, the Babylonian Captivity, seems to give some colour to this opinion; but who can read Petrarch's account of the luxury, the concourse, the enormous wealth that flowed in to that seat of old iniquity and pride, and not see that the system was yet essentially unimpaired, except by its growing vices? No, it was the judgment of one of the longest heads in Italy, when he reviewed this portion of Papal history, that the angry storm of the Ursini and Colonnas was of no permanent damage to the triple Crown (which also received its last tier at Avignon,) much less the passing breeze of Rienzi, and that its strength lay in a source which neither the commotions of the fourteenth century, nor yet those of the nineteenth, are calculated to disturb. 'Costoro soli hanno Stato, e non lo difendono, e hanno sudditi, e non gli governano; e gli Stati per esseri indifesi non sono loro tolti, e li sudditi per non essere governato non se ne curano; e pensano, e non possono alienarsi da loro.'—(Machiavelli, Il Principe, c. xi.)

THE PRAYERS AND PRACTICE OF CHURCHMEN.

MR. EDITOR,

I will not touch upon the expressions in the Evening Prayer, which are similar to those contained in the Morning Prayer, but proceed to the consideration of the Cantate Domino, in which the triumphs of the Redeemer are so vividly represented, that they appear more like historical records than prophetic declarations. Now, it appears to me that many consider these prophecies as literally accomplished, since they use no means to help forward the accomplishment of them. They understand the auxiliary verb "have" in the past and present, not in the future tense, viz: he hath done marvellous things; he hath gotten himself the victory; his righteousness hath he openly showed in the sight of the heathen; he hath remembered his mercy and truth towards the house of Israel, and all the ends of the world have seen the salvation of our God. Then they personify the sea, the floods, the hills, and the round world, and call upon them and all that dwell therein, to rejoice; and having thus expressed their spiritual joy; with an inconsistency, which would be both culpable and ludicrous, if they did not understand these expressions, they refuse every application for assistance, from those who are engaged in promoting the extension of the Redeemer's kingdom. Now, when such laudable and efficient exertions are making for the spiritual and temporal welfare of those whose home is on the great deep, they refuse to contribute even a mite. They have, in this chant, invited "all lands to show themselves joyful before the Lord, to sing, rejoice and give thanks;" but, as they do not send the invitation by any of our Lord's commissioned ambassadors, the nations cannot possibly respond to their call. In the Deus misereatur, we pray "God be merciful unto us, and bless us, and show us the light of his countenance;" and then add, "that thy way may be known upon earth, thy saving health among all nations;" "Let the people praise thee, O God, yea, let all the people praise thee." If the high and mighty Ruler of the universe grant us our petition, surely those who are enlightened and blessed, should exert all their energies, and pour out their hermetically sealed treasures, to enable the nations to rejoice and be glad, in God their Saviour: otherwise the repetition of the invitation is a senseless tautology. When the adoration which is due the Creator and Preserver of all mankind shall be offered up by all his creatures, then an especial blessing is promised, viz: then shall the earth bring forth her increase, and God, even our own God, shall give us his blessing: and it is repeated, "God shall bless us, and all the ends of the world shall fear him." The generality of Episcopalians do not appear to observe the juxtaposition or dependence of these two verses: or if they do, they make no impression on the hearts, and consequently are followed by no practical results. In the Benedic, anima mea, they call "upon the angels of God, upon all his hosts, upon his servants that do his pleasure," to unite with their souls in praising God for the blessings of his Providence, for his mercy and loving kindness, but make no subsequent exertions to acquaint the nations with his deeds. How little are they animated by the spirit which inspired the angelic host who sang glory to God in the highest, peace, good will towards men, when the angel proclaimed the glad tidings of the birth of the Saviour! "The shepherds made known abroad the saying which was told them," and "returned praising and glorifying God for all the things they had seen and heard." Who does not love to be the bearer of good news? And if we cannot convey them ourselves to those whose hearts they will gladden, do we not send a trusty messenger to them? How can we refuse to send the glad tidings of salvation to every creature under heaven? Were not these events recorded as examples for our imitation? The Church has slumbered for centuries! It is now high time for every member of it to arouse himself, and to awaken others with the sound of the Gospel trumpet. The best way to celebrate the Saviour's birth is to pour our gifts and offerings into the treasuries of those societies which are engaged in extending his kingdom, and "to do all such good works as he has prepared for us to walk in."

How limited is our petition, when we pray for the "Clergy and People." If every Episcopalian performed his or her duty to the heathen, how many more bishops might be presiding over extensive and flourishing dioceses; confirming multitudes of the young, who wish to dedicate themselves to the service of their Creator, Redeemer, and Sanctifier; and animating their clergy and missionaries in their labors of love! How many congregations might be collected in our spiritual wildernesses. How many who are hungering and thirsting after righteousness, might receive the cup of salvation and the bread of life, to invigorate them in their warfare against the world, the flesh, and the devil! How many who are now the children of wrath, might be made the children of grace, by washing in the laver of regeneration, and be born again of water, and of the Spirit. The voice of praise would resound from innumerable Churches, "watered by the dew of the Divine blessing," and enlivened by "the healthful spirit of his grace," and bringing forth fruits meet for repentance, in desert regions, where now the voices of blasphemy and infidelity alone are heard. We cannot expect our Churches to prosper with the divine blessing, while we do so little for others. It is in vain that we pray to God to pour out upon us the continual dew of his blessing, that we may truly please him, for the "honour of our only mediator and advocate," when we evince no practical gratitude to him; and while we indulge ourselves and families in every luxury and superfluity; and will not sacrifice a fashionable article of dress or furniture, however costly, in order to contribute our quota to promote his glory in the salvation of dying sinners. The best way to honour him is to obey his command of doing to others as we would wish them to do to us, in similar circumstances. If we were perishing in our sins, and had never heard of a Saviour, would not the sound of the gospel trumpet, proclaiming pardon and peace, and bringing life and immortality to light, be a joyful sound to our ears? And how can we virtually refuse to send messengers to awaken those who are dead in trespasses and sins, and to enlighten those who are sitting in darkness and the shadow of death? It is a solemn mockery of the Divine majesty to "humbly beseech him for all sorts and conditions of men, that he would make his ways known to them, his saving health among all nations," and make no corresponding efforts to co-operate in the great design. If we possessed a specific for the cholera or any other plague, would we not immediately send physicians to administer it to the sick, in every land infected by the deadly disease? And if we heard the pestilence raged in any part of our city, would we spare either expense or trouble to have the infected district purified by sanitary regulations, and to send the proper remedies to the sick, and consolation to the dying? Millions of our fellow creatures, in every part of the world, are infected with a more fatal disease, with the foul and soul-destroying leprosy of sin, and we possess the only remedy provided by the great Physician of souls, in his glorious gospel. We are also surrounded by multitudes of the ignorant and vicious, and reminded of their existence and vicinity to ourselves, by a daily record of their crimes in every newspaper, yet we extend no hand to arrest them in their vicious course, to prevent them from falling into the gulf of perdition! We commend to the "fatherly goodness" of our Heavenly Parent "all those who are any ways afflicted in mind, body, or estate;" how can they who either bow down to dumb idols, who have ears, and hear not, or worship an "unknown God," apply to the Father of mercies, and God of all comfort, in the hour of anguish and on the bed of death? The sincere fervent prayers of those who have nothing else to give, will be graciously accepted by the hearer and answerer of prayer, and may effect as much as the munificent donations of the rich; but those who are blessed with affluence, must give in proportion, if they expect that their prayers and their alms should ascend as a memorial before God, as did the unequivocal evidences of sincere piety and evangelical morality, exhibited in the life of the Centurion Cornelius, and were accepted, blessed, and rewarded, in an increase of faith, and spiritual joy, and Christian privileges.

CHANTING THE PSALTER.

REV. MR. EDITOR:

From the Banner of December the 23d, it appears that our good friend PRINCIPLE, has made another sally against the practice of chanting the Psalter in the daily service of our church. He still adheres to his theory that this practice is contrary to the rubrics. Will you give me space in your columns for a few remarks upon this subject?

SACERDOS, in upholding the practice opposed by PRINCIPLE, set forward a certain interpretation of the words read and say, as used in our rubrics, which PRINCIPLE in the following language, mentions and rejects.

"SACERDOS asserts that the rubrical term 'say' is the antithesis to 'sing,' whilst the term 'read' comprehends either saying or singing! And upon this assertion he founds his principal arguments."

"To make this assertion available, it is necessary for SACERDOS to show that the American reviewer of the Prayer Book had his rubrical view of the words read, say and sing."

Here, Mr. Editor, I dispute the ground with PRINCIPLE, and hold that it is not for SACERDOS to show any such thing, but for PRINCIPLE to show to the contrary. The burden of proof rests upon him, and for this reason, that the words referred to have always, in the Liturgies from which they were transferred into our own, borne the sense which SACERDOS contends for. Unless then PRINCIPLE can show that our reviewers designed that these words as used in our rubrics should have a different signification from what they had as used in the rubrics of the English Liturgies, he must acknowledge that their sense still remains the same.

But our good friend goes on to oppose the interpretation of the word read, given by SACERDOS, and rests his opposition, first, upon an apparent reductio ad absurdum, which, if the theory held by SACERDOS be admitted, presents itself to his mind upon a comparison of the two rubrics in the English Prayer Book relating to the use of the Psalter. He says, "He (SACERDOS) would have us believe that the compilers of the English Liturgy introduced an additional rubric to allow, what in his opinion the first, 'The Psalter shall be read,' permitted! But really I cannot perceive any thing like an absurdity in the case as it stands in the English Liturgy. What is the difficulty in supposing that the compilers of that book should so frame one rubric as to agree with another, or, in other words, that they should in one part of the book frame one rubric so as to allow what another in another part of the book permitted? It would indeed have been a perplexing case if they had framed one so as to forbid what another permitted."

The fact is, it is impossible to conclude that a difference in meaning is always intended by such changes in the wording of rubrics as this. For both changes of this sort and omissions, where the same sense is evidently designed, too often occur to admit of any such custom of interpretation. If PRINCIPLE will consult the rubric immediately before the Venite, in the first Liturgy of Edward VI. he will find it to read as follows, "Then shall be said or sung * * * Venite," &c. If he will then look at the one relating to the Te Deum, he will find as follows, "After the first Lesson shall follow Te Deum," &c. But, reasoning according to PRINCIPLE's notion of verbal difference, as in the rubrics, we might ask, Why this change in the language? why change "said or sung" for "follow," if no difference in the mode of performing the VENITE and TE DEUM was intended? Query, Did the compilers mean to prohibit the Te Deum from being either said or sung? Again, before the Benedictus, in the book referred to, may be found this rubric, "After the Second Lesson, * * * shall be used Benedictus," &c. But in the Second Book of Edward VI., "After the second lesson, shall be used and said, Benedictus." Query, Did the reviewers mean to prohibit the singing of the Benedictus? PRINCIPLE then cannot bring to his aid in this matter, the fact of such changes as he mentions, unless he can prove (the very thing to be proved) that the compilers of the present English Liturgy intended a difference between the two rubrics adduced by SACERDOS.

As for the American reviewers giving no farther direction in the daily service, than the first named rubric (directing that the Psalter shall be read,) it is a great deal more likely that this proceeded from their great fondness for shortening and simplifying the English rubrics, than from any design to forbid the singing of the Psalter. They probably considered the sense of both the English rubrics to be included in the one expression which they retained. And this is made almost certain by the indication of the sentiments of these reviewers, given in the remarks of Bishop White upon this subject, as quoted in the Banner of December 9th.

As conclusive evidence that read cannot include permission to sing, PRINCIPLE brings forward his own notion of a deficiency of judgment in our reviewers, in directing that the minister, (not the choir) shall begin the morning prayer by reading (singing) one or more of the following sentences of Scripture. He attaches the same notion both to the rubric concerning the reading of the Lessons, 'Then shall be read (sung) the—Lessons,' and to the liberty allowed of singing the whole of the communion service.

It is difficult to suppose that PRINCIPLE is ignorant of the fact that although these rubrics are the same in substance in the English Liturgy as in our own, the Daily Service has from time immemorial been sung from beginning to end in the cathedral churches of England. Now when we consider that the churches are under the special control of the bishops, we shall be obliged upon his theory to believe these bishops to have been in the constant practice of sanctioning the violation of their own rubrics. But this they have not done; for the way in which these words read and say have ever been used in the English rubrics shows plainly enough that whatever may have induced the compilers of the Liturgy to place them as they have done, it was never their intention to exclude the right to sing any part of the service whatever, whether psalms, sentences, lessons, or the whole communion service. And here let it be understood that I do not mean to strike a blow at the principle of antithesis advanced by SACERDOS. That there is a certain kind of antithesis between say and sing in our rubrics I admit; that it is such as prohibits the singing of any part of the daily service whatever, I deny. That each of these words as used in our rubrics includes permission to sing those parts of the service to which it relates, is proved by the practice of the English church just adverted to. It is further proved by the three directions to be found in the first book of Edward VI. for using the Lessons; in which directions all three words say, read and sing occur, concerning one and the same practice, in a way which I fear will be rather startling to PRINCIPLE. First, we find the following, "The Table and Kalendar, expressing the order of the Psalms and Lessons to be said at matins and evensong, throughout the year." Secondly, in the order of matins we find this rubric, "Then shall be read two lessons distinctly with a loud voice, that the people may hear," &c. Thirdly, in the rubric immediately following this one we read, "And (to the end the people may the better hear) in such places where they do sing, there shall the lessons be sung in plain tune."—How? alas for PRINCIPLE!—"after the manner of distinct reading; and likewise the Epistle and Gospel!"

It is rather plain then, that, as before said, unless our good friend can show that our reviewer designed to change the import of the words say and read, he must submit to be horrified with the thought that there is not a letter in any one of our services which the rubrics do not permit to be sung. As to the propriety of hastily using this liberty in the present condition of the church, this is quite another question, and not at all connected with the question of its lawfulness. If PRINCIPLE still persists in forcing upon the word read in our rubrics, the exclusive sense which we now-a-days attach to it in ordinary converse, I trust he will permit me to assure him that other evidences can be adduced that his theory of interpretation is wholly untenable. And I cannot but think that if he conscientiously endeavors to act out the rubrics when subjected to this excluding process, he will more than once be sorely puzzled what to do.

Edw. W. H. Odsheimer

But, upon the supposition that he will condescend to read what I am writing—I fancy I can hear him ask, “Do you mean to say that there is no rubrical distinction between the three words in question?” I answer, No, I do not mean to say this. But I do maintain that the distinction is not one of kind, but of degree; in other words, that sing means sing and nothing else; that say, though used as the antithesis to sing, was so used in the rubrics as to permit saying instead of singing, and this merely in accommodation to the inferior tone of public worship which unhappily at that time through puritanical influence was beginning to prevail; and that while it makes saying admissible, it does not exclude a return to the better practice of singing. Read is equally applicable to saying and singing, and nowhere excludes either. This is the only mode of interpretation of these words, which, as in part above shown, is agreeable to their use in the English Liturgies, and to the authoritative practice of the English Church; and consequently it is the only one which can be applied to our own rubrics.
